

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFATORY NOTE

WEST was the first reporter "by appointment of the House of Lords."

The first and second volumes of the House of Lords Cases were reported by Clark and Finnely (who were also reporters "by appointment of the House of Lords"); the remaining volumes by Clark alone.

In the original paging of Volume I. of the House of Lords Cases, the numbers 175 and 176 were omitted. The mistake has not been rectified in the present Volume of the English Reports.

Wilbraham v. Scarisbrick (1 H.L.C. 167) was discussed and followed in Shuttleworth v. Murray, 1901, 70 L.J. Ch. 459.

REPORTS OF CASES upon Appeals and Writs of Error, and Questions of Peerage, decided by the House of Lords, during the Session 1839. By C. H. MACLEAN and G. ROBINSON, Barristers-at-Law.

ERROR FROM THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER, ENGLAND.

THE KING, Plaintiff in Error.—Erle—Hurlstone; THOMAS JOHNSON, Defendant in Error.—Attorney General (Sir John Campbell)—Recorder of London (Law)—Bullock [19th February 1839].

[Mews' Dig. i. 350; v. 257; vi. 173; xi. 481; S.C. 6 Cl. and F. 41, affirming 5 A. and E. 488; 6 Nev. and M. 870; 5 L.J. Ex. 282. On point as to discharging jury from giving verdict (6 C. and F. 60), cited with approval in Yeo v. Tatem—The Orient, 1871, L.R. 3, P.C. 702, 703. On point as to existence of custom followed in Scales v. Key, 1840, 11 A. and E. 819.]

Custom—City of London—Stat. 11 Geo. 1, c. 18, sec. 7.—Jury.—On quo warranto for exercising the office of alderman of London the defendant pleaded two customs of the city of London; viz. a custom for the court of mayor and aldermen to examine and determine whether a person elected alderman of a ward, and returned to the said court as such alderman, be, according to their sound discretion and consciences, a fit and proper person and duly qualified; and also a custom that where the [2] same person shall be three times elected to be alderman by a ward, and three times rejected by the court of mayor and aldermen as not a fit and proper person, and not duly qualified to support the dignity and discharge the duties of the office, the mayor and aldermen may for remedy thereof nominate, elect, and appoint a fit person, being a freeman, out of the whole body of citizens to be alderman of such ward; and further pleaded that a party who was three times returned by a ward had been adjudged unfit by the mayor and aldermen who elected the defendant; the relator took issue upon the existence of the customs, and replied that the party rejected was fit and qualified, upon which issue was joined. The Lord Chief Justice at the trial directed the jury, that if they were of opinion that the customs aforesaid had existed from time immemorial down to 1689, of which there was evidence, they should find for the customs, notwithstanding a city bye-law of the 13 Anne, and the statute 11 Geo. 1, c. 18, which, as alleged by defendant, had put an end to the customs. The jury then found the customs, and the Lord Chief Justice, without consent of parties, discharged the jury from returning a verdict on the issues as to fitness, etc. as being immaterial. Upon verdict for the defendant, and bill of exceptions by relator, Held (affirming the judgment in error from the Exchequer Chamber, which affirmed the direction of the Lord Chief Justice,) 1. That the stat. 11 Geo. 1, c. 18, and the city bye-law of the 13th of Queen Anne, relating to the mode of election, stood well with the customs as proved, and did not touch the power of rejection and selection in the mayor and aldermen.

2. That where the jury have found their verdict on all the material issues joined, the judge who tries the cause may, without the consent of the parties, discharge the jury from returning any verdict on issues that in his opinion are immaterial.

Practice. Per Lord Wynford.—In deciding on bills of exceptions, it is the practice of the Court not to go into the whole record, but to decide upon the points raised by the bill of exceptions.

[3] In February 1831 a vacancy having occurred in the office of alderman of the ward of Portsoken, Michael Scales and Daniel Whittle Harvey were respectively candidates for that office, on which occasion Scales was chosen by a majority of the inhabitants of the ward. A petition was then presented to the court of mayor and aldermen against the admission of Scales to the office of alderman, and that court having taken the petition into consideration, adjudged that he was not a fit and proper person to be alderman, and refused to swear him in. Two other elections subsequently took place, on each of which occasions Scales was chosen by a majority of the inhabitants, but the court of mayor and aldermen refused, as before, to swear him in, and after the last election appointed the defendant, Johnson, to the vacant office of alderman, alleging a custom that when the same person has been three times elected as alderman by the inhabitants of any ward, and three times rejected by the court of mayor and aldermen as unfit, that then the court of mayor and aldermen may elect as alderman any freeman out of the whole body of the citizens.

On quo warranto at the relation of Samuel Dalton against Thomas Johnson, for unlawfully exercising the office of alderman of the ward of Portsoken in the city of London,—

Plea 1.—That the city of London now is, and from time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary hath been, an ancient city, and the citizens thereof a body corporate and politic: that there are divers wards, and amongst others the ward of Portsoken, and divers citizens and freemen have been called aldermen, one to each ward, which office of alderman is one of [4] great trust and pre-eminence: that the court of mayor and aldermen is held within the said city for the purpose (amongst others) of admitting and swearing into the office of alderman persons duly elected thereto and qualified to fill the office; that wardmote courts are held within the city for the election by the inhabitants of the ward of persons into the office of alderman, by virtue of precepts issued by the mayor, to which precept returns are made into the court of mayor and aldermen: that there is an assembly called the court of common council, holden before the mayor and aldermen and the commons of the city, which has power to make bye-laws: that from time immemorial until the passing of a bye-law on the 1st August in the 21st of King Richard the Second, whereby it was ordained, that for the future in the elections of aldermen two honest and discreet men should be presented to the mayor and aldermen, so that either of them whom they should choose might be admitted and sworn; and also after the passing of a bye-law made on the 15th of April in the 13th year of the reign of Queen Anne, intituled “An act for reviving the ancient manner of electing aldermen,” whereby, after reciting amongst other things, that by the ancient usage and custom of the city of London, when any ward of the said city became vacant and destitute of an alderman, the inhabitants of that ward having a right to vote in such elections were wont to choose one person only, being a citizen and freeman of the same city, to be alderman of the same ward, for reviving the said ancient custom, and restoring to the said inhabitants their ancient rights and privileges of choosing one person only to be their alderman, it was enacted from thenceforth in all elec-[5]-tions of aldermen of the said city, at a wardmote to be holden for that purpose, there should be elected, according to the said ancient custom, only one able and sufficient citizen and freeman of the said city, not being an alderman, to be returned to the court of mayor and aldermen, which person so elected should be by them admitted and sworn well and truly to execute the office of alderman, and from thence thitherto the aldermen had been elected at the wardmote courts, one for each ward.

The first plea then stated, that the court of mayor and aldermen have the cognizance, jurisdiction, and authority of examining, hearing, determining, and adjudging concerning the election and return of every person elected into any place or office at a wardmote court, (whenever the merits of such election or return had been brought into question by the petition of any person interested therein,) and also of examining and determining whether or not any person so returned to the court of mayor and aldermen as an alderman of any ward, was according to the discretion and sound consciences of the mayor and aldermen a fit and proper person, and duly qualified, (whosoever the fitness and qualification of the person so returned has been brought into question by the petition of any person interested therein to the court of mayor and aldermen,) and that it was a necessary qualification of the person to be elected, admitted, and sworn alderman of any ward that such person should be a fit and proper person to support the dignity and discharge the duties of the office of alderman, and the honour and charge of the city, according to the discretion and sound consciences of the mayor and aldermen.

[6] The first plea further stated, that within the city of London there now is, and from time immemorial there hath been and still is, a certain ancient and laudable custom there used and approved, viz., that whosoever the inhabitants of any ward should three times return to the court of mayor and aldermen the same person to be alderman of any such ward, who should be by the said court, according to the custom aforesaid, adjudged and determined, according to the discretion and sound consciences of the mayor and aldermen, not a person fit and proper to support the dignity and discharge the duties of the place and office of an alderman upon such three several returns, that then the court of mayor and aldermen lawfully might for remedy in that behalf nominate, elect, and admit a fit and proper person, being a freeman of the city, out of the whole body of the citizens, to be alderman of any such ward being so made destitute of an alderman.

The plea then stated the three successive elections and rejections of Scales, and the election of the defendant by the court of mayor and aldermen, in pursuance of the said ancient custom last above mentioned.

Plea 2.—The second plea was the same as the first, except that in the custom first set out it alleged the right of the court of mayor and aldermen to adjudicate generally on the fitness of the person elected, without the allegation of a petition to raise the question.

The third plea stated that in the election at which Scales and the defendant were candidates the latter was duly elected.

The replication denied the jurisdiction of the court of mayor and aldermen, traversed the custom to elect after three rejections as set forth in the first and second pleas [7] respectively, and, denying the allegation in the third plea, averred, in reference to the first and second pleas, that Scales at the times of the first, second, and third elections was an able and sufficient citizen, etc. and a fit and proper person to support the dignity, etc., to which there was a rejoinder, and issues thereon.

At the trial before Lord Denman, C.J., at the sittings in London after Michaelmas term 1834, the counsel for the King tendered evidence in support of the issues as to the fitness of Scales, at the several times when he was so rejected by the mayor and aldermen, to support the dignity and discharge the duties, etc., which being objected to, the Chief Justice refused the evidence offered, and wholly discharged the jury from giving any verdict upon the issues as to fitness, etc.; and the attention of the Chief Justice being directed to a certain act of parliament made and passed in the eleventh year of the reign of King George the First, intituled "An act for regulating elections within the city of London, and for preserving the peace, good order, and government of the said city,"* the Chief Justice directed [8] the jury, that if they were of opinion that the customs set forth in the two first-mentioned pleas had existed from time immemorial down to the year 1689, then, [9] in his opinion, that act of parliament

* The act founded on is entitled "An Act for regulating elections within the city of London, and for preserving the peace, good order, and government of the said city." There is a general recital in the preamble: "Whereas of late years great controversies and dissensions have arisen in the city of London at the elections of citizens to serve in Parliament, and of mayors, aldermen, sheriffs, and other officers of the said city; and many evil-minded persons, having no right of voting, have unlawfully intruded themselves into the assemblies of the citizens, and presumed to give their votes at such elections, in manifest violation of the rights and privileges of the citizens, and of the freedom of their elections, and to the disturbance of the public peace: And whereas great numbers of wealthy persons, not free of the said city, do did not put an end to such customs, or prevent them from finding, and that they should find for the customs.

The postea, as drawn up, contained a finding for the defendant upon the four issues as to the customs stated in the first two pleas, but against him upon the issue on the third plea; and as to the remaining issues the postea stated that the jurors were discharged from giving any verdict. The judgment was that the office claimed by the defendant be allowed and adjudged to him, with costs.

A writ of error was thereupon brought, which was argued in the Exchequer Chamber on 2d June 1836 (5 Ad. and E. 488), before Tindal, C. J.; Park, Gaselee, Bosanquet, and Vaughan, Justices; Parke, Bolland, Gurney, and Alderson, Barons.

Tindal, C. J., on 8th June 1836, delivered the judgment of the Court.

"This case comes before us on a bill of exceptions tendered to Lord Denman on the trial of this cause by the counsel of the party on whose relation the information proceeded. The exceptions taken to the direction of the Lord Chief Justice to the Jury were two; first, that he refused to allow witnesses to be examined in support of the issues raised upon the pleadings, with respect to Michael Scales being an able and sufficient citizen and freeman of the city of London, and a fit and proper person to support the dignity and discharge the duties of an alderman of that city, and that he wholly discharged the jurors from giving any verdict upon those issues; and, [10] secondly, that the Chief Justice directed the jury, that if they thought the customs set forth in the two first-mentioned pleas had existed from time immemorial down to the inhabit and carry on the trade of merchandize and other employments within the said city, and refuse or decline to become freemen of the same, by reason of an ancient custom within the said city restraining the freemen of the same from disposing of their personal estates by their last wills and testaments: And whereas great dissensions have arisen between the aldermen and commons of the common council of London in or concerning the making or passing of acts, orders, or ordinances in common council;" it then goes on to make various provisions, and recites the general evils which the act was intended to remedy; and the seventh section is in these words: "And whereas divers controversies and disputes have arisen in the said city of London touching the right of election of aldermen and common councilmen for the respective wards of the said city; for quieting all such disputes and controversies for the future, it is hereby further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that from and after the said first day of June in the year of our Lord 1725, the right of election of aldermen and common councilmen for the several and respective wards of the said city shall belong and appertain to freemen of the said city of London, being householders, paying scot as herein-after is mentioned and provided, and bearing lot when required in their several and respective wards, and to none other whatsoever." The 15th section is in these words: "And to the intent that a final end may be put to all disputes between the mayor and aldermen and the commons of the common council of the said city, touching the making or passing of acts, orders, or ordinances in common council; and that no act, order, or ordinance may for the future be made or passed in common council without the full consent of the representative body of the said city, according to the ancient constitution of the same; be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that no act, order, or ordinance whatsoever, at any time from and after the said first day of June 1725, shall be made or passed in the common council of the said city, without the assent of the mayor and aldermen present at such common council or the major part of them, nor without the assent of the commons present at such common council or the major part of them. In the 16th section the right of election of the lord mayor and aldermen to various offices is preserved to them, and taken out of the operation of the general words in the prior part of the act: "Provided always, that nothing in this act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to any election, nomination, or appointment in common council of any common serjeant, town clerk, judges of the sheriff court, coroner, common crier, commissioners of sewers, garbeller, and the governor and assistants of London of the new plantation of Ulster in Ireland; but that the election, nomination, or appointment of all or any of the said officers shall or may, from and after the said first day of June 1725, be made by the mayor, aldermen, and commons in common council assembled, or the major part of them; any thing in this act contained to the contrary thereof notwithstanding."

year 1689, the act of 11 Geo. 1, c. 18, did not put an end to such customs; and in that case he directed them to find a verdict for the defendant on the four issues first in order on the record.

"It will be more desirable, in the first place, to state our opinion as to the second exception, as the judgment formed by us on that will form the groundwork of the opinion at which we have arrived upon the subject of the first.

"The custom which forms the subject of the first and third issues is a custom that the court of mayor and aldermen, from time immemorial, have had the cognizance and determination of the election and return of every person into any place or office at any wardmote court, whenever the merits of such election were brought into question, and of examining and determining whether any person returned to them as an alderman of any ward of the city is, according to the discretion and sound consciences of the mayor and aldermen, a fit and proper person, and duly qualified in that behalf. The custom which forms the subject of the second and fourth issues, is a custom that whenever it should happen that the inhabitants of any ward should three times return to the court of mayor and aldermen the same person to be an alderman of any such ward, who should, upon such three several returns, according to the former custom, be adjudged and determined, according to the discretion and sound consciences of the mayor and aldermen, not a person [11] fit and proper to support the dignity and discharge the duties of the place and office of an alderman of the said city, that the court may for remedy in that behalf, nominate, elect, and admit a fit and proper person, being a freeman of the said city, out of the body of the whole citizens, to be an alderman of such ward so made destitute of an alderman. The first custom set up is, therefore, a custom to approve or reject; the second is a custom to nominate and elect, in case the same person is three times returned by the wardmote, and three times rejected as unfit by the court of mayor and aldermen. Now the only exception taken to the direction of the Lord Chief Justice, which goes to the validity of the customs above set forth, is, that the jury should have been directed by him that the statute 11 Geo. 1, c. 18. is in direct contravention of those customs, and, in effect, has abrogated them altogether. To the validity of the first custom but little objection was made in the course of the argument; indeed, after the determination of the case of The King v. The Mayor and Aldermen of London (3 Barne and Adolph. 255), where the legality of the custom of approval or rejection was brought distinctly before the Court of King's Bench, it is impossible to contend that it was not a legal custom still existing in full force, notwithstanding the statute of George the First.

"The question, therefore, principally turns upon the effect of the statute, as to the custom secondly set forth. Now we think that custom, considered in itself, a legal and reasonable custom, supplying a [12] remedy where an evil is likely to occur from the exercise of the custom to approve or reject, and without which remedy the first would become neither useful nor reasonable, from the consequences that might frequently follow from its exercise. The question therefore becomes this, whether this custom in the second plea is repealed by the statute 11 Geo. 1. and we are all of opinion that it is not in any way affected thereby. That statute was passed principally for the purpose of regulating the course of elections which take place at the wardmotes of the city, both of citizens to serve in parliament, of mayors and other officers, and, as the first section expresses, 'of aldermen and common councilmen, chosen at the respective wardmotes of the said city,' and the first six sections of the statute are exclusively occupied with regulations as to the mode of taking the poll. The seventh section, after reciting that divers controversies and disputes had arisen in the city of London touching the right of election of aldermen and common councilmen for the respective wards of the city, enacts that, after the day therein specified, the right of election of aldermen and common councilmen for the several and respective wards of the city shall belong and appertain to freemen of the said city being householders, and paying scot and bearing lot when required, and to none other whatsoever. The seven following sections contain provisions as to particular cases of qualifications for voting at such elections, and the sections which follow are foreign altogether to the subject matter of the present inquiry; so that the statute [13] taken altogether is no more than an enactment that the right of electing aldermen, amongst other officers, shall be by the freemen of the city, being householders, at the wardmotes of the respective wards, the poll to be taken, and the right of voting to be determined, in the manner and under the regulations described in the act.

"Now the ancient customs, which are the subject of the present discussion, have themselves been confirmed amongst the other ancient bye laws and customs of the city by parliament; and the first observation that arises thereupon is, that as these customs were in full operation at the time of the statute, and as the statute is altogether silent about the powers of the court of lord mayor and aldermen, there is nothing that can be construed into a repeal of either of the customs. Again, it is to be observed that the exercise of this custom is in no way inconsistent with the statute, for the custom does not begin to operate until after the statute and all the provisions contained in it have had their full operation and effect. The alderman must be first elected at the wardmote by the electors qualified according to the provisions of the statute, at a poll taken in the manner therein prescribed, before he can be returned to the court of lord mayor and aldermen for approval or rejection. Then it is for the first time that the two ancient customs begin to have their force. They contain a mode of trial of the fitness of the return, made under the statute, after the election has taken place, and apply to a point of time which is altogether out of the provisions of the statute. In fact, the effect of the two customs, which are in effect acts of parlia-[14]-ment, is this, that by the first the election at the wardmote is annulled, and by the second, after three rejections no further election at a wardmote is to take place. Now this is not at all inconsistent with a statute regulating elections only, in the case of their taking place at a wardmote. The statute, therefore, and the two ancient customs may both stand well together, and we see no reason whatever for holding that the customs are not in full force, notwithstanding the provisions of the Act.

"It was further insisted in the course of the argument on the part of the relator that the bye law of the 13th of Anne had the same effect as to the annulling the customs set forth as the statute. It appears to us, however, to be unnecessary to give any other answer to this objection than that which has already been given as to the statute of George the First. Both stand precisely upon the same ground, the only difference between the two objections being this—that whilst the statute is by necessary implication only to be construed as speaking of the election at wardmotes of the city, the bye law is confined in express terms to that mode of election.

"The other exception, tendered to the Lord Chief Justice at the trial, related to his refusal to receive evidence tendered to him upon the several issues before referred to, and discharging the jury from giving any verdict on the same. It appears to us that the four issues which are first in order upon the record having been found in favour of the defendant, and the defendant being entitled, in our opinion, notwithstanding the objections which have [15] been taken, to judgment in his favour on those issues, it has become perfectly immaterial in favour of which of the two parties the jury might have found their verdict on the issues in question; for the fitness or unfitness of the party to fill the office of alderman having been determined by a court not only of competent but exclusive jurisdiction, any finding of a jury on that point is altogether inoperative and useless. If this record had contained a verdict in favour of the relator upon these issues, we should have allowed the defendant, notwithstanding such verdict, to enter up judgment for himself; and it is, therefore, unnecessary to say that we cannot agree to send those issues to be tried at a very useless expense before a second jury. Indeed the case of Powell v. Sonnett and others in error, in the House of Lords (Bligh's Reports, 1827, p. 552), furnishes a decisive authority that where the jury have found their verdict on all the material issues joined, the others being perfectly immaterial as between the parties, they may be discharged by the judge who tries the cause from returning any verdict on issues that are immaterial, without the consent of the parties.

"We therefore think the judgment of the Court of King's Bench must be affirmed.

"My brother Bosanquet, who also heard this argument, requests me to say that he concurs in the judgment we have given."

The Exchequer Chamber having affirmed the judgment of the Court of King's Bench, a writ of error was brought in parliament, which came on for hearing on [16] the 19th of February 1839 before the House of Lords, assisted by Chief Justice

Tindal, Justices Littledale, Vaughan, Patteson, Williams, and Coleridge, and Barons Park, and Gurney.

Plaintiff in Error.—The principal points to be argued were:—1st. That the alleged custom for the court of mayor and aldermen to elect any person from the body of the citizens to be alderman in the event of their having three times rejected the person elected by the inhabitants of any ward in unreasonable, contrary to public policy, and void in law. The alleged custom of election is bad in law, for if such a custom prevailed, the court of mayor and aldermen might totally deprive the citizens of their right to elect their aldermen, and render their privileges in that respect subject to the arbitrary will and discretion of the court of mayor and aldermen, who would have only to reject as unfit the person three times elected by the citizens without giving any reason, and the election of every alderman would be in their hands. It is obvious how this alleged custom might be perverted to party and political purposes. It is not a reasonable custom that an irresponsible body should put aside the choice of the wardmote. Besides, if this custom existed of electing any person after the candidate chosen by the citizens has been thrice returned and rejected, there is no reason why the same custom should not exist when an individual has been twice or even once refused, and the consequence would be, as observed by Lord Tenterden in Re v. The Lord Mayor of London (9 B. and C. 1), "That the court of mayor and aldermen would have in their hands the absolute [17] control over all the elections to city offices by the wardmote courts." A custom so liable to abuse is inconsistent with public policy.

2dly. That the said custom of election is in direct contravention of the 11 Geo. 1. c. 18., and of the bye law passed in the 13th year of the reign of Queen Anne set out in the pleadings. The question in controversy is, whether the defendant can maintain that he has a right to the office of alderman in respect of a twofold custom, by which the court of mayor and aldermen have not only a right thrice to reject the same person chosen by the wardmote, but that if they shall so reject on three several occasions the person thus often presented to them, this court of mayor and aldermen lawfully may elect a fit and proper person, being a freeman, out of the whole body of citizens, to be alderman of any such ward so made destitute. The alleged custom is inconsistent with the 11 Geo. 1. c. 18., which defines the electoral body who shall have the exclusive right, and consequently the act of parliament must prevail. The seventh section of that statute declares that the right of election shall appertain to freemen of the city being householders paying scot and bearing lot, and to none other whatsoever. The 14th section enacts, that no person shall vote at any election of aldermen who shall have been discharged from paying to the rates and taxes to which citizens of London inhabiting therein are liable. Altogether the persons composing the court of aldermen must of necessity be freemen, yet they need not, and in fact some of them are not, householders paying scot and bearing lot. [Lord Brougham.—Do not these words apply to the franchise in the wardmote?] The 16th [18] section provides that the act shall not extend to certain officers, but that the election of those officers shall be made by the mayor, aldermen, and common council, thereby showing that the legislature made an express enactment where any right of election was intended to be continued to the mayor, aldermen, and common council, and excepted out of that act. The distinction betwixt electing and the right of setting aside the election is illustrated by the cases of Regina v. Mayor of Norwich (2 Lord Ray. 1244), and Wright v. Fawcett (4 Burr. 2041).

The alleged custom is also inconsistent with the bye law passed in the 13th year of the reign of Queen Anne, and if so, the bye law must prevail over the custom. The bye law shows upon the face of it the usurpation of the court of aldermen; it is entitled "An act for reviving the ancient manner of electing aldermen," and the recital declares it to be made for the purpose of restoring the inhabitants their ancient rights and privileges of choosing one person only to be their alderman; and it enacts, that the person elected by the citizens should be by the court of mayor and aldermen admitted and sworn. The bye law and the act of parliament are uniform in their object, and the same right is established by both. Thus the bye-law was material in deciding as to the custom, of which last there was no evidence after 1689. Bye laws of the city of London not contravening any statute are of authority.

Re v. Mayor and Aldermen of London (9 B. and C. 1), Hutchins v. Player (Sir O. Bridgman's Judgments, p. 272), and in the case of Wagoner (8 Co. Rep. 121 b.), therein referred to.

[19] 3dly. That the Lord Chief Justice ought at the trial of this information to have allowed witnesses to be examined in support of the issues joined as to the fitness of Scales. The evidence rejected at the trial being in support of material issues should have been allowed to be adduced. If the replication upon which those issues are raised were bad in law, the defendant should have demurred. The power of judgment of the fitness or not did not arise till after the election by the ward-mote.

[Lord Brougham.—If the issue be clearly immaterial the case of Powell v. Sonnett and others (1 Bligh's Rep. N. S. p. 552, and 3 Bing. 381) settled the point, that a judge is perfectly right in discharging the jury from finding a verdict upon such immaterial issue.]

The counsel for the defendant in error were not called on.

Lord Brougham.—My Lords, I wish to ask your Lordships whether it is necessary that the counsel for the defendant in error should be heard. The learned judges have come to assist your Lordships in the two cases appointed for hearing to-day; but that does not, I apprehend, imply that it is necessary they should be heard throughout, and it will involve a waste of time if there is no reasonable doubt, and if the opinion of all the learned judges, as well as of your Lordships, is against the plaintiff in error, and in support of the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, against whose decision the bill of exceptions was tendered, but which decision was affirmed in the court of error, the Court [20] of Exchequer Chamber. I have reason to believe the learned judges still retain their opinion; if I am wrong they will interfere; but I believe it is the fact, that they have heard nothing to shake their opinion; if so, I think it will be an unwarrantable waste of time to prolong the argument. My noble and learned friend (Lord Wynford), formerly Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, entirely assents to the view I have taken, that this judgment is perfectly right. I have attended most carefully to the argument of the learned counsel. I have never heard one syllable of the opposite side. I have not looked into the judgment of the court below. I have looked into the act of parliament, on which the main reliance is placed by the learned counsel, and I have not any doubt whatever in my mind; at the same time, if the learned judges were unanimously to tell me they have changed their opinion, I should have a doubt, and should desire to hear the other side. At present I humbly submit to your Lordships that the judgment of the court below be affirmed; and I do it in consequence of the view I take of this act of parliament, upon which the main reliance is placed. I am informed that the judges of the Queen's Bench have given no judgment. The Exchequer Chamber consisted of the judges of the two courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer. The learned judges of the Court of Queen's Bench are now, therefore, exercising their judgment; and if they have any doubt I will withdraw my motion, and consent to the argument proceeding.

(The learned Judges consulted together.)

[21] My Lords, I find there is no doubt whatever existing among the learned judges of the Queen's Bench, so that it is so much fairer towards the party who is the plaintiff in error, for it is on his own showing that he has not been able even to raise a doubt. This entirely concurs with the view I have taken upon the subject. I have heard with the greatest attention every argument which has been brought forward by the learned counsel, not only whatever suggested itself to his own acute and experienced mind, but whatever the eagerness and the anxiety of the client, outstripping the professional zeal of the advocate, could suggest: we have heard him present his argument with all those additional reinforcements which a person so materially interested in the result might be reasonably expected to present; but the whole has left my mind entirely free from doubt.

My Lords, I consider that this act of parliament was intended to prevent the mischief which is stated in the preamble as the governing motive of the legislature. No doubt that mischief applied very much to persons unqualified intruding themselves in the choice of mayor, and in the choice of aldermen; for it says "that the right of election in the respective wards shall belong and appertain to freemen of the said city of London, being householders paying scot and bearing lot in the several and respective wards, and to none other whatsoever." That is a clear and distinct enactment, relating entirely to who shall and who shall not exercise that franchise at the wardmote; it has no reference to what ought to be done in respect of admission in case of rejection. There is no reference to any custom, there is no reference even to any bye law; but in my [22] opinion the act of parliament and the custom may very well stand together, because it is quite consistent with the custom that the wardmote shall be constituted in a particular way. The election is by the wardmote, but the approval may be in the mayor and aldermen; and really on that point I entertain no doubt. I need not enquire into the effect of the bye law which appears upon the record, but not on the bill of exceptions. But giving the party the benefit of it, it appears to me that the argument raised upon it comes to nothing, and that it is subject to the same observation as the other.

With respect to the point as to discharging the jury, I think it is quite clear that a judge has authority, even without the consent of the parties, to discharge the jury from giving a verdict where the finding cannot be material. In this case it is clear it could not be material. It might be material in the case put of a libel, to which the defendant pleaded the general issue and a plea of justification. It is said, when the jury have found not guilty, what signifies it whether it is true or false? It does not signify as to the question in this case, but it may signify as to the costs of that issue; because the plea of not guilty being affirmed by the finding of the jury, would discharge the defendant, and saddle the plaintiff with the general costs; but then there would remain the other question, who shall pay the costs of the special plea of justification? If that special plea were found one way one party would pay those costs, and if it were found the other way the other party would pay the costs. How then can it be said to be quite immaterial whether the publication is true or not? It is clear, therefore, that case does not apply to this, [23] because whichever way this was found there would be no costs.

Upon these short grounds which I have run over, (and I am not aware that it is necessary I should detain your Lordships upon any other,) I have no hesitation whatever in asking your Lordships to determine this case without further discussion; it would be throwing away more of the valuable time of the learned judges, and of your Lordship's time, in this case, and I think it would be setting a wrong precedent, for the consequence would be, that if the learned judges had been summoned, even if the case turned out to be a clear one, which I think this is, you would be obliged to waste your time and theirs in going through the case: I will not be a party to laying down any such precedent. On these grounds I humbly move your Lordships that the judgment be affirmed.

Lord Wynford.—My Lords, a decision of mine having been referred to by the learned counsel at the bar, I beg to say that it appears to me I gave a right judgment, though perhaps with a wrong reason, as I find it reported. My Lords, I am happy to be informed that it is not my judgment, but the judgment of a learned judge much more likely to give a right reason than I am. I think a better reason might have been given for it.

With respect to the motion made by my noble and learned friend, I entirely concur in it. The case is so extremely plain that it appears to me impossible that any two lawyers can doubt about it. With respect to the point of the consent of parties being required where a judge feels it to be his duty to disenumber the cause [24] of a parcel of lumber perfectly immaterial to the real issue, it would be absurd if he was not at liberty to do that without the consent of the parties; and in this case I conceive if the issues in question were immaterial he was perfectly justified in discharging the jury from finding a verdict upon those issues, though the parties might refuse to consent. At the same time I agree with my noble and learned friend that if the finding upon those issues made any difference either in the costs or in any other respect, he must have the consent of the parties. The issues in question became immaterial when the existence of the custom was established, and as their being found one way or the other could make no difference to the parties, it appears to me the learned judge did perfectly right in getting rid of them.

It seems impossible to doubt that the act of parliament applies to the first election, and may very well stand with this bye law. As my noble and learned friend very properly observed, we cannot take any notice of the record, for there is no exception to it. It is the practice of the Court not to go into the whole record, but to decide upon the points raised by the bill of exceptions; but that is not very material, because the statute clearly applies only to the first election, and not to what might be done after the first election is over. The legislature saw that it was likely that great mischief might arise if some mode was not found to prevent any improper persons from interfering at the wardmote. The words of the statute applied distinctly to the wardmote, and the statute being intended to regulate the first election, it said that none shall interfere but persons duly [25] qualified, according to the terms of that act; and the wardmote having elected a person whom the court of lord mayor and aldermen did not think a proper person to be elected, the lord mayor and aldermen interfere upon that. Under this bye law the matter is entirely in the hands of the lord mayor and aldermen.

It appears to me that that point is perfectly clear, and that what they have done with respect to the rejection of one candidate, and the election of another candidate,—these elections having taken place of a person whom the lord mayor and aldermen did not consider a proper person to fill the office,—is perfectly justified in law. For these reasons I entirely concur in the motion made by my noble and learned friend.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, I entirely concur in the course proposed to your Lordships. It can never be said that because your Lordships have thought fit to call in the assistance of the learned judges the course of proceeding should be different if your Lordships on hearing one side feel no doubt, and there is no question to be referred to the learned judges. It does so happen that we have the opportunity of ascertaining on the present occasion, that all the learned judges, and all your Lordships here present, are of one opinion upon the subject of the present case, and therefore it would be extremely imprudent to occupy further time upon the consideration of the subject, when the statement of the plaintiff in error has not created any doubt in the minds of any of your Lordships.

[26] My Lords, with reference to the construction of the act, it appears to me abundantly clear, that the seventh section was not addressed to any thing like the present case; it was to regulate the right of original election, leaving to be decided by the existing custom what was to be done with the party so elected. The question is, what power there is in the court of aldermen to deal with an election by the wardmote; and the seventh section, being confined as it is to the original election, does not touch any right which may exist elsewhere of controlling the admission of the person to be invested with the office of alderman.

With regard to the rejection of the evidence of fitness, in the present stage of the case, in the view that your Lordships take of it at all events,—that is utterly immaterial, this custom being found to exist, and your Lordships being of opinion that it is a legal custom, and that the court of aldermen have the power contended for, the eligibility of the party being a matter entirely in their discretion, and subject to their judgment; the opinion of the jury with respect to his fitness could never be material; for these reasons I entirely concur in the opinions expressed by my noble and learned friends, that the judgment of your Lordships should be for the defendant in error.

Mr. Attorney General.—My Lords, I move for costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the judgment given in the said Court of Exchequer Chamber for the said defendant, affirming a judgment of the said Court of King's Bench, be, and the same is hereby affirmed; [27] and that the record be remitted, to the end execution may be had thereupon as if no such writ of error had been brought into this House: And it is further ordered, That the said plaintiff in error do pay or cause to be paid to the said defendant the costs incurred in respect of the said writ of error, the amount thereof to be certified by the clerk assistant.

[28] APPEAL FROM COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

JAMES FARQUHAR GORDON and Others, the Trustees and Executors of DAVID CLYNE,* Appellants.—Tinney—James Russell; GEORGE DUNNET, JAMES TRAILL, and DAVID HENDERSON, Respondents.—Burge—John Stuart [25th February 1839].

[Mews' Dig. iv. 859; S.C. 11 Shaw 791. See National Bank of Scotland v. Forbes, 1858, 21 Dunlop 83; Fleming v. North of Scotland Banking Co., 1881, 9 Rettie 13, 14.]

Arrestment—Assignment—Right in Security—Proof.—A party held an intimated assignation, as a security for certain specified debts and relief of specific obligations; another party, creditor of the granter of the assignation, used arrestments in the hands of the assignee, and of the debtor in the assigned debt. Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that the assignee, in accounting with the arrester, was entitled to take credit, in the first place, for the amount of the debts and obligations specified in the assignation, and all expenses relating thereto; secondly, for all sums paid to or for behoof of and for all furnishings made by him to the common debtor prior to the arrestment; and, thirdly, for all sums which, though paid for behoof of the common debtor after the date of the arrestment, were paid in virtue of obligations contracted prior thereto: Held further (affirming as aforesaid) that it was competent for the assignee to prove by the oath of the common debtor that his claims fell under one or other of the above descriptions.

Costs.—Per L. C. Incompetent to appeal for costs, and it is indispensably necessary to maintain the rule, that parties appealing should not be permitted to mix up their appeal with matter of merits in order to cover an appeal for costs.

[29] Practice.—Question, whether when appealing against a judgment of the Court, it is competent to include in the appeal interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary in the cause, not previously made the subject of a reclaiming note.

The late Mr. David Clyne raised an action against a person named Fraser for payment of money alleged to be due, and on the dependence thereof he used arrestments in the hands of the respondent Dunnet, and of the respondents Traill and Henderson respectively. The respondent Traill was trustee of a Colonel Williamson, from whose estate Fraser was entitled to receive dividends; the respondent Henderson was factor for the trust. Prior to the arrestment Fraser had assigned his claims upon Colonel Williamson's estate to the house of M'Beath and Dunnet, of whom the other respondent was the surviving partner, in security of certain advances and furnishings made to him. The assignation was granted 23d April 1823; a dividend of 10s. in the pound was paid 22d July 1824. Clyne's arrestments were in May 1825, and he obtained decree in his action against Fraser in June thereafter. A further dividend of 5s. in the pound was paid in January 1830. In April 1830 Clyne brought an action of furthcoming against the respondents, in which he claimed the balance due to Fraser by Williamson's trustees, after paying the advances and furnishings specified in the assignation. The respondent Dunnet contended that he was not bound to make forthcoming funds not in his hands at the date of the arrestment; and further, that he was entitled to apply funds received by him under the assignation to advances made on the faith thereof, though these advances were not referred to in the assignation. The other respondents contended, [30] that as Fraser was entirely dived by the assignation the action was improperly directed against them.

On the 1st December 1832 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Appoints the defender Dunnet to put in a statement of the account between him and Fraser, showing the balance that was due, first, at the period of the first dividend; secondly, at the date of the arrestment; and, thirdly, at the date of the second dividend, etc." That dividend was received at a period subsequent to the arrestment.

A state was accordingly lodged by Dunnet, and after objections and answers with which avizandum was made, the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor on the 9th March 1833, in the following terms:—"Finds, that in the accounting between George Dunnet as arrestee, and David Clyne, the former is entitled to take credit, in the first place, for the amount of the debts and obligations in security and relief of which the assignation to him by Fraser the common debtor was granted, and all the expenses relating to these debts and obligations; secondly, for all sums paid to or for behoof of, and for all furnishings made, to the common debtor, prior to Mr. Clyne's arrestment in 1825; and, thirdly, for all sums which, though paid for behoof of Fraser the common debtor, after the date of the said arrestment, were paid in virtue of obligations contracted prior to said date; but finds that Mr. Dunnet the arrestee is not entitled to credit for any advances or furnishings made to the common debtor subsequent to the date of the said arrestment, and not falling within the preceding finding: Finds, that Mr. Clyne is, in virtue of his arrestment in the [31] hands of Mr. Dunnet, entitled to any balance which, on the application of the principles above laid down, may be found to remain in the hands of the said arrestee, but only on the condition of relieving Mr. Dunnet of the bond of caution granted by him in the loosing of arrestment on the dependence of the action of William Sutherland against Fraser, the common debtor, being one of the obligations still outstanding in relief of which the assignation was granted: Finds farther, that Mr. Clyne is, on the performance of the above-mentioned condition to Mr. Dunnet, entitled, in virtue of his arrestment in the hands of the other defenders, Colonel Williamson's trustees, entitled to draw any balance which may remain due by the said trustees to Fraser the common debtor, in so far as necessary for payment of the debt due by the common debtor to the arrestor: Lastly, in respect that Messrs. Clyne and Dunnet differ in regard to the amount of the advances or furnishings actually made to or for behoof of the common debtor, remits the case to Mr. Donald Lindsay, accountant, to examine the accounts, and to report upon the balance which may be due by Mr. Dunnet agreeably to the preceding findings."

Two of the parties, viz. the pursuer Mr. Clyne, and the respondents, Colonel Williamson's trustees, presented reclaiming notes against this judgment to the First Division of the Court; Mr. Clyne praying for certain alterations on the judgment, which would increase the balance subject to his arrestment, and Colonel Williamson's trustees praying to be assoilzied from the action, and to be found entitled to expenses.

These reclaiming notes were advised on the 27th of [32] June 1833, when the following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having advised this cause with the mutual reclaiming notes, and heard counsel, adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, refuse the desire of both the reclaiming notes, and reserve all questions of expenses till the final issue of the cause."

In November 1833 Mr. Clyne died, and the appellants, as trustees under his settlements, sisted themselves as parties in the action, and got the remit to the accountant renewed, who thereupon made a report, showing a balance due by Mr. Dunnet after applying the dividends received on the principles of the preceding interlocutor. There being a defect of proof of some of the items allowed, Dunnet proposed to refer to the oath of Fraser, which having been allowed by the Lord Ordinary, the appellant reclaimed. The Court, after an amendment of the minute of reference, also sustained the reference.

On the 31st of January 1837 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor with reference to the question between the appellants and the respondent Dunnet:—"Finds it proved by the oath of Fraser the common debtor, that the advances of cash and furnishings set forth in the accountant's report do fall under one or other of the descriptions in the interlocutor of the 9th of March 1833, with the exceptions, first, of the sum of 10s., being the additional articles of the account of furnishings ending in 1823; secondly, of the sum of £2 7s., consisting of cash advances, said to have been made by Mr. Dunnet to Mr. Fraser; and, thirdly, the sum of £10 15s. 3d., being the business account [33] alleged to have been paid in August 1824 by Dunnet to Robert M'Kay on account of Fraser the common debtor: Finds, that these three sums are not proved, by the common debtor's oath, to fall under either of the descriptions mentioned in the foresaid interlocutor, and therefore, to the extent of those three sums, sustains the objections to the accountant's report; quoad ultra, approves of the report: Finds, accordingly, that the balance now in the hands of the defender Dunnet amounts to the sum of £40 14s. sterling, with interest from the 1st day of January 1830, and decerns against the said George Dunnet the arrestee for the same, superseding extract of the said decree until the pursuer shall have relieved the said arrestee, in terms of the interlocutor of the 9th of March 1833, of the bond of caution granted by him, in the loosing of arrestment, on the dependence of the action of William Sutherland against Fraser the common debtor: Finds the defender the said George Dunnet entitled to his expenses, and allows an account thereof to be given in, and to be taxed by the auditor.

Note.—It is with some hesitation that the Lord Ordinary has ultimately formed the opinion that the articles contained in the exceptions in the above interlocutor are not sufficiently proved. Looking at the whole tenor of the deposition, it appears to him that the failure of the defender, even in those points, is mainly imputable to the very natural uncertainty of the common debtor's recollections as to the precise dates at which the alleged transactions took place. Considering, however, that the defender, the arrestee, has been substantially successful in all the important [34] points of the case, and that a very great, and, as it appears to the Lord Ordinary, unnecessary expense has been created by the very critical mode of accounting, insisted in with so much pertinacity by the pursuer, the Lord Ordinary thinks that in justice to the defender he must be allowed his expenses."

On the 1st February 1837 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor with reference to the question between the appellants and the respondents, Colonel Williamson's trustees:—"Finds the pursuers entitled, under their arrestments, to any future dividend that may be declared and become payable to the common debtor by the said defenders in their character of trustees, with any interest that may become due thereupon, and that to the extent only, and in extinction pro tanto, of the debt due to the said pursuers; they, always before extract, relieving the other arrestee of his cautionary obligation, in terms of the separate interlocutor of yesterday's date: Finds no expenses due to either party, and decerns to the above effect accordingly.

Note.—In this case both parties have carried their pleas too far; the pursuer in maintaining that the assignation in favour of Dunnet was of no effect whatever in divesting the defenders, the arrestees; and the defenders in contending that the assignation, though confessedly only an assignation in security, totally and absolutely divested them, without any regard to the question whether the debt secured by it had been paid or not, a point which has already been decided against the arrestees by the interlocutor [35] of 9th March 1833. In these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary thinks that neither party is entitled to expenses."

The appellants reclaimed against these interlocutors, praying the Court to alter the interlocutor of the 31st of January in the question with Mr. Dunnet, in so far as it found Mr. Dunnet entitled to expenses, and to find him liable in the expenses of process; and also to alter the interlocutor of the 1st of February in the question with Colonel Williamson's trustees, in so far as it found no expenses due to either party, and to find Colonel Williamson's trustees liable in expenses.

Colonel Williamson's trustees also reclaimed against the interlocutor of the 1st of February, praying the Court to alter it, in so far as regarded expenses, and to find that they were entitled to their expenses.

On the 30th June 1837 the Court, on advising these reclaiming notes, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it finds George Dunnet entitled to his expenses, and refuse the desire of this reclaiming note on that point; of new, find expenses due to the said George Dunnet, and remit the account thereof, when lodged, to the auditor of Court, to tax and report; adhere also to the said interlocutor, in so far as regards the question with Colonel Williamson's trustees, and refuse the desire of both reclaiming notes on that part of the cause."

Against this judgment the appellants brought their appeal, and also against all the interlocutors pronounced in the cause, being eleven in number.

[36] Appellants.—An arrester is entitled to have the funds arrested made forthcoming to him by the arrestee, unless the arrestee shall establish a lien over them, or produce evidence that they are attached by diligence preferable to the arrester's diligence.

The oath of Fraser was inadmissible to prove the items of account not otherwise established. In the first place there was evident collusion between Dunnet and Fraser, and in the second place the account was not liquid before the arrestments were used. In the ordinary case the arrestee, in a process of forthcoming, may refer his defence to the oath of the common debtor; but where there is collusion, or when a debt, of which compensation or retention is pleaded, was not liquid before the arrestment was used, the oath of the common debtor cannot affect the claim of the arrester.

The firm of M'Beath and Dunnet, who were the original assignees of the common debtor Fraser, and Mr. Dunnet as the surviving partner of that company, were not entitled to apply or hold the funds assigned in security for any other purposes than the purposes specified in the assignation; neither can it be contended that the respondent Mr. Dunnet, as an individual, had any right to apply or hold the funds assigned to M'Beath and Dunnet in security, nor any title to a preference over these funds, in competition with Mr. Clyne's arrestment.

As the appellants have succeeded, in a process of forthcoming, in proving the existence of a fund which was denied by the arrestees, they ought to have been found entitled to expenses; and they ought not at any rate to have been found liable in expenses to the respondent Mr. Dunnet, who, as an arrestee, maintained, [37] contrary to the fact, that he held no funds which he was bound to make forthcoming. The appellants only asked for that which they could not have obtained without a suit; that part of the interlocutor which gave costs cannot be maintained (Ersk. b. iii. tit. 6, sec. 2, 11, 15; 2 Bell's Comm. 66; 2 Bell's Comm. 637, 638; Wardrop, Feb. 1744; Dict. 1025; Stair, b. iii. tit. 1, sec. 42, b. iv. tit. 35, sec. 6; Creditors of Menie v. Bloomfield, Dec. 7, 1736, Elch. voce Arrestment). The recent case of Smellie v. Miller before the Appeal Committee is a clear decision in support of this appeal.

Respondent Dunnet.—As this respondent could not be bound to make forthcoming any funds of the arrestee which have never come into his possession, and for which he never was liable to the common debtor, he is not chargeable in this accounting with any other sums than the two dividends which he, as assignee of the common debtor, received from Colonel Williamson's trustees, and in accounting for the sums actually received by him on account of the common debtor, he is entitled to credit for the debts and obligations in security and relief of which the assignation by the common debtor was expressly granted, and for all expenses incurred by the respondent in reference to these debts and obligations. Besides this, he is further entitled to credit for all advances and furnishings by him to or for behoof of the common debtor prior to Mr. Clyne's arrestment in 1825, and for all sums which, though paid for behoof of Fraser the common debtor after the date of the said arrestment, were paid in virtue of obligations contracted prior to that date. And the respondent was entitled to prove, as he in fact did, [38] such payments and furnishings by the oath of Fraser the common debtor.

The real question in the cause is as to the costs.

The interlocutor of 1837 adopts the report of the Lord Ordinary, and the principles laid down by him; and it is not competent to reverse that part of the interlocutor of 1837 against which no reclaiming note has been presented without infringing the express provisions of the statute 48 Geo. 3, cap. 151, sect. 15 (Ersk. b. iii. tit. 6, sec. 16; Forbes, 20 Feb. 1711, Horn, Dict. 12464; Kames, 62; Nairn, 1725, Dict. 12468; Maitland, Gibson, and others v. Wills, 2 Dec. 1826, 5 S. and D. 74; Ersk. b. iv. tit. 2, sec. 8; Blair v. Balfour, 9 July, 1745; Dict. 12473; Hogg v. Low, 13th June, 1826, 4 S. and D. 702).

Respondents Traill and Henderson.—As the appellants did not think proper to take the judgment of the Inner House upon the propriety of paying the second dividend from Colonel Williamson's estate to the other respondent Mr. Dunnet, it is not competent to bring that part of the case under appeal. By the 48th Geo. 3 cap. 151, sect. 15, which is an act concerning the administration of justice in Scotland, and concerning appeals to the House of Lords, it is enacted, "that hereafter no appeal to the House of Lords shall be allowed from interlocutory judgments, but such appeals shall be allowed only from judgments or decrees on the whole merits of the cause, except with the leave of the Division of the judges pronouncing such interlocutory judgments, or except in cases where there is a difference of opinion among the judges of the said Division; nor [39] shall any appeal to the House of Lords be allowed from interlocutors or decrees of Lords Ordinary which have not been reviewed by the judges sitting in the Division to which such Lords Ordinary belong."

By their reclaiming note the appellants confined their application to the Court to an alteration on the question of costs, and as this House never entertains an appeal in regard to costs alone, the present appeal must be dismissed as incompetent. The case of Smellie v. Miller never having been actually before this House, cannot be relied upon or used as an authority (Jeffrey v. Brown, 2 Shaw's App. Cases, 356; Tod v. Tod, 26th March, 1827, 2 Wilson and Shaw, 549; Hunter v. Duff, 11th August, 1832, 1 Wilson and Courtenay, 212; M'Aulay v. Adam and Brown, 17th May, 1835, 1 Shaw and Maclean, 665).

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, there are some points which have been addressed to your Lordships in the course of this discussion which are points of form; and your Lordships have also heard the merits of the case discussed. The first point, namely, of form, is, how far this case falls within the provision which prohibits parties from coming to your Lordships upon interlocutors which have not been the subject of a reclaiming note to either of the Divisions of the Court of Session, namely, appeals from the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary only.

A case has been referred to as deciding that point, namely, the case of Smellie v. Miller. In the view I take of the present case it will be unnecessary for me to come to any conclusion upon that point; the only [40] object of my referring to it at all is, that there may be no misconception as to the case that has been referred to. My Lords, the case of Smellie v. Miller was a petition which was disposed of by the Committee of Appeal, not by your Lordships House, and therefore can go no further than the individual opinions of such of your Lordships as happened to be present upon the Committee of Appeal; but what was done upon that petition your Lordships will see in a moment does not proceed upon the ground for which it has been cited at your Lordships' bar. There were two interlocutors appealed from. The objection to the appeal as to one was, that it was an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; the objection raised to the other was as to matter which had been gone into by a Division of the Court of Session by a reclaiming note. I have no recollection of the case, or of the grounds on which it was disposed of; but it is clear that as there were two points raised, it could not have been decided in favour of the petitioner, and the appeal dismissed, unless the committee had been in favour of the case stated by the petitioner on both points. This question of form will have to be considered if it should ever be brought before your Lordships in a case in which it is necessary to come to a decision upon it. It does not appear to me to be necessary to enter into the discussion of that question now, being very distinctly of opinion that your Lordships will find quite sufficient upon the merits of the case to dispose of the appeal now before you, which merits may be very shortly stated.

A gentleman of the name of Fraser being entitled to receive certain sums of money from the trustees [41] of Colonel Williamson, and having transactions with the firm of which the respondent Dunnet is now the surviving partner, assigned his interest in those sums of money—his right to receive those sums—to the firm of which Dunnet is now the surviving partner, for the purpose of indemnifying them against certain obligations which they had come under for his, Fraser's, benefit, and which obligations are specified in the deed of assignment. It appears that a dividend of ten shillings in the pound was received by the house of which Dunnet is the surviving partner, and it appears that the house being in possession of this security, and therefore necessarily looking to receive these monies on account of Fraser, made certain advances in money to him, and furnished him with articles which he required, which raised a private debt as between the house and Fraser. After the first dividend of ten shillings in the pound had been paid to Dunnet, there being a further dividend expected to be received from Williamson's estate, the present appellant, that is, the person who is now represented in the present appeal, namely, Mr. Clyne, having also a demand against Fraser, arrests in the hands of Dunnet such monies as he might have belonging to Fraser, that is to say, such money as he otherwise would have to pay to Fraser, subject of course to all such demands as the house now represented by Dunnet would have against Fraser, because it cannot for a moment be contended that the party making the arrestment or arresting the fund could put the arrestee in a worse situation than he would have been in as against the party to whom he was bound to account. Whatever rights Dunnet had against Fraser he necessarily had [42] against Clyne, who could only claim from Dunnet that which Dunnet would otherwise be bound to pay to Fraser.

This case came before the Lord Ordinary in the first instance, and the first interlocutor was pronounced on the 1st of December 1832; and by that interlocutor the Lord Ordinary appoints the defender Dunnet to put in a statement of the account between him and Fraser, showing, first, the balance that was due at the period of the first dividend; secondly, at the date of the arrestment; and, thirdly, at the period of the second dividend, the second dividend having been received at a period subsequent to the arrestment. The interlocutor of the 9th March 1833, which was made the subject of a reclaiming note by Mr. Clyne, was adhered to by the Court of Session; and this forms the foundation of all that followed; it establishes the right as between the parties; and what has afterwards taken place merely are the means by which that right is worked out. That interlocutor finds, first, "that in the accounting between George Dunnet as arrestee, and David Clyne, the former is entitled to take credit, in the first place, for the amount of the debts and obligations in security and relief of which the assignation to him by Fraser the common debtor was granted, and all the expenses relating to these debts and obligations;" that was secured and conditioned in the deed by which the debt was assigned to them; the second point is now made a subject of contest, being for all sums paid to or for behoof of and for all furnishings made to the common debtor prior to Mr. Clyne's arrestment in 1825; and, thirdly, for all sums which, though paid for behoof of Fraser the [43] common debtor after the date of the said arrestment, were paid in virtue of obligations contracted prior to the said date. The interlocutor further finds that Mr. Dunnet the arrestee is not entitled to credit for any advances or furnishings made to the common debtor subsequent to the date of the said arrestment, and not falling within the preceding finding. The result, therefore, is, that the interlocutor of the year 1833 declared that, as between the party arresting, namely, Mr. Clyne, and the arrestee Dunnet, in taking the account for the purpose of ascertaining upon what sum that arrestment ought to operate, Dunnet was entitled to deduct not only the particular sums specified in the assignation under which he claimed, but that he was also entitled to deduct all sums furnished by him,—sums paid, or furnishings, as they are called, to Fraser at the time when the arrestment was made; and that he was also entitled to set off against what might be found in his hands due to Fraser such sums as were paid subsequently, provided they appeared to have been paid by virtue of obligations entered into prior to the time at which the arrestment took place.

The only question, supposing this to be open now for your Lordships' consideration—and I am anxious to show the parties that the decision of your Lordships' House, if your Lordships agree with me in the opinion which I have formed, does not proceed upon matter of form, but that your Lordships have the facts so far before you, that if there were no objection in point of form, the decision to which your Lordships would come would be precisely the same—the question is, whether Fraser as against Dunnet could either have stopped the [44] second dividend in the hands of the trustees of Williamson, or have compelled Dunnet to pay over to him, Fraser, monies which he had actually received, leaving Dunnet to obtain payment as he could of monies paid or furnishings supplied to Fraser anterior to the period of the arrestment, or subsequently, in consequence of obligations entered into before the arrestment. That no such law can exist in Scotland is manifest, not only from some of the authorities which have been referred to, but from the nature of things, because it is not a matter of set off; but here is a fund put into the hands of a certain party, and the person whose funds are so put into his hands induces him to advance monies, which, whether the subject of any special contract or not, are obviously advanced upon the credit which he is furnished with by means of the assignation, which puts into the hands of the party paying, funds belonging to the party to whom the monies are advanced, and which funds are to be accountable for that advancement of money. It might as well be said that a banker to whom monies or securities are given, nothing special being said upon the subject, can have these securities taken out of his hands without paying him the balance found due upon the money transactions between the parties. It does not, however, rest upon that, because Fraser himself is examined, (I shall presently consider how far that examination is correct, looking at the state of the pleadings between the parties,) and Fraser says that it was a matter of arrangement between the parties,—that he drew these sums, and was supplied with the furnishings, in consequence of the credit which he was to receive on account of money coming from those trustees. It is said that that statement of Fraser [45] ought not to prejudice the question now between the parties, because it is not made a subject of pleading. It did not arise upon the pleadings. The pleadings were these;—to what extent the plaintiff was entitled to receive the balance of the account pending between Fraser and Dunnet; and accordingly it is referred to an accountant for the purpose of looking into the account, and reporting what, at the various periods stated in the first interlocutor, was the state of the account between the parties. In taking that account Dunnet claims certain sums, to which sums he is to establish his title. It may as well be said, that in proceeding for the purpose of taking the account, every item of account is the subject of a special plea. It arises necessarily in the investigation of the accounts; and in the investigation of the accounts, Dunnet, having claimed a right to retain a certain portion of the monies in his hands for the purpose of paying a certain obligation, proves his right, first by showing that he did advance the money to Fraser; and he establishes his title to it by showing that the money advanced to Fraser was upon the faith and credit of the money, of which he held an assignment. Therefore not only is there no dispute, but there is no contest raised at your Lordships' bar between the account as taken by the accountant and as acted upon; and the last interlocutor appealed from is not the subject of contest as to any item of account which it contained. A very different course of proceeding must have been adopted if it had been the intention of the appellant to appeal against particular items, but it is not attempted on the part of the appellants to bring before your Lordships a question upon the disallowance of any particular [46] item; the appeal is for a different purpose, and not for the purpose of trying the question as to disallowing any particular sum. The interlocutor of 1833 laid down the principle upon which this account was to be taken, giving to Mr. Dunnet the benefit of all sums which he could show to have been advanced to Fraser, before the date of the arrestment, or subsequently, in consequence of obligations contracted before that time.

The cause was proceeded in down to the date of the last interlocutor, which was in the month of February 1837, without any appeal being brought before your Lordships, questioning the propriety of the principle established in the decree of 1833. Interlocutors in sufficient abundance appear to have been pronounced, eleven in number, all of which are made in part or in whole the subject of the present appeal; but against the principle established by the decree in March 1833, up to the time when this petition was presented, which I understand was in July 1837, no question was brought before your Lordships as to the propriety of the principle established in that interlocutor of March 1833. The result of all this investigation has been, that at the time of the arrestment there was nothing due to Fraser; I consider it to be established beyond all controversy that there was nothing that the pursuer could claim against Dunnet, because, whether there was a small balance or not in the hands of Dunnet, whether it was £7 or £30 in the hands of Dunnet actually exceeding the amount which at that time he had advanced and paid, he had at that time come under obligations binding himself to make payments at a future day to Fraser, to an amount exceeding that [47] which he had in his hands, whether it be considered one sum or the other; and it is impossible to say that the present party, who could not stand in a better situation as against Fraser, had any right to come against Dunnet to obtain a sum of money which he had in his hands in that state of circumstances. At the time the arrestment took place there was nothing in his hands. The whole suit proceeds upon the foundation of that arrestment; and the result of that investigation has been that a certain sum amounting to £30 was at that time due from Dunnet, not however payable by him, because there was an obligation existing between himself and Fraser, which entitled him to be secured, and secured upon money in hand against the consequences which might follow upon that obligation.

My Lords, a question might be made, (but it is not necessary to consider that,) whether it was quite right to alter the security which the party had in his hands, and whether it was not giving the pursuer something more than the pursuer ought to have, an indemnity having been given in respect to which there was actual money in hand. The pursuer at least cannot complain of that; he has all that he could reasonably expect, and perhaps it might be thought that he had something more than he was strictly entitled to, but however that may be the money balance is found to be £40.

Now, up to that amount nothing is complained of; no appeal is presented to your Lordships' House. The parties from 1833 up to 1837 are proceeding upon the principle which established the right as between themselves, and now the amount of the account taken is not [48] in dispute. What is it then that has given rise to this appeal, by which in 1837 the parties complained of an interlocutor of the year 1833 in which they had acquiesced from that time until the time when the appeal was presented? They are ordered to pay the costs. Now, I have a very strong opinion, that if these costs had been otherwise disposed of your Lordships would never have heard of the appeal from the interlocutor in 1833. And concurring entirely with these opinions which have been referred to, in which it has been stated that this House will not entertain an appeal for costs, it is indispensably necessary, in order to maintain that principle, that where parties appealing for costs in substance mix up their appeal with some other matter of merits, in order to cover the appeal for costs, they should not be permitted to escape from that rule by attempting to mix the one subject matter with the other. But, my Lords, I do feel some satisfaction in having heard so much of this case as not to be compelled to advise your Lordships to dispose of it upon that technical ground, because if you look at the liabilities of the parties to costs upon the merits, it seems to me that there is no question upon it, and that the Court below have done, with regard to costs, that which the justice of the case required. Mr. Dunnet has no connexion with the present appellant Mr. Clyne; his transactions were entirely with Fraser. It is for the purpose of a benefit to Clyne that he is permitted to come upon the fund in the hands of another person, and he cannot come upon this fund to the prejudice of that other person; he cannot take money which that other person is entitled to retain, or expose him to a liability for costs to which he would [49] not have been exposed but for the intervention of a stranger.

Now, I have already said, that at the time of the arrestment he had nothing. It turns out that by means of a subsequent dividend, not by means of any thing which he had at that time, but subsequently, he had something which, whether Fraser received or Clyne, his (Dunnet's) demand being satisfied, was a matter of indifference to him. But till that moment, till his demands are satisfied, he is not in a situation to be compelled to part with his money to the one party or the other, for he has still in him a right to look to that money, or any other he may receive to secure him from any liability which he may have come under to Fraser; and it is only on the condition of relieving himself from that liability that he is entitled to retain the sum of £40. Then what has the interlocutor done with regard to costs, so far as these parties are concerned. I am looking to Dunnet only. Why, so far as these parties are concerned, it has said that Dunnet was entitled to retain this money, he being the stakeholder as between Fraser and Clyne, who was claiming as against Fraser, and he, Dunnet, being involved in litigation merely because he had in hand a fund which was, so far as regarded the surplus, payable to Fraser's creditors. The only subject of contest is with respect to this balance, which he is compelled to part with upon the performance of a certain condition. That condition never having been performed, he was never in a situation to part with it; and all that the interlocutor provides is, that he shall not be put to expense and to costs by proceedings not arising out of his own act, but arising out of the act of the pursuer, who is seeking [50] a remedy which incidentally involves him, Dunnet, as the stakeholder of the fund in question. My Lords, it appears to be quite a matter of course, and according to the justice of the case, and according to every principle by which courts regulate their proceedings as to costs, that the stakeholder should be indemnified against the expenses which the litigation had occasioned, and with which he had nothing to do beyond securing himself from the liability arising out of obligations totally independent of the party claiming, namely, Mr. Clyne.

Then, My Lords, there are parties before us here, who have much less to do with it than Dunnet, namely, the parties from whom the monies were to proceed, which Dunnet by his assignation was entitled to. These were monies that Fraser in the first instance was entitled to; Fraser's right to receive those monies had by him been assigned to Dunnet. Why are Williamson's trustees to be involved in that question? the party to whom they were bound to pay had by his assignation directed them to pay to another, and to Dunnet they had a right to pay. I do not, therefore, see why it was necessary to keep those parties before the Court; but having been brought to your Lordships' bar as respondents, it appears that they have done only that which the person to whom they owed a duty, namely, Fraser, ordered them to do; they have paid to Dunnet that which Dunnet was entitled to receive by virtue of the assignation and obligation which on their part existed at the time when this claim was first made. They have done no more, therefore, than perform the duty which was incumbent upon them; they have paid the party as between themselves that which he was entitled to [51] receive; then the appellant brings them here without any thing to ask as against them, because he does not ask for the £40 against them, but for the £40 against Dunnet, so far sanctioning the receipt by Dunnet of that which Williamson's trustees have paid. On this ground, therefore, I also think it is quite clear that the Lord Ordinary, though that is not made the subject of any complaint, has done quite right in not making the parties pay the costs. The Lord Ordinary gave neither party their costs; he seems to have found (but it is not necessary to enter into that) there was some reason which should preclude these parties from having those costs. The complaint is, that they ought to have been made to pay costs, and I think that the pursuer has very good reason to be satisfied with that, so far as regards Williamson's trustees.

The other question, as to denying those costs, is not now under your Lordships' consideration; it is quite sufficient therefore to say that the interlocutor appears to be quite right, at all events in not ordering costs.

My Lords, this exhausts all the points to which it is necessary now to advert. If your Lordships agree with me in the views that I take, your Lordships will affirm the interlocutor with costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House; and that the said interlocutors, so far as therein complained of, be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellants do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the Clerk Assistant: And it is further ordered, [52] That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

[53] APPEAL FROM COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

SIR CHARLES HALKETT, Appellant.*—Sir William Follett—H. Robertson; the TRUSTEES of the late WILLIAM NISBET and Others, Respondents.—Attorney General (Campbell)—Solicitor General (Rutherford) [28th February 1839].

Service—Entail—Teinds (Augmentation of Stipend)—Warrandice.—A. being infeft in an entailed estate, and becoming afterwards entitled to another entailed estate, devolved the first to his brother under burden of debts, for which it was afterwards brought to sale by his brother's apparent heir. Neither entail contained the statutory letters against alienation and contracting debt. Upon A.'s death, B. his son was served lawful and nearest heir of line, taillie, and provision to him, in special, in the estate last above mentioned, and was infeft therein accordingly: Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that B. was liable in an obligation of warrandice against future augmentations granted by an ancestor of A. in the first-mentioned estate.

Practice.—Additional printed cases having been lodged by permission of the Court, without objection, containing a ground of action not originally founded on; Per L. C. A Court of Appeal will not readily listen to an objection of this kind, not made in the Court below, if it appears from the whole case presented to said Court, that no injustice has been done.

In the year 1682 John Wedderburn, then of Gosford, sold to Sir John Nisbet of Dirleton the lands, lordship, [54] and barony of Innerwick, and others, with the parsonage and vicarage teinds of the same, being a part of the parsonage and vicarage teinds of the parish kirk and parish of Innerwick, which of old were part of the patrimony of the abbey of Paisley, and thereafter pertained to James Earl of Abercorn as part and pertinent of the lordship of Paisley, together with the advocacy, donation, and right of patronage of the said parish kirk and parish of Innerwick.

The deposition contains this clause: "And in regard the foresaid teinds are disposed by me for the same price that I got for the stock, therefore I bind and oblige me and my foresaids to warrant the foresaid teinds, parsonage, and vicarage of the lands and baronies above disposed from all future augmentations of ministers stipends or schoolmasters salaries, and from all annuities of teinds payable to his Majesty or his donators," etc. etc.

John Wedderburn (afterwards Sir John Wedderburn) was succeeded by his next brother Peter, afterwards Sir Peter Wedderburn, Bart., who married Dame Janet Halkett of Pitfirrane.

In September 1706 Sir Peter and Dame Janet Halkett executed mutual taillies of their respective estates of Gosford and Pitfirrane in the form of procuratories of resignation.

The entail of Lady Halkett's estate of Pitfirrane proceeded on the narrative, that it was granted "for certain onerous causes, good respects, and considerations me moving," etc.; and therefore Lady Halkett with consent of her husband, granted procuratory for resigning her estate of Pitfirrane for new infeftment to be granted to herself and husband, and [55] longest liver of them, in life-rent, and to Peter Wedderburn their eldest son in fee, and to the heirs male of his body; which failing, to the daughters or heirs female of his body successive without division; which failing, to their second and the other substitutes therein specified, under provisions and conditions,—first, of assuming and bearing the surname, title, and arms of Halkett of Pitfirrane; secondly, that the estates of Pitfirrane and Gosford should be kept separate and disjoined, or if they should coincide in one heir, provision was made for their separation in the succeeding heirs; and, thirdly, a prohibition to alter or infringe the taillie, and an irritancy in case of contravention.

By the other entail, executed in 1706, Sir Peter Wedderburn, then called Sir Peter Halkett, granted procuratory for resigning his estate of Gosford in favour of himself in life-rent, and Charles Wedderburn his second son in fee, and the heirs male of his body; whom failing, to the daughters or heirs female of his body without division; whom failing, to James Wedderburn his third lawful son, and the other substitutes therein specified. The clauses in this taillie are the same as in the taillie of Pitfirrane, mutatis mutandis.

There was a provision in the taillie of Gosford for the separation of the two estates in the following terms:—In case failing of the said Peter Wedderburn and the heirs of his body, the said estates shall happen to coincide and be united in the person of the said Charles Wedderburn, then and in that case it shall be in the option and election of the said Charles either to keep, hold, or retain his right and possession of the said estates of Gosford, in which case he shall be holden and obliged to denude himself, omni habili [56] modo, of the said estate of Pitfirrane," etc. in favour of the said "James Wedderburn and the other heirs of taillie and provision substitute to him, with and under the haill conditions and provisions contained in the foresaid taillie thereof; or otherwise it shall be leisom to the said Charles to enter to the right and possession of the said estate of Pitfirrane and others contained in the foresaid taillie thereof, in which case he shall be holden and obliged to denude himself of the said estate of Gosford and others above written contained in the present taillie, haill rents, etc., from the time of the succession foresaid, omni habili modo, in favour of the said James Wedderburn," etc. etc.

And providing that the "said Charles shall make his election of the said estate of Pitfirrane within the space above appointed, then and in that case it shall not be leisom nor lawful to him to burden and affect the said estate of Gosford, or his succession therein, with any debts or deeds to be contracted or done by him the said Charles after the right of succession to the said estate of Pitfirrane happens to devolve, viz., after the decease of the said Peter Wedderburn, the said James being always bound and obliged to free the said Charles and to disburden the estate of Pitfirrane of any debts or deeds contracted or done by the said Charles during his remaining in the right of the estate of Gosford before the right of succession to the estate of Pitfirrane be devolved on him as said is," etc.

The statutory fetters against alienation and contracting debt were not inserted in either of these entails.

In 1725 Sir Peter executed a disposition in favour [57] of Charles, proceeding on the narrative that he had thought fit, for the better preservation of their name and family, to settle Gosford on Charles, and the heirs of his body, in manner mentioned in the bond of taillie, and that he had disposed to Peter, his eldest son, his furniture, etc. at Pitfirrane, with the rents of Pitfirrane due at his death, and various other sums, for the payment of certain debts specified in the disposition; and that it was just and reasonable that he should also secure Charles in the goods, etc. after assigned "for the better enabling him to pay my debts, wherewith I have burdened him in manner after specified;" he therefore assigns to Charles and his heirs several bonds and sums, among which there was a wadset for 62,000 merks over Dirleton, besides all debts and sums of money "which pertained to Sir P. Wedderburn, my father, or John Wedderburn, my brother; it being specially provided and declared, that the said Charles Wedderburn and his foresaids, by their acceptation hereof, are and shall be burdened with, and bound and obliged to pay, my haill just and lawful debts that shall happen to be resting at the time of my decease, excepting allenarly in so far as the said Peter Halkett, my eldest son, stands bound to pay by a bond of relief granted by him to me."

Dame Janet Halkett was succeeded in 1713 by her eldest son Peter, afterwards Sir Peter, who married Lady Emilia Stuart, daughter of the Earl of Moray. A charter and infeftment were expedite upon the procuratory in the entail of Pitfirrane, in favour of the said Sir Peter Wedderburn; and thereafter Sir Peter and Lady Emilia executed a post-nuptial contract of marriage, whereby he granted procuratory for surren-[58]-dering the estate of Pitfirrane "to himself and his heirs male already procreated or to be procreated betwixt him and the said Lady Emilia Stuart and the heirs whatsoever of their bodies; whom failing, to the heirs male of the said Peter Halkett, etc.; whom failing, to the other heirs of taillie appointed to succeed by the above taillie of Pitfirrane, 1706."

Of this marriage there were three sons; viz., first Peter, second Francis, third James. Peter the eldest son being fatuous, his father, Sir Peter, executed in 1751 a new entail of his estate upon Francis his second son, and the same series of heirs, and under the same conditions as in the taillie of 1706.

Sir Peter the father was killed in America in the year 1755; and upon his death his second son then Major Francis Halkett expedite a charter and sasine of the estate of Pitfirrane in his favour, in virtue of the procuratory contained in the entail of 1751, and continued to possess the estate till his death in 1760 without issue. His youngest brother James died two years before him, in 1758, also without issue. Thus all the family of Sir Peter Halkett and Lady Emilia Stuart became extinct, except the eldest son, Sir Peter, who was fatuous.

Charles the second son of Sir Peter Wedderburn and Dame Janet Halkett his wife, succeeded to Gosford, and had two sons, John the father of the appellant, and Henry father of Lady Cumming.

Charles Wedderburn died in 1754, without having made up titles. A charter was then expedite upon the procuratory in the entail of Gosford in favour of the appellant's father John Wedderburn, afterwards Sir John Halkett, on which charter he was infeft in Gosford in [59] 1754. In the following year he sold part of the estate for £8854, and he retained possession of the remainder till the death of his cousin Major Francis Halkett of Pitfirrane in 1760. He then claimed Pitfirrane as heir under the second entail, but his succession was suspended by a decree of reduction of that entail at the instance of Sir Peter Halkett, who was cognosed, and his tutor at law.

The decree of reduction having been reversed upon appeal, and Sir Peter having died about the same period, John Wedderburn made up titles to Pitfirrane, and executed a deed of devolution of Gosford in favour of Henry, and he also conveyed to him the above mentioned wadset over Dirleton for 62,000 merks, but subject to a reserved security over said estate of Gosford, and wadset for relief of the debts attachable thereto.

Henry Wedderburn died in 1777, when the estate of Gosford was brought to judicial sale by his apparent heir Lady Cumming. John Wedderburn, then Sir John Halkett, ranked upon the estate for the debts above mentioned, and he also obtained a reconveyance of the wadset. The balance of the price of Gosford, after satisfying these debts, with interest, was carried off by a creditor of Henry.

In 1793 Sir John died, having executed a conveyance to trustees for payment of debts of his whole estate and effects, with the exception of Pitfirrane and furniture, etc., pertaining thereto; and in the following year the appellant expedite a special service, and was retoured as "Legitimus et propinquior hæres lineæ, talliæ, et provisionis speciali dicto demortuo Domino Joanni Halkett de Pitfirrane, baronetto, patri suo, in totis et [60] integris dictis terris et baronia de Pitfirrane," etc., and soon afterwards he was infeft in said estate on a precept from chancery proceeding on the said retour, and his infeftment duly recorded.

The lands of Innerwick continued in the Nisbet family without any augmentation of the stipend until the year 1790, in which year, and subsequently in 1807 and in 1813, augmentations were granted, and a portion of each was finally localised upon the lands of Innerwick in 1825. The excess of stipend having been paid by Mr. Nisbet during his life, and after his death by his daughter and heiress the respondent Mrs. Ferguson, her trustees, along with himself and husband, in 1832, raised an action of relief against the appellant under the warrandice contained in the disposition of 1682. The Lord Ordinary having made avizandum to the Lords of the Second Division, their Lordships, after allowing additional Cases, (in which there was urged for the first time without objection the reconveyance of the wadset in connexion with the deed of 1751 as a further ground of representation,) pronounced the following judgment on the 20th February 1835:—"Decern in terms of the libel as to the pursuer's (the respondent's) right of relief, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to ascertain the amount of the sums due, and to proceed as his Lordship shall deem just, and decern; but find no expenses hitherto incurred due to either party."

The appellant appealed.

Appellant.—The defence chiefly relied upon by the appellant is, that he does not represent the granter of the [61] disposition in 1682, so as to be liable in the obligation contained in it (Horne v. Sinclair, 23d Jan. 1835, 13 S., D., and B., 296). The appellant in no shape represents John Wedderburn, the granter of the obligation in 1682: he has inherited none of his property; he has made up no title as his heir; and therefore it is impossible on this ground to maintain the present claim against the appellant.

The facts are not disputed; and it is not alleged that the appellant, either at the present period or at any time, inherited or enjoyed any part of the property belonging to the Wedderburns of Gosford.

An important distinction exists between the present case and every other which has hitherto occurred in Scotland relative to relief from augmentations. There have been several such cases, in which severe and unexpected claims have been sustained under ancient obligations; as, for example, in the case of the trustees of the Earl of Aberdeen against the Trustees of Lord Belhaven (Shaw's Rep., 22d Nov. 1821), where a claim of relief was sustained in 1821 on an obligation of warrandice dated ninety years before ; and in the case of Justice against Callender (Shaw's Rep., 1st Dec. 1826), where effect was given to a similar claim at the distance of eighty years. But in these and all the other cases of the same kind which have occurred, there was property of the original obligants extant, which fell justly to be subjected for his debts and obligations, if these were onerous and effectual in law.

The present is entirely a different case ; the appellant neither is nor ever was in possession of any property of [62] the original obligant ; on the contrary, the whole of his property was carried off by legal attachments of the creditors of the heir last in possession of Gosford, upwards of fifty-two years prior to the institution of the present suit.

It has been urged by the respondents that, whatever may be the succession or inheritance of the appellant, at least his father Sir John Halkett intromitted with property and funds of the Wedderburns to a large amount ; and it was further assumed that the appellant represents his father universally, and so is liable to the same claims that his father would have been.

But the appellant denies expressly that he represents his father universally, and no sufficient evidence has been produced or referred to in order to fix such representation on the appellant ; nor have the respondents attempted to shew that the appellant on his father's death took up any property from him (Sir John), other than the lands and estate of Pitfirrane, which was destined to and tailzied upon the heir male of the family, under the deeds of tailzie and provision before specified. On the contrary, the appellant stated on the record that his father Sir John Halkett, prior to his death, "conveyed all his property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, excepting always 'the entailed estate of Pitfirrane, thereby expressly reserved from the trust' for payment of the various debts, annuities, and provisions which he became bound to pay. He also excepted the household furniture, bed and table linen, books and plate, and farm stocking of Pitfirrane, which he conveyed to the defender ; but this was under burden of his paying such balance of [63] his debts and annuities as the trust funds and estate might be insufficient to answer ; and that balance far more than absorbed the moveables assigned to the defender."

The respondents' plea is of a technical and very rigid nature ; viz., that he was served and retoured "ut legitimus et propinquior hæres lineæ, talliæ, et provisionis in speciali, dicto demortuo Domino Joanni Halkett de Pitfirrane, baronetto, patri suo, in totis et integris dictis terris et baronia de Pitfirrane," etc. It has been argued, that the terms of the retour fix indelibly on the appellant the character of universal heir and representative of his father Sir John Halkett. But if the whole scope of the instrument be carefully taken into view in connexion with the subject matter to which it refers, it will be seen that the appellant was not served as a universal representative, his service was a special service in the lands of Pitfirrane only, connecting him with the tailzie executed by his great grandmother Dame Janet Halkett, and with no other right ; it never was intended to have, and in point of fact has not, any other effect than simply to vest a title in the appellant as heir of tailzie and provision in the estate of his great grandmother Dame Janet Halkett.

The question then is this, Whether a special service as heir of line, tailzie, and provision to an ancestor in certain lands descending to heirs of tailzie where the ancestor left no property descendible to heirs of line, and where, even if he had left such property, the heir would have been bound to have made it over to trustees of the ancestor, subjected the heir so served universally to the ancestor's debts ? The appellant conceives that [64] such severe responsibility is opposed to every principle and authority in the law of Scotland (Maitland of Pitrichie, 1757, Mor. 11166 ; Blount v. Nicholson, 26th Feb. 1783, Fac. Col. 9. 159. No. 100., Mor. 9731 ; Lord Fife v. General Duff, March 1828, 6 S. and D. 698).

Respondents.—John Wedderburn, the granter of this warrandice, was succeeded by his younger brother Sir Peter Wedderburn, who in the year 1688 made up titles to him by service as his heir of line, thus unquestionably representing him in all his debts and obligations.

As heir of provision in Gosford, Charles would assuredly have been liable, supposing the warrandice to have been brought into operation during his possession, at least to the value of that estate ; and, as grantee under a general disposition with the express burden of debts, his liability must have been held to extend to all the obligations of his father ; for, whatever may be the case of an ordinary simple disposition, omnium bonorum, the insertion of a clause burdening generally with all debts must, if it be allowed any force at all, be effectual to create an universal liability. It is, in fact, a contract between the parties, whereby the receiver of the right, in consideration of the benefits which he obtains, engages to become responsible for all the grantor's debts, without limitation or restriction of any kind. It is in this manner and in this sense that the respondents maintain that Charles Wedderburn was his father's general representative, and liable for his debts and obligations.

If the liability was once clearly in Charles, by what [65]—ever title or on whatever grounds established, it is obvious that in order to transmit it against the appellant, no more can be required than to shew that he stands related, by service as heir of line, taillie, and provision, to a party who was Charles's universal representative.

Now the intermediate person who formed this link of connexion was Sir John Halkett the father of the appellant, and who was Charles's eldest son, and made up titles by a general service to him as heir of line, taillie, and provision, thereby at once establishing in his person a right to the unexecuted procuratory in the settlement of 1706, upon which he obtained a charter and was infeft, and at the same time fixing upon himself the character of his father's universal representative. In this way he not only became liable, as Charles's heir of line, for all the debts which he had contracted, but, by taking directly as heir of provision of his grandfather Sir Peter under the investiture of Gosford, he incurred a clear representation of that party also, and a consequent liability for all his debts and obligations ; and thus, when he succeeded to Pitfirrane he united in himself every ground of representation, whether derived through the line of the eldest or of the second son of Sir Peter and Lady Halkett. He died in the year 1793, and was succeeded by his son Sir Charles, the present appellant, who made up titles to him by special service as nearest and lawful heir of line, taillie, and provision ; and the only question that remains in this case is, whether Sir Charles thereby represents his father to the effect of being liable in this obligation. He took Pitfirrane as his father's heir of taillie and provision, a character in [66] which it seems impossible to deny that he represents him, and is answerable for all his debts and obligations, from whatever source derived, at least to the value of the succession. There is no proposition more absolutely fixed in the law of Scotland, than that an heir of provision under any settlement short of a strict entail, is liable to that extent. But it is not contended that the settlement under which Pitfirrane has descended to the defender is at all of the nature of a strict entail ; it is, in reality, a simple destination, not containing any of the usual prohibitions against selling and contracting debt ; and this is most material in a question of representation. Sir John Halkett's creditors might have carried off the estate by diligence, or he might have charged it with his debts, or sold the whole of it, without risk of challenge from any of the substitutes ; and shall it be said that, because, instead of allowing it to be affected in any of these ways, he has chosen to transmit it entire to his son, it is no longer to be liable in that son's person for any of the father's debts or obligations ? The debts of the ancestor, so long as they remain undischarged, must be burdens upon his successors and the estate which they inherit ; and it matters not in what way these debts may have originated,—whether in the act and deed of the last predecessor himself, or of some remote party, a stranger, possibly, in blood to him, but with whom he is connected by a progress of titles through intermediate heirs ; and the only point to be looked to in a question with a creditor is, whether it was truly an obligation on the predecessor or no. If that point be fixed, the liability which attached to him is transferred to his heir, and the estate, if not protected by the sanctions [67] of a strict entail, must be answerable for the debt to the last farthing of its value. Upon these facts, and under these circumstances, the respondents contend, that, as heir of line and intromitter with the moveable estate, Sir Charles represents his father universally ; and even as heir of provision in the estate of Pitfirrane he is liable to the full value of the succession (Stair, b. i. tit. 7 sec. 13 ; Gordon v. Maitland of Pitrichie, 1st Dec. 1757, Fac. Col. 2. 101. No. 63, Mor. 11161 ; Blount v. Nicolson, 26th Feb. 1783, Fac. Col. 9. 159. No. 100., Mor. 9731).

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, the only point in this case which requires particular observation is, whether the appellant Sir Charles Halkett is liable to the obligation of warrandice entered into by Sir John Wedderburn in 1688; for of the respondent's title under it there does not appear to be any doubt, notwithstanding the defences which were set up against their claim.

Sir Peter Wedderburn, the brother of Sir John, was served heir to him as heir of line; he therefore, by the law of Scotland, was clearly liable to all the obligations of Sir John, and amongst others to the warrandice in question without regard to the value of the property he inherited. Sir Peter settled the estate of Gosford upon his second son Charles; another estate, Pitfirrane, the property of his wife, being settled upon his eldest son. He also settled other property, including a wadset right to 62,000 merks Scots, which had remained unpaid of the purchase money upon the sale of the estate as to which the warrandice had been given, upon his son Charles, upon condition of Charles taking upon himself the payment of all his debts. Charles, upon Sir Peter's [68] death, entered into possession of and enjoyed the Gosford estate and the other property, including the wadset, till his death, but did not make up titles to the estate. Upon his death in 1754 his son John made up his title by a general service to him as nearest heir male of line, of taillie, and provision, and succeeded to the estate of Gosford and the other property settled, whereby he became heir of provision to his grandfather the entailer, and universal representative of his father Charles. He afterwards sold part of the estate to Lord Elibank for £8855.

At a subsequent period, namely in 1770, Sir John was infeft in the lands of Pitfirrane, which had been enjoyed by the sons of the eldest son of Sir Peter Wedderburn. Both estates being thus united in Sir John Wedderburn, he surrendered Gosford to his younger brother Henry, and assigned to him the wadset for 62,000 merks. He took upon himself all the obligations to which Sir John was subject, as had been provided for in the original settlement of Gosford. Upon the subsequent bankruptcy of Henry £17,205 was claimed and allowed to Sir John on that account, and the wadset was again assigned to him in part satisfaction of that sum.

This state of circumstances seems to leave no doubt of the liability of Sir John the defender's father to the obligation in question. Upon his death the defender was served heir of line, taillie, and provision to his father, and succeeded to Pitfirrane and the other property, which imposed upon him the liability to all the obligations to which his father had been subject, and amongst them to the charge in question, although the event which has occasioned the demand had not then [69] occurred. The estate of Pitfirrane, to which the defender succeeded, though subject to a destination, was not secured against a sale or the contracting of debts by the party entitled.

It was contended that the judges below were not justified in founding their judgment upon these circumstances, inasmuch as it was not properly put in issue that Charles the son of Sir Peter had taken upon himself his father's debts, or that Sir John, upon the sale of Gosford, received part of the proceeds, and that the deed of the 27th of October 1725 was not in issue. This objection, it was said, was not relied upon below; and it appears, in the case laid before this House on the part of the appellant, that, upon the production of the documents relied upon to prove these facts, permission was given to both parties to add to these cases, and the appellants accordingly prepared an additional case with reference to those documents, in which the objection to their admissibility upon the ground of their not being in issue does not appear. A Court of Appeal will not readily listen to an objection of this kind which was not made in the Court below, and in a case in which it appears that no injustice has been done, both parties having had and having availed themselves of the opportunity of discussing the facts alleged not to be regularly in issue.

It is true the ground upon which the defendant's liability is now contended for differs materially from the grounds insisted upon by the pleas in law, inasmuch as the documents produced in the progress of the cause, and which form the substance of the additional cases, shew that Charles the son of Sir Peter, when he took the [70] Gosford estate, took also the wadset and other property, and by the acceptation thereof he and his heirs and assigns whatsoever became burdened with and bound and obliged to pay all the debts whatsoever of Sir Peter which might happen to be existing at the time of his decease; for such are the words of the disposition and assignation of 27th October 1725. The debts and obligations of Sir Peter, of which the warrandice in question is one, became the debts and obligations of Charles, and Sir John the son of Charles was his heir, and made up his titles as heir of line and provision to him, and the defender was son and heir to his father, and made up his title as heir of line to him. So that if the obligations in question became the debt of Charles, the liability of John his son and heir, and the defender his son and heir so claiming titulo universalis, seems sufficiently clear.

It is however to be observed that these additional facts are no more than additional evidence to prove the representation upon which the pursuer founded his original claim, and that if they are to be considered as raising a new ground of claim, they were by leave of the Court made the subject of additional cases on each side; and although the fact of their not being in issue is stated in the additional case of the appellants, no objection appears to have been raised or relied upon below upon that ground, but each party having exhausted their observations and arguments upon those additional documents, the judgment of the Court was taken upon the whole case. Under these circumstances I cannot suppose that your Lordships will think it right to give any weight to this objection; but, if [71] satisfied of the liability of the defender upon the whole of the case, that your Lordships will think it right to affirm the interlocutor appealed against, with costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House; and that the said interlocutor, so far as therein complained of, be and the same is hereby affirmed, with costs.

[72] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

JAMES FARQUHAR GORDON and Others, Trustees and Executors of the deceased DAVID CLYNE, Appellants.—Tinney—James Russell; DAVID CLYNE (poor), Respondent,*—A. Haldane [18th March 1839].

[Mews' Dig. i. 350, 431; xi. 115. S.C. 6 C. and F. 539. As to pauper appeals to the House of Lords, see Annual Practice, 1901, Vol. II. 660; as to non-appearance of parties, see Sherburne v. Middleton, 1842, 9 Cl. and F. 72; and as to costs, St. O.H.L. 10 and Manchester, etc., Ry. Co. v. Doncaster (1897), 1 Q.B. 117.]

Death-bed.—A party, in the event of his predecease, made a conveyance to his parents and the survivor, whom failing, to any persons whom he might name, whom failing, any person they might name. His parents predeceased him, leaving a trust conveyance of their whole property in favour of trustees named. He thereafter executed a deed on death-bed, conveying his whole estate to trustees named, declaring the purposes, and revoking all former settlements so far as they interfered therewith.—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that the first deed, neither singly, nor taken in connection with the second deed, was effectual to disinherit the heir, and that the death-bed deed could not be coupled with the first, or with the first and second deeds, so as to exclude a challenge of it by the heir.

Practice.—In a reduction the defender pleaded certain pleas, which he designated preliminary. A record was ordered to be made up on these pleas, upon which the defender reclaimed, when the Court (on the ground that the defences pleaded as preliminary were the only defences pleadable in causa upon which it might be necessary to make up a record) adhered. The record was then prepared, and the defender repeated his former pleas, but without again designating them as preliminary. The Lord Ordinary "repelled the dilatory defences," [73] reserving a question arising out of these pleas to be discussed with the defences on the merits, and found expenses due. On reclaiming, the Court adhered. Held, that an appeal against the judgment was competent without leave of the Court.

Execution Pending Appeal.—Incompetent to appeal against a warrant of the * 15 D., B., and M., 911.

Court of Session for interim execution and payment of costs, so as to stay execution of such order as has been thereon made.

Pauper—Costs.—No objection to a warrant for interim execution that a printed copy of the petition has not been laid before each of the Judges, nor is it an objection to such warrant for payment of costs, that the party obtaining the warrant has sued in forma pauperis, and that his own agent alone signed the bond of caution.

Pauper.—A respondent suing in forma pauperis, allowed to be heard on presenting his printed cases at the bar, but costs refused him on that account, although there were otherwise sufficient grounds for awarding them in his favour.

On the 22d of August 1815 the late Mr. David Clyne, S.S.C., executed a disposition whereby, in the event of his predeceasing his parents without leaving lawful heirs of his body, he gave, etc. etc., to and in favour of William Clyne his father and Margaret Swanson his mother, "during their mutual lives, and the longest liver of them two; and after the death of the longest liver, to and in favour of any person or persons, or for such uses, ends, and purposes, as I (Mr. Clyne) may name and appoint by any deed I may execute at any time of my life, and even on death-bed; and in case of my dying without having executed such deed, then to and in favour of such person or persons as shall be named and appointed in any deed that shall be executed (according to law or agreement [74] between themselves in such deed) by my said parents, and for the same uses, ends, and purposes, with the same powers, and under the same provisions and declarations; which deed of theirs, when so executed, I do hereby declare shall form a part hereof, and that this my deed shall be as effectual for conveying my whole means and estate, and regulating the succession to the same, in the same way and manner as shall be appointed by the said deed of my parents as if their said deed were already executed and herein copied verbatim, any law or practice to the contrary notwithstanding." The deed then proceeds to convey his whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wherever situated, and of whatever description, which then belonged, or which might belong to him at the time of his death; and he farther appointed them (his parents) and the foresaid persons to be named by himself, and failing such nomination, the persons to be named by his parents in their deed, his sole executors and intromitters; and containing other usual clauses, with a reservation of full power, at any time of his life, to revoke, alter, or innovate, in whole or in part, as he might think fit, and in so far as not altered or revoked should be valid and effectual, and dispensing with the delivery.

On the 13th September 1815 Mr. Clyne's father and mother executed a mutual trust disposition and settlement, by which, on the narrative of the love and affection which they had to each other, and to David Clyne, S.S.C., their only surviving child, and for other causes and considerations, they with consent severally give, grant, assign, dispoise, convey, and make over to and in favour of each other during their lifetime, and to the [75] longest liver, and after the death of the longest liver to and in favour of the said David Clyne, and the heirs of his body, and his assignees, whom failing, in favour of certain other persons as trustees, for the uses, ends, and purposes therein mentioned, their whole estate, heritable and moveable, and all their other property and effects, and, inter alia, for the purpose of converting their effects into cash, and after deducting debts and expenses, with instructions to divide the produce into ten parts, whereof one tenth part was declared to be payable to the children of the deceased Alexander Clyne, late tenant in Sordale, of which family the respondent is the eldest son.

The deed contained the following reservations:—"Reserving to us and the survivor of us, at any time of our life, to appoint, as we may see fit and necessary, other persons as trustees for the purposes aforesaid, either in addition to or in room and place of the trustees before named, which trustees so to be named shall have the same powers as the trustees hereinbefore named, etc.; and farther reserving full power and liberty to them and to the survivor, but only with the express advice and consent of the said David Clyne, and not otherwise, at any time of our lives, and even on death-bed, to alter, innovate, or revoke the same in whole or in part, and declaring that any alterations we may make, if done by a regular writing subjoined hereto, or by a paper apart, shall be as valid and effectual as if they were engrossed in this deed, under which declarations these presents are granted, and not otherwise." Then follows the usual clause declaring the deed valid, in so far as not altered, and dispensing with delivery.

[76] To this deed a codicil was subjoined, bearing to be subscribed by Mr. Clyne's parents and himself, who also wrote it, dated the 30th October 1826, whereby the said "William Clyne and Margaret Swanson, with mutual advice and consent, and with the express advice and consent of our son David Clyne," nominated and appointed three trustees in room of two who had died, and one whose appointment was thereby recalled; and they also, with advice and consent before mentioned, revoked and altered the bequest of one tenth share of their estate, and appointed it to be distributed in proportion to the remaining shares.

On the 1st November 1833, Mr. Clyne executed a trust deed of settlement, which proceeded on the following narrative; viz.—"Considering that circumstances have occurred to render necessary various alterations in the settlement of my means and estate since the deed of 22d August 1815 years was executed by me, and also since the death of my mother on the 15th day of January 1828, and the death of my father on the 30th day of December 1829 years; I do therefore hereby, and for other good causes and considerations me hereunto moving, give, grant, assign, dispoise, convey, and make over to and in favour of the appellants, and to the survivor or survivors of such of them as should accept, the major part alive and accepting being a quorum, and to such other person or persons as they or I myself may afterwards appoint as trustees," his whole means and estate, and particularly a house in Albany Street, therein specially described, for the uses, ends, and purposes therein mentioned, and, inter alia, for payment of an annuity of £10 sterling to the appellant.

[77] The deed concluded with the following clause:—"And I do hereby revoke and recall the foresaid settlement executed by myself on 22d August 1815, and another settlement executed by me in voluntary concurrence with my parents upon the 30th day of October 1826 years, and all other deeds and settlements, if any, in so far only as they interfere with the present deed," reserving power of alteration, but declaring always that the same, in so far as not altered, should be valid and effectual.

The deed contained also the following clause:—"But if any of the smaller annuitants or legatees should alter or attempt to alter this deed, in whole or in part, by action or otherwise, in any Court whatever, it is hereby expressly provided and declared that such party or parties so attempting to alter or repudiate shall ipso facto, amit, lose, and tyne all right and interest whatever hereby conferred upon them, and the residue shall go in manner already pointed out by me in the present deed."

Mr. Clyne died on the same day on which the above deed of settlement was executed, and in April 1835, the respondent, who is the cousin and heir of conquest of David Clyne, having been admitted to the benefit of the poor's roll, brought an action of reduction of this deed of settlement on the head of death-bed, in so far as the heritable property was concerned, against the appellant and the other trustees and executors of Mr. D. Clyne.

In defence the appellants set forth three pleas, all of which they designated as preliminary: 1. Want of title, in respect the respondent was concluded by the deeds of 1815. 2. Want of interest, in respect the value of [78] the heritage was less than what he took under the deed attempted to be reduced. 3. That the said deed was executed in virtue of reserved powers in the deed of 1815, and so not liable to challenge. The Lord Ordinary having ordered condescendence and answers, the appellants reclaimed to the Second Division of the Court, when their Lordships (20th November 1835) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords, etc., in respect it is admitted by the defenders that the deed under reduction was executed on death-bed, and that it appears the defences now pleaded as preliminary are the only defences pleadable in causa upon which it might be necessary to make up a record, adhere to the interlocutor complained of, refuse the desire of the note, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly."

Condescendence and answers were then given in, and the appellants repeated the three preceding pleas in law, with the addition of a fourth, simply to the effect that the pleas of the respondent being groundless, the action should be dismissed, but he did not designate any of these pleas as preliminary. The record being closed, and printed cases afterwards lodged, the Lord Ordinary, on the 24th December 1836, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repels the dilatory defences, and decerns, but without prejudice as to any question which may arise respecting the amount of the heritage claimed by the pursuer, which is hereby reserved to be discussed with the defences on the merits or otherwise hereafter: Finds the defenders liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and, when lodged, remits the same to the auditor, to tax and report.

[79] "Note.—It is stated by the defenders that there is no heritage, except a house in Albany Street, Edinburgh, and that this is not so valuable as the annuity of £10 which the death-bed deed gives the pursuer, though he be about fifty years old. The Lord Ordinary wished this matter of fact to be fixed before deciding any thing else, but both parties were averse to this, and therefore, as its determination is not necessary for the disposal of the dilatory defences, it, or any such matter, has been reserved."

The appellants presented a reclaiming note to the Second Division of the Court, but their Lordships on the 12th May 1837 pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review; refuse the desire of the reclaiming note, and decern: Find additional expenses due; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same, when lodged, to the auditor, to tax and report." The report of the auditor having been brought before the Court, their Lordships, having heard objections by the appellants, on the 31st May 1837, "approve of the account, and decern for payment to the pursuer of £191 0s. 8d. of taxed expenses, with three guineas as the expense of discussing the objections and the expense of extract, and allow the decree to go out and be extracted ad interim."

The respondent afterwards applied to the Court of Session for interim execution under the stat. 48 Geo. 3. c. 151, and their Lordships, on the 7th July 1837, granted warrant for immediate execution, so as to enforce payment to the petitioner of £191 0s. 8d. of his taxed expenses of process, he finding caution for the repetition of the same, with interest thereon, in [80] case of a reversal of the judgment of this Court by the House of Lords, and decern."

Caution having been presented and approved, the decree extracted, and letters of horning raised thereon, a charge to pay was given to the appellants, who thereupon presented a bill of suspension, on considering which the Lord Ordinary on the bills (Lord Fullerton) pronounced the following interlocutor, on the 15th September 1837:—"Refuses the bill: Finds the suspenders liable in expenses; allows an account to be given in, and remits the same, when given in, to the auditor, to tax and report.

"Note.—The words of the statute are conclusive against the suspenders. The judgment in the case of Lady Haddington, 20th November 1811 (Fac. Coll.), is exactly in point. The Court were not called upon to find any thing as to the absolute incompetency of the appeal, though that opinion is ascribed to them in the report; but the judgment, allowing the extract to be issued, clearly and necessarily implied their opinion on the point, which certainly was within their cognizance, and warranted by the terms of the statute, viz., that it was not competent by appeal to stay the execution of their former order. Considering the terms of the judgment and order for interim execution here, and the admission of the bond of caution by the proper officer, the other reasons of suspension are obviously inadmissible."

The defenders presented a second bill of suspension to the succeeding Lord Ordinary (Lord Meadowbank), when his Lordship pronounced the following interlocutor:—"29th September 1837.—The Lord Ordinary having considered this bill, with the former bill and answers, and writs produced, refuses the bill."

Against these interlocutors the defenders presented a reclaiming note to the Second Division of the Court, upon advising which their Lordships, on the 5th December 1837, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having considered this reclaiming note, with the minute and answers and other proceedings, refuse the desire of the note; adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against; find additional expenses due; remit to the Lord Ordinary on the bills to proceed accordingly."

The appellant brought three separate appeals against the proceedings above detailed, which came on to be heard at the same time. The first against the judgment adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, which repelled the dilatory defences as above mentioned and the previous interlocutory judgments in reference thereto, and embracing also certain judgments pronounced as to the respondent's admission to the poor roll; the second against the judgment awarding interim execution; the third against the judgment adhering to the Lord Ordinary's judgment refusing the second bill of suspension.

Appellants.—The settlement by Mr. Clyne in 1815 constituted a complete and absolute mortis causa disposition of his whole means and estate; the terms used reach a great deal farther than a mere disposition to his parents in the event of his predeceasing them. The condition annexed to the deed relates exclusively to the disposition to the parents; his predeceasing his parents was the only contingency upon which it was [82] possible they could succeed to his means and estate. The deeds of Mr. Clyne and his parents must be taken together, and when so taken they evidently provide as well for the survivance as the predecease of Mr. Clyne.

The deed by Mr. Clyne constituted an effectual feudal conveyance, and might have been rendered effectual by an express nomination under it. Mr. Clyne's parents were the parties first named, on whose failure the destination to parties unnamed was to take effect. An entail to A. B., whom failing to a series of heirs to be named, is a good entail, though A. B. should never take. Mr. Clyne expressly reserved power, in his deed of 1815, of naming the party who was to take after his parents, and that on death-bed. A deed not effectual as a conveyance may be sustained as a nomination, for the greater includes the less. Either the destination by Mr. Clyne to trustees to be nominated by himself was effectuated by the deed attempted to be reduced, or the nomination by his parents was equivalent to a nomination by himself. Mr. Clyne indicated his intention to exclude the respondent in a deed not challengeable as on death-bed, and having done so the respondent cannot object to his merely effectuating that previously declared intention. There is no essential distinction between a conveyance to trustees for purposes to be declared and a conveyance to parties to be named, because in the one case as much as in the other it requires the execution of another deed to exclude the heir. The heir will take in both cases, except for the execution of a subsequent deed.

The deed attempted to be reduced cannot operate as a revocation of the former deed. The revocation is not absolute. There is no evidence of intention to [83] revoke irrespective of the death-bed deed. These deeds are not inconsistent with each other; the trustees are different, but the objects of trust are nearly identical (Colquhoun v. Colquhoun, 8th July 1831; Brack v. Hogg, 23d Nov. 1827, 6 S. and D. 113; Coutts v. Crawford, (12th June 1795,) as reversed, 2 Bligh, 655; Mure v. Rae Mure, 15 D., B., and M., 581; Rowand v. Walker, 15 D., B., and M. 563; Kerr v. Vaughan, 24th Feb. 1829, 9 S. and D. 454; Fordyce v. Cockburn, 5th July 1827, 5 S. and D. 897; Willock v. Auchterlony, 14th Dec. 1769, Mor. 5539; Pennicuick, 18th Jan. 1687, Mor. 3243; Cuninghame, 10th June 1748, Elch. Death-bed, No. 19, affirmed; Anderson v. Fleming, 17th May 1833, 11 S. and D. 612).

(Second appeal.) The application for interim executions was irregularly made: 1. Because no copy of the petition of appeal was presented to the judges at the time the warrant was granted in terms of 48 Geo. 3, c. 151, s. 17. 2. Because the dues of Court were not paid. The respondent's privilege as a pauper ceased on his obtaining decree. 3. Because the powers given to the Court pending appeal are limited to the case where money has actually been expended in costs by or for behoof of the party, 48 Geo. 3, c. 151, s. 17. 4. The agent, being the party to receive the costs, is himself the cautioner for their repayment (Beveridge's Forms of Process, vol. ii. p. 640; Juridical Styles, 2d ed., vol. iii. t. 5, sec. 4, p. 881-2).

(Third appeal.) An order of service of an appeal by the House of Lords, and service following thereon, necessarily stops all procedure on the decree of the inferior Court until the appeal be decided. It has never been disputed that from the time at which the Court of last resort entertains and resolves to decide on an appeal, the case is altogether removed out of the jurisdiction of the Court below ; that it remains in dependence before the higher tribunal ; and that all [84] diligence, execution, or action must remain in the state in which they are at the time when the respondent is made a party to the appeal, until the cause is decided.

It has been already decided by this House that the statute 48 Geo. 3, c. 151, s. 17, does not deprive the party of his remedy by appeal against a decree for interim execution. In the case of Milne against Imlay, 25th January 1822 (Milne v. Imlay, 25th Jan. 1822, 1 S. and B. 268), the judgment of the Court of Session having been appealed from to the House of Lords, and interim execution awarded to the successful party, Imlay appealed against the interlocutor awarding it. Milne presented a petition to the House of Lords, praying that the appeal might be dismissed as incompetent ; but the House of Lords adjudged, " that the said appeal is competent," and ordered that " the prayer of the said petition be not complied with." A similar decision was given by the Committee of the House of Lords in the case of Clyne against Sclater, 7th August 1833 (Clyne v. Sclater, 13 S. and D. 1008), in which the competency of an appeal against interim execution was sustained. There is no case to be found on the records of this House in which the competency of such an appeal in the abstract has ever been decided in the negative.

Respondent.—The appeal is incompetent in respect that the judgments appealed from are interlocutory merely, and no leave to appeal has been asked or obtained from the Court below in terms of 48 Geo. 3, c. 151, s. 15, and 6 Geo. 4, c. 120, s. 5.

The doctrine contended for by the appellants, if given effect to, would go entirely to subvert the law of [85] death-bed, inasmuch as it would enable a person in lecto to nominate disponees to take his property, although he had not excluded the heir from taking by a deed executed in liege pousie.

The condition of Mr. Clyne's predecease in the deed of 1815 applies to the nominees of Mr. Clyne as well as to the other substitutes in the deed ; and that condition never having been purified, it is plain that even an express deed of nomination by Mr. Clyne, executed in liege pousie, would have been totally inoperative.

The deed by Mr. Clyne's parents had reference only to their own property, and could not possibly operate as a nomination of disponees to the property of their son. If it could be assumed that it did so operate, then it would clearly have been revoked by the death-bed deed. But in fact both of the deeds of 1815 were absolutely non-existent at the time when the death-bed settlement was executed. Whether these deeds are considered as separate and independent settlements, or as linked together in the manner contended for by the appellants, still the effect is the same—they were not legally in existence at the time referred to. The deed of the son had lapsed from the non-occurrence of the event in which alone, whether as a separate or a conjunctive deed, it was to operate, namely, his predeceasing ; and the deed of the parents had operated by carrying their property to the son, and had thereby become exhausted.

Mr. Clyne's intentions can only be collected from the deeds which he executed. If Mr. Clyne intended to exclude his heir, quod voluit non fecit.

(Second Appeal.) It has been expressly provided by the statute 48 Geo. 3, c. 151, s. 17., which regulates this [86] matter, that it shall not be competent to appeal against an order of the Court below allowing interim execution pending appeal.

The obvious meaning of that clause is, that the matter of interim execution shall be left in the discretion of the Court of Session, that an appeal against any such order is incompetent, but that the House of Lords will consider and regulate that matter, on hearing the appeal against the principal judgment in the cause.

In the case of the Countess of Haddington v. Stein, 20th November 1811 (Fac. Coll.), the Court, pending an appeal against their decision in a suspension of a charge on a bill, granted warrant for interim execution, in favour of the charger. An appeal against this warrant was presented, and an order of service obtained and intimated ; but it does not appear that the statutory incompetency of this appeal was brought under the notice of the House of Lords. The clerks in the Court below having had some difficulty in extracting the warrant in the face of the appeal, the charger applied to the Court to ordain them to give extract, and " the Court were of opinion that the second appeal was incompetent, and ordained the clerks to issue the extract."

Although it may be true that a copy of the petition of appeal was not presented to each of the judges, yet it cannot be denied that a copy of the petition of appeal, duly certified by the clerk of parliament, was produced in process, and laid before the Court along with the petition for interim execution; and this is precisely in terms of the statute 48 Geo. 3, c. 151, s. 17.

[87] A party on the poor's roll must be held entitled to the statutory benefit of interim execution, unless he has been expressly excluded from that benefit by the terms of the statute itself. The statute makes no such exclusion, but, on the contrary, provides the benefit to all parties, whatever their circumstances may be, who are in possession of a decree of the Inferior Court for expenses.

(Third Appeal.) It is quite unquestionable, under the provision of the statute 48 Geo. 3, c. 151, s. 17, already referred to, that an appeal against interim execution does not stop execution in the Court below.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case of Gordon v. Clyne your Lordships have lately heard three appeals; the subject matter of the contest between the parties being, according to the case made by the defender, property of less value than a life income which the pursuer is entitled to under the deed in question. It is true, that on the part of the pursuer it was stated that the property was of much larger value, but the defender, the present appellant, contends, that the property is of less value.

The first appeal, (which is that which raises the question,) was objected to upon the ground of incompetency, inasmuch as it was alleged that the adjudication was upon a mere preliminary defence, and not touching the merits.

The facts, so far as it is necessary to consider that part of the case, are these:—The pursuer (respondent), seeking to reduce a deed upon the ground of death-bed, is met by an allegation that there was another deed, a valid deed, which, if the latter deed were impeachable, would be a [88] bar to his claim,—namely, a deed of 1815, which it is alleged would equally preclude him from claiming the heritage; so that under those circumstances he would have no interest in impeaching the deed challenged upon the ground of death-bed. This was made the subject of preliminary pleas. The Lord Ordinary decided (which was afterwards affirmed by the Inner House), that that ought not to be treated as a preliminary defence, inasmuch as it went to the whole merits of the case, there being no doubt that the latter deed, the deed to be challenged, was a deed executed so recently before the death of the party as to be void, provided the heir was in a situation to be at liberty to challenge it. The whole case, therefore, turning upon the right of the pursuer, the heir, to challenge and reduce that death-bed deed, it was obvious that that embraced the whole matter in contest between the parties; and therefore the Court was of opinion that they ought not to treat it as a preliminary objection, but that it should be considered as constituting the whole substance and merits of the case. Upon this the defender put in pleas in law to the whole case, and repeated the objections which he had before made as preliminary objections.

Now, my Lords, the four pleas were these:—"First, The pursuer is barred from challenging the deed libelled on, in consequence of the settlements executed by Mr. Clyne and his parents in 1815. These settlements were not absolutely revoked by the deed under reduction, but only in so far as they interfered with the last deed; so that if this settlement could be reduced by the pursuer the former settlements would revive." "Second, The pursuer has no real or [89] legitimate interest to challenge the deed libelled on, as his interest is much greater under the last settlement than it would be under the former deeds, which would necessarily regulate Mr. Clyne's succession, if the settlement now under reduction were reduced." Upon that second ground no judgment has been pronounced, but the inquiry as to the facts is reserved for further consideration. Third, "The deed under reduction having been executed agreeably to reserved powers in the settlements of 1815, and as appears from its narrative being intended to effect certain alterations on these deeds, and the said deeds being all linked together, the defenders have in their persons a sufficient title to exclude the challenge here brought forward on the part of the pursuer." Fourth, "The pleas of the pursuer, being groundless both in law and in fact, ought to be repelled, and the action dismissed."

The result, therefore, is that upon these four pleas judgment has been given against the defender on the first and third. The second has been reserved for further investigation; and upon the fourth, which is merely raising a question upon the validity of the case set up by the plaintiff, no judgment has taken place. It is therefore undoubtedly an adjudication upon the merits, though an adjudication not exhausting the whole; that is to say, it is an adjudication upon part of the case, which in all probability will leave little or nothing to be hereafter adjudicated upon; but still it is an adjudication upon the merits of the whole case, the whole case being discussed by both parties.

Upon this state of the proceedings two questions were decided by the Court below. Two questions, there[90]-fore, are raised for your Lordships' consideration; the first being, whether the deed of 1815, and the subsequent deed executed by the parents of the party deceased, are such as to bar the heir, provided the death-bed deed did not stand in his way; or, in other words, whether, supposing the death-bed deed never had been executed, the title of the heir would have been excluded by these transactions of 1815. The second question raised is, whether the deeds of 1815 may be coupled with the death-bed deed, so as to exempt it from the operation of the law respecting death-bed.

My Lords, it appears that the party deceased having certain property of his own, and his father and mother having certain property belonging to them, that this arrangement took place: the first deed which was executed was the deed of August 1815, by which David Clyne, the party deceased, disposed of his property in these terms:—"In the event of my predeceasing my parents without leaving lawful heirs of my own body, I do hereby give, grant, assign, dispose, convey, and make over to and in favour of William Clyne, merchant in Thurso, my father, and Margaret Swanson his spouse, my mother, during their mutual lives, and to the longest liver of them two, and after the death of the longest liver to and in favour of any person or persons, or for such uses, ends, and purposes as I may name and appoint by any deed I may execute at any time of my life, and even on death-bed, and in case of my dying without having executed such deed, then to and in favour of such person or persons as shall be named and appointed in any deed that shall be executed (according to law or agreement [91] among themselves in such deed) by my said parents." The fact which happened was, that the parents predeceased this David Clyne.

In the month of September in the same year a deed of disposition and settlement was executed by the father and mother; and they, although it is stated that they had no heritage, use terms which, if they had any, would have operated as a disposition in favour of David Clyne their son, and the heirs of his body; whom failing, in favour of other persons. The terms used are,—“property which shall belong to us, or either of us, at the time of our death.” That provides, therefore, for such property as they might have at a future time; and if the son had died before the parents, and the parents had become possessed of the property, which in that event was destined to them by his deed of August 1815, their deed might have operated upon property so passed to them; but the facts are, that the father and mother died before the son, the consequence of which may be, that the deed of 1815 failed to have any operation at all, being entirely conditional, namely, made in the event of his predeceasing his parents; that, however, is a matter of contest at the bar. But one point cannot be a matter of contest, namely, that the estate to be acquired by the parents was conditional upon their surviving their son, and that by the death of the parents before the son that disposition in their favour fails; and another point will be equally clear, that the power intended to be given to the parents over the estate was also conditional, and could only operate in the event of their being possessed of that estate, which they were to have only in the event of their surviving their son.

[92] The first point, therefore, contended for, namely, that these two instruments operated, in the event that happened, to disinherit the heir, and that the heir therefore would have no title even if the death-bed deed had had no existence at all, I apprehend wholly fails; and therefore that impediment is removed out of the way of the heir, and he therefore stands in the situation of being a party interested in disputing the validity of the death-bed deed, the prior deeds not being of a nature to deprive him of the right of heirship.

My Lords, then it is said that that being so, although the second deed, namely, the disposition by the parents, cannot be considered as operating upon this property so as to remove the title of the heir; still the deed of August 1815 is a disposition of the heritage, and as such is not open to the objections that are made by law to death-bed deeds. That was the ground principally contended for by the appellant. That argument is founded upon this supposed state of the law, namely, that a party, although he cannot dispose of his estate within sixty days of his death, may execute a deed beyond the limited time, and that then he may, by a deed within sixty days, do that which would perfect that instrument; and in the course of that argument cases were cited to show, that by the law of Scotland, if the whole heritage,—the feudal title, is disposed of by a deed not objectionable upon the ground of death-bed, the trusts may be declared by a deed within the period, or by a will executed in England and according to English forms.

My Lords, I apprehend that those cases have no reference to the present, because in those cases the whole feudal title was complete by the original deed; [93] and it is very similar to the law existing in this country, namely, that a will disposing of real estate must be executed and attested in a certain form; that being done, and it being part of the provision of such a deed, that the estate shall be subject to the payment of legacies to be afterwards bequeathed, a legacy given by an instrument not properly attested is valid, and will operate upon the property devised, because it is devised by a properly executed and attested instrument. So in this case, provided the heritage be legally divested, and is passed by a deed executed within a period sufficiently long before the death of the party as not to be objectionable on the ground of death-bed, the party may declare the trusts of it by an instrument not executed according to the forms which the law of Scotland requires in passing heritage.

One case, and one case only, was referred to, which seemed to open any argument upon the ground contended for, and that was the case of Fordyce (5th July 1827, 5 S. and D. 897). Now the case of Fordyce was this: A party, by a deed not objectionable upon the ground of death-bed, had conveyed his estate to trustees, of whom a Mr. Cockburn was the survivor; afterwards a will was made, professing to give the estate to the same Mr. Cockburn and another trustee. That other trustee predeceased Mr. Cockburn, so that at that time Mr. Cockburn was the surviving trustee named in the will; and it was contended at the bar, that, being the trustee named in the will, he had asserted a title to the estate in that character, and that title was recognized; but, upon examination, it turns out that Mr. Cockburn's title was as trustee named in [94] the deed; he had a title entirely independent of the will, which was invalid as a conveyance of heritage upon the ground of death-bed.

My Lords, a case was referred to, namely, that of Crawford v. Coutts, 2 Bligh, p. 688, where Lord Eldon, (in discussing the question whether a death-bed deed revoking a former settlement, and professing to dispose of the property, can be bad as to the disposition, but good as to the revocation, so as to let in the heir,) puts this case, which I think your Lordships will see is identical with the present: He says, "In Scotland no man can make a valid liege poustie deed in this form: 'Know all men by these presents, that I do hereby reserve a power to dispose of my estate at any time of my life, et etiam in articulo mortis.' The liege poustie deed must be some actual deed of disposition existing at the death of the grantor." My Lords, the argument here is, that the party has said precisely what Lord Eldon supposed a party to say, namely, by the language of the deed of August 1815, "I hereby dispoise of my estate to such persons as I may hereafter name." No dispoinee being named you must look, therefore, to the death-bed deed for the dispoinee. It is, therefore, neither more nor less than what Lord Eldon supposes the party to say: "I hereby reserve a power to dispose of my estate at any time of my life, et etiam in articulo mortis." There is no instrument existing anterior to that death-bed deed which disposes of the heritage; there can be no disposition of the heritage without a dispoinee. There is no existing instrument which can take the title from the heir, unless you have recourse to the death-bed deed, which is now challenged.

[95] My Lords, if, therefore, the case and the arguments raised at your Lordships' bar rested upon those two deeds alone, I should have no hesitation in advising your Lordships that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed; but there is another ground alluded to in the short note (15 D., B., and M., 915) which we have of the opinions of the Learned Judges below, and I cannot, therefore, entirely pass that over. According to the argument contended for by the defenders the effect of the deed of August 1815 would be this,—to reserve to himself the power on his death-bed of naming the dispoinee. To carry that intention into effect one would expect to find a deed performing that service, either referring or not referring to the prior deed (it is not absolutely necessary to refer to it), and naming the donee to take under the prior disposition. Instead of that we have a deed in which the party states that it is necessary to make alterations in his settlement; and he proceeds actually to dispose of and convey his estate, without reference to any power reserved to him, and not only without reference, which would not be necessary, but the deed actually revokes the former deed so far as that is inconsistent with the present: in fact that deed is absolutely and entirely inconsistent with the death-bed deed. According to the argument he would have nothing to do but to name the donee; instead of which he conveys and disposes de novo, and recalls the former deed so far as that is inconsistent with the latter deed.

My Lords, it was said, when I suggested that to the learned counsel at the bar, that that objection ought to be taken with a good deal of caution, because it had [96] not occurred to any of the parties below. I was rather anxious to find out how that matter stood, and upon looking through the papers I find that it was alluded to below. I find this in the 11th page of the appellants' case:—"It may be objected to this argument, that Mr. Clyne intended to make a new deed, not to exercise a faculty reserved in a former one. The defenders would reply, in the first place, that it was decided, in the case of Willock v. Auchterlony, that such a faculty may be exercised without a special reference to it. But farther, the greater includes the less. It was meant both for a disposition and a nomination. It may stand for a nomination, just as it will stand as a testament, although as a disposition it should be revocable, and, as the deed of 1815 is declared to be revoked only so far as inconsistent with that of 1833," etc. That very point is raised; and when the Learned Judges below are found expressing an opinion that the deed of August 1815 was absolutely revoked, they were perfectly warranted in that opinion.

My Lords, this, in my view of the case, would exhaust the first appeal, with one exception, to which I am about to call your Lordships' attention. It would also dispose of the matter as far as relates to the merits. But I cannot but observe that this appeal also includes a great variety of interlocutors; I believe there are not less than twenty called in question by these appeals. Three interlocutors are appealed from which relate to the pursuer being upon the poor's roll. The counsel at your Lordships' bar have had sense and discretion enough not to advert to that point at all; I cannot but [97] observe that they are not properly brought as matter of appeal to your Lordships' bar.

My Lords, the second and third appeals are open to very much the same observations, the Court below having decided in favour of the pursuer, to the extent to which their decision goes, under the authority of an act of parliament which directed that there should be a payment of the expenses decreed, notwithstanding an appeal. My Lords, that was made a matter of appeal, and the appeal was attempted to be supported on the grounds, first of all, that there was no printed copy of the appeal appended to the proceedings below.

Now, there was a copy of the appeal; that is not in dispute; and the whole argument is, whether there should be a printed copy, there being nothing in the act of parliament requiring that a copy should be printed. The party being poor and suing in formâ pauperis every unnecessary expense was very properly avoided; and the Judges were informed of the appeal, as the act of parliament requires, by having a copy of the appeal presented to them, but the party did not think proper to incur the expense of printing it, and that is made a subject of appeal to your Lordships' House.

There is another ground, and one only, I understand, upon which that appeal is attempted to be supported; namely, that the order is for payment of costs incurred. They say that the party was suing in formâ pauperis, and he could therefore have no costs incurred; just as if any party, whether suing in formâ pauperis or not, could prosecute any appeal without incurring some expense. It was endeavoured to draw into discussion the amount of some of the charges in the bill of costs; the learned counsel's attention was drawn to that, and [98] he said that he could not raise at your Lordships' bar any argument upon that subject. The question, then, is, whether your Lordships are to take for granted that which every body knows not to be the fact, that a party can sue in formâ pauperis, or prosecute a proceeding in a court of law, without incurring some costs. The costs incurred are all which the Court of Session has ordered to be paid.

The question as to directing interim execution or withholding it is entirely left to the discretion of the Court; they are to have the whole case brought before them, and they are to have liberty, if they think proper, to direct interim execution.

My Lords, the Court having decided against the case made by the defenders to withhold this interim execution, they were not satisfied with that decision, and appealed to your Lordships' House. They then brought two bills of suspension; the first, the Lord Ordinary decided against,—that was abandoned; and then they brought another, which was brought into the Inner House. The ground of suspension was this: that having appealed against the order of interim execution, it was not competent for the parties to proceed any further; that is to say, that the act of parliament giving the Court a power at their discretion to award interim execution, and the party being dissatisfied with that order, and appealing against it, that second appeal acted as an estoppel. If that had been so it would obviously have had the effect of destroying the discretionary power granted to the Court; but the act of parliament very wisely guarded against that, and by the 18th section it provides, that no appeal against such an interim order shall stay process: the provisions of the [99] act of parliament very clearly state that. The 18th section, however, was not enough to satisfy the defenders, for they not only brought these two bills of suspension in the Court below upon that ground alone, but they make the decision of the Court against them on that subject a ground of appeal to your Lordships' bar.

My Lords, these two last appeals were for a long time undefended; the party did not appear; and no doubt the appellants would have been in a situation to have had the case heard ex parte,—certainly without any probability of success; and it may have been upon the certainty that the respondent, namely, the pursuer, felt that this House never would assent to the proposition of the appellants, that he abstained from appearing to defend those two appeals. In point of fact, he never did appear till the case was actually called on at your Lordships' bar; then the pursuer, the respondent, did appear, and having printed his cases asked leave to present those cases. Your Lordships finding that he was actually there, and that no delay was asked, thought it more advisable to give him the opportunity of appearing than to hear the case ex parte,—your Lordships at that time not knowing the nature of the case, which if your Lordships had, you would not probably have thought it necessary that any party should appear to resist those appeals. Now the question is, whether, as those appeals, if the respondent had appeared regularly, would unquestionably, I apprehend, have been dismissed with costs,—whether under those circumstances it is proper that your Lordships should dismiss these appeals with costs. Upon the merits they ought no doubt to be dismissed with costs; but the only ground upon which your Lordships would pause before giving an [100] opinion upon that subject would be this, that if the respondent had appeared, perhaps the appellants might have withdrawn their appeal, and not have come to your Lordships' bar at all. Upon these grounds I am inclined to think, that your Lordships having extended to the respondent the indulgence to which he had no claim, of being permitted to come in at the last moment, it would be perhaps imposing too heavy a liability upon the appellants, to dismiss the appeals with costs. Upon the original appeal I apprehend your Lordships will entertain no doubt that it ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lord Brougham.—My Lords, having attended the greater part of the hearing of this case, though not the whole, and a small part only of the hearing of the two later cases, upon which my noble and learned friend has pronounced his opinion so clearly and distinctly, and in a manner so satisfactory, I may dispense with the necessity of entering at greater length into the particulars of the case than is sufficient for the purpose of stating my own opinion, and the grounds upon which I have arrived at that opinion.

The importance of questions relating to the law of death-bed, whether to the application of the law in particular cases, or to the nature and constitution of the law itself, is manifest, and it is considerable. It is a peculiarity in Scottish jurisprudence, and it is a peculiarity which appears to me most useful and honourable to that system of jurisprudence that distinguishes it from ours and from all others. Our law throws a protection round the death-bed of parties, by requiring certain solemnities to be observed before they can pass real estate,—formerly their real estate only,—now, by [101] the late act of parliament, their personal estate also. We all know,—those who have practised in Courts, whether of equity, or of law, or of both (which has been my lot),—all well know, how very ineffectual those conditions imposed upon parties in order to their validity conveying their estates oftentimes prove. For as it is not difficult to obtain the assistance of three witnesses, the number formerly required, or of two witnesses, the number now required, as a conspiracy may very easily be effected,—and I am sorry to say that there are constant instances of it in practice, no character whatever being required to belong to those witnesses except that they should be witnesses of credit, that is to say, that they should not be disqualified by a sentence of an infamous nature from being witnesses,—so it becomes no very hard matter to obtain a will passing large estates, whether real or personal, from a man or a woman in such circumstances, at the close of life, as shall leave the gravest suspicion upon the minds of those who have to deal with and to give effect to that instrument, whether they were in a condition or not to dispose of any part of that property. A much more effectual protection is thrown round that period of human life, a much better security is afforded to the rights of the heir at law, by the Scottish system, which requires, by a most rational and sensible arrangement, that a certain time should elapse, namely sixty days, between the execution of the instrument and the decease of the party, otherwise it shall be void and have no effect. Unless the fact be such as to make presumption yield to it,—the incapacity presumed by the law inures for sixty days. The rule laid down is, that the only fact to which the presumption of incapacity [102] shall yield is the appearing at kirk or market unsupported during those sixty days; that being taken as the test of liege poustie, or that state of mental capacity which gives the party the power of lawfully and validly disposing of his heritable property. This rule is confined to heritage in Scotland, the old law there, as here, taking no cognizance of personal property, which was then of such trifling amount in the transactions of men as not to be deemed worthy of consideration by the legislature.

Such being the general law, in construing any particular matter with a view to ascertain whether it comes within it or not, we are to keep the purpose and intention of the law constantly and steadily in view, in order to see whether or not the law applies in the manner asserted. Now, it is a law for the protection of the heir at law; hence the first conclusion is, that nobody but the heir at law has a right to avail himself of it to reduce ex capite lecti. Hence a second proposition follows,—that if the heir at law has been already validly excluded, cadit questio, there is an end of the reductio ex capite lecti; he has no interest and therefore no locus standi. But if the deed set up is of such a nature as that it does not exclude the heir, then the law of death-bed applies. Hence a third proposition of necessity follows,—that no man can make, while in liege poustie, such a deed as shall exclude the heir generally, by merely indicating an intention on his part to work an exclusion of the heir. The exclusion must not only be intended by the maker of the deed, but it must be executed; the heir at law must be effectually excluded; and the intention to exclude him is good for nothing unless the exclusion is operated and effected against him. Hence it is perfectly clear,—I can hardly say as a [103] fourth proposition, for it follows as a parcel of the last which I have stated, as is laid down by Lord Eldon in Crawford v. Coutts, which was referred to by my noble and learned friend,—that a man cannot say in liege poustie, “Know all men by these presents, that I intend that the law of death-bed shall not apply to any disposition which I may make within sixty days;”—for what would that amount to? It would amount to this, that instead of saying, “Be it therefore enacted by his Majesty, with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament assembled, that the law of death-bed shall be repealed generally,” it would be saying, “Know all men by these presents that I repeal the law of death-bed in my particular case.” Now no man can do that; he must conform himself to the law. But it also follows as another proposition, which I take to be quite clear, that no man can work the disinherison of the heir, and exclude the application of the general law of death-bed, by merely saying, “I disinherit the heir;” he must disinherit him by conveying the estate out of him, and conveying it to somebody else. Hence it is another, and it is the last proposition bearing upon this question with which I shall trouble your Lordships, viz., that it is clear that no man can make a deed in liege poustie which is blank in the name of the disponent,—I hold that to be quite clear,—that no man can say, “I disinherit the heir in favour of blank,” and then within sixty days fill up that blank: I take that to be clear.

But, my Lords, I must add, that it is not at all necessary for the disposing of the present case that I should affirm or prove the latter of these propositions; [104] it is otherwise with respect to powers reserved. If in liege poustie you create a valid power, you may reserve the moment of the execution of that power till within sixty days, just as my noble and learned friend has most properly stated; and moreover I may add this,—you may constitute a trust, and if you, by the constitution of that trust, take out of the heir his succession in liege poustie, you may operate upon the trust so created within sixty days, and it cannot be reduced as ex capite lecti. But why? Because you have validly effected your purpose. You not only have moulded it so as to shew entirely in what way your bounty is to be distributed, but you have entirely defeated the right of the heir by vesting the estate in trustees. You may afterwards declare a cestui que trust, or at all events you may declare the various burdens and legacies connected with it, and the other matters which unite themselves with the disposition of the property: So in England the protection of requiring three witnesses signing in the presence of the testator (now reduced to the number of two by the late law (7 W. 4, and 1 Vict. c. 26)) is analogous to the protection afforded by the law of death-bed in Scotland to the dying moments of a sick person. If I, by will, executed by three witnesses in my presence, or now, by the late change in the law, by two,—if I validly constitute a trust in favour of A. and B., and afterwards, without the three witnesses or the two witnesses, make any legacy connected with it, that will hold without the presence of two witnesses, as the law at present is, or three as the law formerly was; for the instrument which executes the entire purpose of disposing of the [105] property being a complete disposition of the property, and that being attested now by two and formerly by three witnesses, that is sufficient,—but without that it would not be sufficient. Now, such is the general principle upon which I take this law to be established, and in support of which I would only refer to a very learned and accurate note (for I have looked into the original book) by Mr. Ivory in his edition of Erskine's Institutes (Ersk. (Ivory's Ed.) b. 3, tit. 8, sect. 98, n. 549), which states it pretty nearly in the same manner:—“Under a trust disposition of heritable property, with reserved power to regulate the administration of the trustees and the application of the trust estate by a testamentary deed”—(now he clearly means here testamentary, as contradistinguished from liege poustie, that is to say, a deed within the sixty days,)—“by a testamentary deed containing a special declaration of uses and purposes, or directing the payment of legacies, donations, etc., such a testament, if executed in liege poustie, will effectually exclude all challenge by the heir, notwithstanding the trust deed was an undelivered document.” But he goes on to say, “And where the trust conveyance so disposes of the primary interest in the estate”—(what he means by the primary interest is what we should call the legal estate)—“as by its own force, in default of exercise of the reserved power, to exclude the heir at law, the reserved power may be exercised even on death-bed.” Why? Because the primary interest, the legal estate, has been validly taken out of the heir at law by the first deed, the valid deed in liege poustie, and consequently the [106] intention operates, and the deed made in liege poustie will validate and give effect to the death-bed deed.

Now, my Lords, such being the principles upon which this law is framed, and upon which it is to be applied casibus omnibus, I have now simply to state to your Lordships my opinion upon the present case, by referring to the very distinct statement of my noble and learned friend of the facts of the case, where those facts are totally undisputed. Upon one point your Lordships may observe there is a difference, namely, whether the construction of this deed, taking it altogether, is such as to make it founded upon the event of predecease. But upon the other point, the more essential point of the two, there is no dispute, nor can there be any dispute; I allude to the two deeds, the one of August and the other of September in the year 1815, and which are both of them liege poustie deeds: “I, David Clyne, solicitor in the Supreme Courts of Scotland, in the event of my predeceasing my parents without leaving lawful heirs of my own body, do hereby give,” and so forth; and then he adds a disposition to his father and mother during their joint lives, and to the longer liver, “and after the death of the longer liver to and in favour of any person or persons, or for such uses, ends, and purposes, as I may name and appoint by any deed I may execute at any time of my life, and even on death-bed; and in case of my dying without having executed such deed, then to and in favour of such person or persons as shall be named and appointed in any deed that shall be executed (according to law or agreement between themselves in such deed) by my said parents."

[107] Now, this I take to be perfectly undeniable, that two events must concur, two facts must happen. I know that taking it altogether a dispute has been raised upon this, but I hold it to be quite clear that two facts must concur, that two events must happen, before this deed can have any operation at all. What are these two events? That the son, the maker of the deed, shall predecease his parents, and that he shall predecease his parents without issue. Then a third event must be added to these two before the operation of the September deed can take place, that is to say, before there shall be any thing upon which that deed, whatever it is, can operate,—before that can exist,—before that can come in use as a subject matter for the parents' deed to work upon. What is that third event? His predeceasing is the first; his predeceasing without leaving a lawful heir of his own body is the second; his dying without executing any deed himself is the third. These three events must all concur: his predecease,—his predecease without issue,—his predecease without issue and without any appointment, without executing any deed himself. All these must concur before the parents can have any one thing upon which their deed operates.

Now, my Lords, in the year 1828 the father dies; in 1829 the mother dies; in 1833 the maker of the deed dies; consequently there is an end of the first material event—the corner stone of the whole of this conveyance,—it all falls to the ground,—for instead of predeceasing them he survived them both. It is not material whether he executed any disposition or not; it is immaterial whether he died without heirs; the predecease never happened.

[108] Now, it has been contended, that the first condition did not override the whole case; but has it ever been contended that it does not override the father's and mother's deed? The father and mother execute a power. Upon what to operate? Upon the estate of the son. There were other estates upon which it was to operate, independent of the estate of the son, but it could only have any thing to operate upon in the son's estate, in the event of the son's predecease; but they predecease, and therefore it has nothing to operate upon.

My Lords, these are the short grounds upon which I hold that the heir is not excluded here from suing, and upon which I also hold that the law of death-bed here plainly applies. I find that in the Court below, though we have not a very full account (as we have often to lament) here of what passed, we have a very distinct statement, a very intelligible and concise statement, of the reasons of the Learned Judge Lord Glenlee, than whom a more able and learned judge never was upon that or any other bench, in which he says, alluding to the arguments at the bar, "If it had been distinctly made out that the pursuer was barred by a subsisting deed"—there was no subsisting deed, for there was nothing for it to operate upon,—"which would have prevented his claim on the reduction of the death-bed deed, the defenders might have succeeded in their argument; but it has not been made out that such deed was in existence at the date of the last settlement, and therefore the pursuer is not prevented from claiming" (15 D., B., and M., 915) [1837, 15 Dunlop 915].

[109] With respect to the other causes, and also to a very great deal of the oppressive litigation in this cause among the eighteen or twenty interlocutors brought before us, I entirely concur with what my noble and learned friend has stated in expressing my great disapprobation, and I will go so far as to say my reprobation, of these proceedings. The first of these appeals ought to be dismissed with costs; that no man can doubt: I only have a doubt whether the second and third ought not also to be dismissed with costs. My first impression was, that they ought. My noble and learned friend has somewhat weakened that impression, by reminding me that it is barely possible that the defenders, the present appellants, if they had seen that the respondent was going to meet them, and that these two cases were not about to be set down and heard ex parte, might have thought better of it, and might not have proceeded. It ought to be observed, however, that that does not apply to any thing but the hearing, and that is to be considered. And for the purpose of further considering it I will beg my noble and learned friend to agree with me, that before finally saying whether or not the respondent should have the costs of the second and third appeals, we should take a day or two to consider that; because if costs would have been incurred by the respondent up to the moment of coming to the bar, all that the appellants at the last moment could have done might have been not to have had the appeals heard here.

Lord Chancellor.—They had not appeared.

Lord Brougham.—Oh! they had not appeared to the appeal; then my observation is misplaced, undoubtedly. That does introduce a very considerable [110] doubt in my mind. Then I rather agree with my noble and learned friend, that it will be difficult to give costs; but we had better take a little time to consider that. I should very much regret, and so I am sure does my noble and learned friend, if, under the circumstances of this case, we cannot call upon the appellants to pay the costs of the second and third appeals.

Now, my Lords, having disposed of those cases, it is fit that I should state an impression upon my mind, connected with the name of the most learned and venerable judge whose opinion I have just cited, I mean my Lord Glenlee, who has given a very concise, but a most correct and well grounded, judgment in this case, agreeing in every respect with that which your Lordships have now affirmed, and distinctly applying itself to the principal and main ground of the present affirmance. There never was upon any bench, in any country, a more reverend, a more able, a more learned judge. He is a man thoroughly imbued with the most profound, extensive, and masterly knowledge of all the jurisprudence of his own country, and of all the general principles upon which all systems of jurisprudence are grounded. He is a man whose knowledge is not confined to the jurisprudence of Scotland, or even to law in general, but he is one of the most profound scholars in all the most difficult branches of science to which the human faculties can be applied. I know that he has passed his days and his nights in those profound, most difficult, and most sublime investigations; I know that there exists not within the bounds of this country at this moment a man so deep a mathematician (I mention it to his honour) as he has been all his life in the horae subsecivae of his judicial pro-[111]fession; I know that up to this last month, from direct communication with that learned judge, his mind is as vigorous and as entire as it was forty years ago.

My Lords, I stand here to perform an act of justice, and of strict justice only, in giving vent to these sentiments of my mind. If there be any man who knows Scotch law better than I do,—if there be any man of any age, of any amount of experience, of any extent of inquiry, in any other place, who from his own personal observation has found reason to look down upon Lord Glenlee, to raise himself above him, and hold that he, this observer, is entitled to pass sentence upon the state of the faculties of that most able, most learned, and most venerable judge,—if any such person knows science so profoundly,—if any such person is so much better versed in Scotch law than the humble individual who now deems it his duty, and his painful duty, to address your Lordships in the performance of an act of strict justice alone,—if any such person, in any other place, shall have taken upon himself the office of pronouncing sentence upon the continuance or the discontinuance of the judicial capacity of that judge,—all I can say is, to that higher authority, to the superior illumination of mind, to the greater knowledge of law, to the larger, and more full endowment of science of that individual, I shall bow with the deference which is due to it from me. But until I am otherwise instructed, and until I have lost my memory, and until my faculties are gone, so that I shall no longer know right from wrong, or a sound judgment such as this, which your Lordships are now occupied in affirming with costs, upon the same grounds upon which he gave it,—or until I know not how to read a letter written three weeks ago upon a scientific topic, or think [112] the writer of that letter knew not what he was writing,—I am bound to hold by my own opinion; and it is an opinion which I have deliberately formed, and which I now without hesitation pronounce.

My Lords, an accident prevents your Lordships from having laid before you the testimony of other learned judges concurring in the same opinion. I have had correspondence, and very lately, with them too; and my noble and learned friend who immediately preceded me in the highest judicial office in this country was to have attended to-day for the express purpose of bearing his testimony, much more valuable than mine, to the continuing capacity of these learned judges to exercise the judicial office. Having accidentally not been present at the hearing of this particular cause, he did not think that he ought to come down (and I agree with him, though I lament his absence,) to take part in this interlocutory or rather accidental appendix to the judgment; but I have Lord Lyndhurst's authority for stating that his Lordship has been in recent correspondence with one or two of those learned and reverend judges, that he has been in recent correspondence with the chief of that Court, and that he gives it as his most decided and deliberate opinion, that the great faculties and enlarged mind of that illustrious person, the head of the Scottish law, are as I have described the others to be.

My Lords, it is no light matter to have such things as these fabricated, and such opinions, if I may dignify them by such a name,—things which merit no such respectable appellation,—to have such matter (to give it no more offensive name) vented, and vented in high places. Much depends upon the fancies of men,—much upon their casual impression: promulgate [113] the notion that the mind of the soundest man in England who is called upon to deliver judgment is gone, or is going,—I will venture to say, be it the soundest that ever inhabited the frail tenement of a human body, provided age has come upon that body, there will not be wanting people to fancy, and even very honestly to believe, that they see symptoms of failure. I have seen it over and over again in private, when I happened to know that there was not the slightest foundation for it, because the party survived years and years in the full possession of his faculties.

But, my Lords, it is no light matter to have judicial character carped at in such a way; and God forbid that I should ever live to see the day in this country when the conduct of judges should be attacked otherwise than in the manner that the laws and constitution of the realm have provided for its being attacked, namely, an address by both Houses of Parliament; that is the legal remedy,—that is the proper mode. What avails it to the independence of the bench, the most important of all the benefits which the constitution showers down upon us,—what avails it to the independence of the judicial character, that the law says that a judge shall not be removed during his life, and during his good behaviour, if he is to be flung at, if he is to be attacked, if he is to be held up to derision and contempt, more unbearable than public hatred and scorn itself, as one who has survived his intellects, and who sits upon the bench that he can no longer adorn, in order that by neglecting his judicial duties, by filling the place which an abler and [114] fitter man ought to occupy, he may have a pretext for receiving the public money in consideration of a duty which he no longer has the capacity to perform? I had rather at once be impeached,—I would rather hold up an arraigned hand at your Lordships bar, where I could defend myself, and where I could appeal to your Lordships for justice, which I know I should have,—than I would submit to be the butt of such shafts, and the victim of such attacks.

My Lords, I have filled the highest judicial office in this country for a longer period of time than any man now living. Had my noble and learned predecessor, who filled it so much longer, the late Lord Eldon, been alive, I should not have been the person to deliver these sentiments before your Lordships. No man better knew than he the great faculties and extraordinary merits of those learned and reverend persons; but he is now taken from us, and the duty devolves upon me, which I have now painfully performed before your Lordships, except that no man ought ever to feel any pain while he knows that he is conscientiously discharging an important duty. It is your Lordships bounden duty, as you have now and then to reverse the judgments of the Court below,—as you have occasionally to differ from those learned judges,—(and you have always respectfully expressed that difference of opinion, and always reluctantly altered their judgments.)—so it is your bounden duty, as it is your special and your precious privilege, to defend, to sustain, to protect those learned judges when you know that they are so foully, falsely, and most unjustifiably assailed. I have received a letter from [115] Lord Lyndhurst, begging that I would make known his entire coincidence of opinion with me. We have talked over the subject repeatedly.

My Lords, in the case of Gordon v. Clyne, in which there were three appeals, your Lordships have some doubt with respect to the costs of the second and third appeals. Your Lordships disapproved of the proceedings of the party in bringing those appeals; but as there had been no appearance made for the respondent until the case came on for hearing, the consequence was, that it might naturally enough be said by the appellants, non constat that we should have gone on had we known that the other party meant to defend; and consequently the delay of the respondent in making that appearance, although not blameable in him, considering the poverty of the client, who sued in formâ pauperis, nevertheless has the effect of raising a defence against costs on the part of the appellants. In order to consider whether it was possible to overcome this objection, which at first appeared almost insuperable, it was agreed that we should postpone that only point for the consideration of the House for a few days. My noble and learned friend and I have agreed upon the subject, that we do not find that we can overcome that difficulty; and therefore, however reluctant we are, and confessing out reluctance to refuse the costs, we find that we have no other course open to us. As to the costs of the first appeal there can be no doubt, and those have been already disposed of.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, I entirely agree with the opinion of my noble and learned friend as to the order now to be made; at the same time expressing my [116] regret that the parties who have brought an appeal of this description to your Lordships House should escape without payment of costs. But I think it is quite clear under the circumstances that your Lordships cannot make any other order.

First appeal.—The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House; and that the said interlocutors, so far as therein complained of, be and the same are hereby affirmed, with costs, to be paid to the respondent within one calendar month.

Second appeal.—The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House; and that the said interlocutors, so far as therein complained of, be and the same are hereby affirmed.

Third appeal.—The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House; and that the said interlocutors, so far as therein complained of, be and the same are hereby affirmed.

DEANS and DUNLOP—JOHN ALISON, Solicitors.

[117] APPEAL FROM COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

WILLIAM MACKENZIE and Others, Appellants.—Knight Bruce—Dr. Lushington; Mrs. JANET ORR or GORDON, Widow, and Others (16 D., B., and M., 311), Respondents.—Sir William Follett—M. Smith [26th March, 1839].

Competition.—A party lending a large sum over an estate possessed in fee simple stipulated to receive as part security, in addition to a bond and disposition in security in his favour, assignments to certain incumbrances of a prior date. The incumbrances were paid by the trustee and agent of the borrower, but it did not appear with whose money. In a question between a party holding an incumbrance intervening between the assigned incumbrances and the bond and disposition in security,—Held that the presumption was, that the prior incumbrancers were paid with the money of the assignee; and, as there was no evidence to the contrary, that (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) the assignment conferred a preference over the intermediate incumbrancer.

Arrears due on the prior incumbrances mentioned above were, from omission, not assigned till a subsequent period, when they were separately conveyed to the same party.—Held (also affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that the lender was not bound to compute payments of interest, previous to the assignment of the arrears on the sum lent by him towards extinction of these arrears, in diminution of his security.

The late Alexander Hume Macleod, of Harris, by a deed of settlement dated the 17th June 1811, con-[118]-veyed the estate of Harris, in which he was infeft, to his eldest son Alexander Norman Macleod, subject to certain burdens therein specified, and, inter alia, of an annuity of £300 payable to his youngest son Donald Hume Macleod during his life, and in the event of his having lawful children living at the time of his death to such children, equally amongst them, during their respective lives

On the death of Mr. Macleod, in 1811, he was succeeded by Alexander Norman Macleod, who was infest on the above disposition and deed of settlement, under the burden of the provision or annuity in favour of his brother Donald Hume Macleod and his children.

On the 17th September 1812 Alexander Norman Macleod executed a heritable bond in corroboration of the annuity of £300. This deed contained warrant for infesting Donald Hume Macleod in the estate of Harris in security of the annuity, and he was duly and validly infest accordingly, conform to instrument of sasine dated the 13th November 1812.

At Whitsunday 1828, Mr Donald Hume Macleod conveyed, by a trust disposition, the above annuity and arrears thereof to the appellant and another trustee (since deceased), and the survivor of them. These trustees were duly infest on the trust disposition in the month of July 1829.

On the 3d November 1817 Alexander Norman Macleod granted a heritable security over the lands of Harris in favour of Mr. Grant of Kilgraston for £25,000, then borrowed from Mr. Grant, who was infest thereon on the 9th February 1818. After the death of Mr. Grant the bond passed into the hands of trustees appointed by his settlements, who completed their title [119] to it, and subsequently granted, in the month of November 1823, a disposition and conveyance thereof in favour of Mr. Gordon of Milrig, who was infest thereon, and the infestment duly recorded in the month of March 1824.

Besides the original security thus vested in Mr. Grant, there were in existence four different bonds and infestments affecting the estate of Harris, which had been granted by Mr. Alexander Hume Macleod in the years 1804, 1807, 1808, and 1810; and it was stipulated in the treaty for the loan of £25,000, that these securities were to be conveyed to Mr. Grant, and to be held by him as collateral securities for the £25,000 and interest. These securities were conveyed to Mr. Dallas, the trustee and agent of Mr. Macleod, by whom they were conveyed to Mr. Inglis, who succeeded him as agent and trustee, but there was no direct evidence to show with whose money they had been procured from the holders. There were also in existence certain other securities granted in favour of several members of Mr. Macleod's family, which were of a date posterior to the collateral securities thus held by Mr. Grant.

The heritable bond and disposition in security, dated 3d November 1817, as well as the interest of the trustees of Mr. Grant in the collateral securities, are now duly vested in the respondents, who are the accepting trustees under the settlement of the late Mr. Gordon of Milrig.

In a process of ranking and sale instituted by creditors, the estate of Harris was sold to the Earl of Dunmore for £60,000; but this sum proved insufficient for the payment even of the heritable debts secured over it.

[120] The appellants claimed to be ranked and preferred on the price obtained by the sale of the estate of Harris, according to the priority of their sasines; while the respondents contended that they were entitled to be ranked, in virtue of the collateral securities vested in them, according to the priority of the sasines in favour of the original creditors therein.

On the 6th December 1837 the Lord Ordinary made avizandum to the Lords of the First Division, who, on the 16th January 1838, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having advised the competition with the claim for the trustee of Mr. Macleod, and also for the trustee of Gordon of Milrig, repel the objections stated to the interest and claim of preference for Gordon of Milrig's trustees, and rank and prefer the said trustees in terms of their claim, and decern and remit to the Lord Ordinary in the ranking to proceed farther as shall be just."

Against this interlocutor the appellants appealed.

Appellants.—The collateral securities founded on by the respondents, which are prior in date to the infestments founded on by the appellants, were conveyed to trustees for Alexander Norman Macleod, who was the debtor in these securities, and they were thereby extinguished; for the same party is not capable in law of sustaining at one and the same time the characters of debtor and creditor in the same debt, or of being debtor to himself or creditor to himself, and a conveyance to a trustee for a party is in its legal effects the same thing as a conveyance to the party himself.

[121] According to the settled law of Scotland, where debts are acquired by the debtor therein, where "the same person becomes both debtor and creditor in them, and so is not only vested active with the right of the debt, but passive subjected to the payment of it," the debt or obligation is dissolved and extinguished confusione, "for no person can be debtor or creditor to himself." (Ersk. b. iii. tit. 4. sec. 23. and 27.; citing 21st Dec. 1680, Cuninghame (Dict. 3038), Kerr v. Turnbull, 15th Feb. 1758, Dict. 15551; Devaynes v. Noble (Clayton's Case), 1 Merivale Reports, 604.)

Supposing that the respondents were entitled to found upon the collateral securities in competition with the appellants, deduction ought to have been made from their amount, or credit given, to the extent of the interests which the respondents have received on the debt for £25,000, since the said securities were acquired by them, instead of their being allowed to rank for the total amount of the collateral securities, accumulating the annuities and interests from the date at which they were conveyed to them to the present time.

Respondents.—As the collateral securities, with the infestments thereon, have been transferred to and are now vested in the respondents, they are entitled to be ranked on the price of the estate of Harris, in preference to the appellants.

The infestments on the collateral securities have never been extinguished by confusion or discharged by deed, and they remain as preferable burdens on the estate, and as such have been validly conveyed and assigned to the respondents, who were entitled, in virtue of the personal obligation contained in their bond, to [122] apply the interest received by them in extinction of the interest accruing on the principal debt. They were not bound to apply it in extinction of the annuities or interest due on the collateral securities, which they were entitled to keep up as debts against the estate to their full extent as securities for payment of the principal sum (Johnston, 20th July 1610, Dict. 3035; Ersk. b. iii. tit. 4. sec. 24, 26, 27).

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this case, which was argued before your Lordships some considerable time since, involves a question which appears not to be a subject of much discussion in Scotland, but which is not of unfrequent occurrence in this country, the contest being between different incumbrances on an estate which was made the subject of a family settlement in the year 1811. It appears that the father of the author of that settlement had contracted various debts, which he had made charges upon the estate to which he was absolutely entitled. In 1811 the settlement was made, under which interests are claimed by the younger branches of the family, those parties contesting with a creditor of a subsequent date, that is, of the year 1817, for a sum of £25,000; the contest not being with respect to the instrument creating the debt of £25,000, but between the family, who claim under the settlement of 1811, and the creditor for £25,000, who, in addition to the security which he had taken from the then owner of the estate, had assigned to him the securities for a debt anterior to the year 1811, namely, four securities, one of the year 1804, another of 1810, another of 1807, and another of [123] 1808; and the question is, whether as between the parties claiming under the settlement, and the creditor for £25,000 under the instrument of 1817, that creditor for £25,000 is entitled to avail himself of the securities for the debt anterior to 1811? The author of this settlement was absolutely entitled to the estate. If he had not been absolutely entitled to the estate according to the law of Scotland and to the law of this country, there can be no doubt that on paying off the prior debts it would be competent to such a party to deal with these securities, either for his own benefit or for the purpose of conferring a prior claim on other creditors to whom he might become indebted; but the question is, whether he, being the absolute owner of the estate, under the circumstances which appear upon these proceedings, was entitled, by assigning these prior securities to the creditor of 1817, to give him a priority over those who claim under the settlement of 1811.

My Lords, if the case had simply been that the owner of the estate had paid off those debts and taken the assignment for his own benefit, then a question would have arisen under the law of Scotland, which appears not to have been the subject of discussion in that country. I find that the Lord President and the other Judges differ in opinion as to that, and no case was cited at your Lordships' bar, or appears to have been cited below, as to what would have been the effect of an assignment under these circumstances. In this country the law would have been perfectly well known, inasmuch as it has been the subject of decision, that, as between parties claiming incumbrances on an estate, the owner of the estate being absolutely entitled [124] to it subject to charges, if he pays off the prior charges cannot set up those prior charges for his own benefit as against those who claim subsequent incumbrances upon the estate. My Lords, upon the view I take of this case, after a careful examination of all the papers and all the facts as they appeared before the Court of Session, it does not appear to me that your Lordships will be called upon to consider that question, because one proposition appears to be common to the law of both countries, namely, that if a subsequent incumbrancer advances money, and it is part of his contract that he shall have an assignment of the prior incumbrance, that then he is entitled to stand in the place of that party whose debt is paid off by the money which he advances, and whose incumbrance he procures to be assigned to himself.

One difficulty in this case is, to ascertain accurately and satisfactorily out of what funds these prior incumbrances were paid off; because it is quite clear that the four several securities became the subject of regular conveyance from party to party, without ever having come into the hands of the owner of the estate, Mr. Macleod, but having come certainly into the hands of a Mr. Dallas, who was a trustee and agent for Mr. Macleod. The title to the securities is transferred from the original creditors to other persons, then to Mr. Dallas, then to Mr. Inglis, and ultimately to Mr. Grant, through whom the parties claim the title to the £25,000. Looking, therefore, to the titles as they appear upon the record, the present claimant would appear to be entitled to these incumbrances, which we find vested in certain creditors of debts anterior to the date of the settlement; for instance, [125] one of the securities was a security of December 1810, which was a heritable bond for £1500 granted to Mr. Dallas, but not in his character of trustee for Mr. Macleod, but, upon the face of it, as trustee for a person of the name of Bowie. It appears that in 1813,—that is after the settlement, and therefore after the intervention of the now contending claim,—Dallas conveyed to Bowie, son of the party for whom he was originally trustee; that in 1815 Bowie was paid; and in 1817 Bowie conveyed again to Dallas, it then appearing upon the face of the instrument that he had been paid, and it being stated that Dallas had paid that £1500. From Dallas the security was conveyed to Inglis, from Inglis to Grant, and from Grant the present parties derive their title. I have stated the history of that incumbrance as being one of the most simple; and it is unnecessary for me to occupy your Lordships' time in tracing the others, which are, some of them, more complicated in their nature; but the same observation applies to them all,—that they are traced from hand to hand, none of them distinctly coming into the hands of Mr. Macleod.

Then, my Lords, it is said that though they never came into the hands of Mr. Macleod they came into the hands of Dallas, and that they came into the hands of Mr. Inglis, who succeeded Mr. Dallas as agent and trustee for the Macleod family; and that it is therefore the same thing, whether we trace the securities into the hands of Mr. Dallas the trustee, or into the hands of Mr. Macleod, the cestuique trust. My Lords, as I observed in the commencement, if the question turned upon that it would be necessary for your Lordships to consider how the rule of law ought to be laid down as appli-[126]-cable to these transactions in Scotland; but if, although the securities became vested in Mr. Dallas, who was in fact the trustee for Mr. Macleod, your Lordships have reason to believe, and you are satisfied, that they did not come into the hands of Dallas as trustee for Mr. Macleod, namely, as being the agent who applied the money of Mr. Macleod for the purpose of paying off those incumbrances,—but that it was part of the specific transaction that the other parties who were to advance the money should, for their better security, have that money applied in the payment off of the prior securities, and that they should have an assignment of the securities so paid off, it does not appear that there is any difference between the law of this country and of Scotland upon that subject; but that the law of either of the two countries is, that the party advancing the money would be entitled to have the benefit of the securities paid off with that money, and of which he had obtained an assignment.

My Lords, this creates some difficulty in investigating the facts of the case, inasmuch as it is not very easy to reconcile the dates with the supposition of Mr. Grant's money, in the latter instance, and Mr. Newte's money, in the first instance, having been applied in paying off and satisfying those prior incumbrances. But in dealing with the facts upon which the evidence is not very satisfactory, your Lordships will take into your consideration on whom the burden lies of proving the fact one way or the other. I have stated to your Lordships, that according to the conveyances they are all traced from hand to hand, from those who were clearly entitled to hold them as against those interested under the settlement until they come into [127] the hands of those now claiming under the settlement. Assuming for that purpose Dallas to be a stranger, and not affected by his character of trustee of Mr. Macleod, the title therefore apparently is good, and it lies upon those who impeach that apparent title to show that those parties, some of them at least,—Dallas, for instance, was not entitled to hold these adversely to those claiming under the settlement, because he was trustee for Mr. Macleod. Now, if those who are to impeach the prima facie title have not satisfactorily made out a case which would justify your Lordships in considering that prima facie title as affected by anything appearing upon the record, the title of course will stand, because there is no case in equity to affect that legal right.

Now, in the first place, nothing can be more improbable than that which must be assumed as fact in order to suppose Dallas to have held simply as trustee for Mr. Macleod. It appears that this was a property very much incumbered; it is very evident that the owner of the estate was subsisting in fact by means of what he derived from the estate; he was not a man who had much command of money, and when it was necessary to procure money for the purpose of paying off one incumbrance he was under the necessity of applying elsewhere for a loan of money in order to do it. In short there is nothing which appears to render it probable that Mr. Macleod, the owner of the estate, had money to put into the hands of Dallas, as his agent, to pay off these incumbrances. In some cases,—in the case of the £10,000 procured in the year 1813 from Newte, out of which several prior incumbrances were paid, it is on the face of it stated that the £10,000 was applied [128] in paying off Mr. Howard's incumbrance of £2000 in part; and other advances are subject to the same observation. But then, again, if we merely look to the dates, it will not be very easy to reconcile them with the supposed history of the transaction. But of that fact there is no doubt, because it is actually recited upon the face of the deeds; and when we come to Mr. Grant, who advances £25,000, there is a great discrepancy between the dates as they appear and the supposed period at which the money must have been advanced to pay off the prior incumbrances. But there is an account stated in the papers showing the periods at which Grant advanced part of the money, and there is a memorandum which shows that although the money came under the administration of Dallas in the first instance, and of Inglis afterwards, that it was money not put into their hands as the money of Mr. Macleod, but put into their hands as money to be applied for the purpose of paying off the prior incumbrances with a view to the security of Mr. Grant, who was advancing the £25,000. It appears, for instance, that in November, 1817, £3200 was advanced, and that at subsequent periods, going through the latter end of 1817 and into January 1818, other sums were advanced, in the January of 1818 the sum of £10,000 being advanced; and there is this note:—"The loan, with deduction of the £3200 received on 3d November, was lodged with the Commercial Bank of that date, on their note payable on demand to Mr. Grant's agents and deposited with J. R. and W., with declaration of trust that the money was to be employed at our joint sight in paying off certain existing incumbrances." Now that corresponds with the statements in some of the deeds, [129] and is not met by any evidence on the other side, except that which might be derived from the different periods at which the securities appear to have been executed.

Now, that undoubtedly may to a certain degree be accounted for by the necessity of having the money at command before the prior incumbrances could be bought up; and of course those who had the prior incumbrances were not likely to part with the legal security unless they had the money in hand which was to be the purchase money of those securities. But whatever difficulty there may be in reconciling the case, I have in vain looked for any evidence on the part of those interested under the settlement to shake that which not only is the probable state of the case, but which is actually proved to be the case in more instances than one, and which from the memorandum which I have now read appears to have been the course adopted, as naturally might be expected, namely, that the parties advancing the money put the money in medio, not in the possession of the debtor Mr. Macleod, but under the control of persons, and in trust till it could be applied for the purpose for which it was intended, namely, buying up the prior incumbrances, which were to be assigned to the new creditor.

My Lords, in the Court below there was a difference of opinion: the Lord President differed in opinion from the three other learned judges, and in delivering his judgment his Lordship says:—"I consider this case to be attended with great difficulty; there are questions of much nicety involved, but the inclination of my opinion is that the collateral securities were extinguished at the time the original debts contained in them were paid and the debts and securities [190] conveyed to Dallas. It is not disputed that Dallas was the mere trustee of Mr. Macleod." Now, it was not disputed that Dallas was the trustee of Mr. Macleod: he was in one sense undoubtedly acting as the trustee of Mr. Macleod, but it is quite contrary to the whole evidence in the case to assume that he was the mere trustee of Mr. Macleod in this transaction, and that money in the hands of Dallas was as if it had been in the hands of Mr. Macleod. But, however, the Lord President appears to have considered that such was the result of the evidence:—"Dallas did not advance funds of his own in paying off the debts of Mr. Macleod which were conveyed to him; these debts were paid off with money borrowed by Mr. Macleod under a new loan." His Lordship there says, that the fact was satisfactorily proved to his mind that the debts were paid off with money advanced. Now, if that were the real state of the transaction it is perfectly incredible to suppose that the party advancing the money, intending that the old securities should be bought up, should put that under the control of Mr. Macleod: the two propositions are perfectly irreconcilable with each other; and "it seems to me that matters are substantially in the same situation as if Mr. Macleod, being debtor in various heritable debts, had borrowed money, paid the debts, and been assigned to them." Undoubtedly, if he had done that, there would have been no title in the parties to stand in the situation of original creditors. But that not only is not proved, but the converse appears, as far as the evidence goes, to be satisfactorily established, and it is that which, according to the ordinary dealings between man and man, would have been the course of [131] proceeding. "But if that had been the precise shape of the transaction it is difficult for me to understand how he could thereby keep up the debts and securities against himself and his fee simple estate. I never heard of such an attempt having been made: it is quite different where there is an entailed estate."

The other learned judges differ in opinion from his Lordship, and seem to me to put it upon a ground which is much more satisfactory, much more consistent with the evidence as it appeared before the Court, and much more free from any of those violent suppositions which must be entertained if you suppose the party to have advanced the money, not taking care to have it kept safe till it was applied in buying up the securities, but putting it at once into the hands of the debtor; the effect of which would have been, that, having no security whatever for the payment off of the prior incumbrances, the £25,000 would have been advanced not only without the security of the earlier deeds, but actually subject both to the incumbrances under the settlement and the charges to the prior creditors. Mr. Grant, and those who acted for him in advancing £25,000 upon the estate although encumbered by creditors to a very great extent and by the charges of the settlement, must be supposed to have advanced that money not only without taking care to stand in the place of the original creditors, but to come third, namely, after the prior creditors and after those named in the prior settlement, inasmuch as he, whatever he might have intended, would have no security for being paid till the other parties had been paid out of the money so advanced.

Now, my Lords, that supposition appears to me [132] to be very incredible, and to be contrary to the evidence, as far as it can be considered as proving the nature of the transactions between the parties; and it is contrary to what is proved by some of the deeds; and though there is some confusion in the evidence with respect to the dates, yet I cannot think that your Lordships would feel yourselves safe in proceeding upon an assumption which is totally different from that which appears to be the nature of the transaction in those particulars, so far as you are able to trace it. Upon the law there is no question, because, independently of that point to which I have adverted, which appears to me not to arise in this case, there is no doubt that if the money was advanced for the purpose of taking up the prior securities,—that being part of the contract,—and if the money was applied to that purpose, and those prior securities were afterwards conveyed and assigned to the parties advancing that money, there is no doubt that the original incumbrances existed, and existed for the benefit of the parties who had advanced the £25,000; and beyond question they would be entitled to preference over those who claim under the settlement.

My Lords, it is said that this is a case of great hardship upon those who claim under the settlement. That argument will not influence your Lordships in your decision upon this case, because that decision must be regulated by the principles of law. But it is not easy to see how the hardship exists: the other parties take under the prior incumbrances, which were effectual for the benefit of those who were the original creditors, namely, Mr. Howard and other persons who held the securities anterior to the date of the settlement: the [133] interests of those claiming under the settlement are not prejudiced by having the securities transferred to other persons; they come with an equal degree of priority upon the estate; whether Mr. Howard claims his debt, or whether those who now claim the benefit of that incumbrance stand in his place, their interest is the same.

My Lords, there is one other question, and only one, to which I will call your Lordships' attention, though it was one not much pressed in the argument, and does not appear to me to create any difficulty in the decision: it is with reference to the interest of those securities. The original debt of £25,000 had interest paid up to a certain time,—the date is not material; the securities were assigned; but it appears there was an omission in the assignment, and there being arrears of interest due upon those securities, it was not until a subsequent period, I think in the year 1834, that the arrears of interest were assigned upon the securities which had been the subject of a prior conveyance. One point which is made is, that the interest which had been paid upon the £25,000 ought to be applied in reduction of the interest upon the securities, and not in reduction of the interest upon the £25,000, the effect of which of course would be to increase the debt and diminish the securities; whereas it is obviously the interest of those who claim the benefit of the £25,000 to reduce the debt and increase the securities. What appears to me to be a very satisfactory answer, provided the facts were such as to make it necessary to give that answer, is, that the party receiving interest or receiving any money,—there being two accounts to either of which it may be applied, is entitled to refer it to that one for [134] which he has the least available security, and of course it would be his interest to apply it to the £25,000, and not to the reduction of the securities for that £25,000. It appears to me that there is another answer to the argument raised against the party now claiming under the £25,000, namely, that the interest was paid, and paid upon the £25,000, anterior to the period at which the securities were assigned. The interest ran upon the securities, and increased the debt secured by those instruments; it was an addition to the heritable bond; it was an additional charge upon the estate; and when they were assigned to the parties now claiming the benefit of them, it was an assignment of that which the parties to whom they were assigned, not having had the possession of, even if they had been compelled so to do, had not the means of applying in satisfaction of the interest of the £25,000. It appears to me, therefore, that they did not come into hands which could have applied them in satisfaction of the interest of the £25,000; and if they had, the party receiving that interest was undoubtedly entitled to apply it in satisfaction of that debt for which he had the least available security. My Lords, under these circumstances, though it could have been wished that the facts had been such as would have enabled your Lordships to come to a more clear and satisfactory conclusion, yet it does appear to me that there is quite sufficient evidence to lead your Lordships to the conclusion, that the decision of the majority of the learned judges of the Court below is right and that the present interlocutor ought to be affirmed.

My Lords, there having been a division of opinion in the Court below, perhaps your Lordships will be [135] of opinion that the interlocutor should be affirmed, but with no costs.

It is ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutor, so far as therein complained of, be and the same is hereby affirmed, without costs.

[136] APPEAL FROM COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

MATTHEW MONTGOMERIE, Assignee of JOHNSTONE or CURRIE and others,
Appellant.—Pemberton—Sandford; Sir JAMES BOSWELL, Baronet, Respondent.—Attorney General (Campbell)—Maconochie [23d April 1839].

Practice—Jury Trial.—In an action, in which the main question in dispute was, whether a party had intromitted with his father's effects, the Lord Ordinary found, 1st, "That further investigation is necessary;" and, 2d, "That no sufficient cause is assigned for departing from the general rule for ascertaining disputed questions of fact;" and therefore remitted the cause to the Jury Roll. On reclaiming, the Court refused the desire of the note as incompetent; Quoad ultra, of consent recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary hoc statu, in so far as it contains findings in the cause, and remitted to proceed as shall be just. An application was then made to retransmit the cause to the Ordinary Roll of the Court of Session, which was refused. On reclaiming, the interlocutor refusing was recalled, and the Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to retransmit the cause to his Lordship's Court of Session Roll, and to order a proof by commission. The House of Lords reversed the judgment, but on the ground that the Lord Ordinary was right in directing a trial by jury, as the question was one which it was fit and proper so to try.

Question, whether an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary directing trial by jury in an unenumerated cause can competently be submitted to review?

[137] The late Sir Alexander Boswell of Auchinleck was at the time of his death, in March 1822, indebted to Alexander Boswell, writer to the signet, in the sum of £2794 10s. 8d.

At the date of his death Sir Alexander was possessed of the entailed estate of Auchinleck and also of unentailed heritable property to a considerable extent.

Sir James Boswell, son and heir of Sir Alexander, made a proposal to the personal creditors of his deceased father, under which he offered to pay them a certain composition, on condition of his obtaining a discharge, and being thereby enabled to take up the whole succession of his father unburdened by any claim of personal debt.

In pursuance of this arrangement, Sir James paid the greater proportion of the creditors the stipulated composition, with the exception of Mr. Alexander Boswell, who refused to accept.

The appellant, Mr. Montgomerie, being a creditor of Mr. Alexander Boswell, used arrestments in the hands of Sir James Boswell of all sums due by him to the said Alexander, either personally or as representing his late father; and these arrestments were followed up by an action of multiplepinding.

It having been made a question in this action whether Sir James Boswell represented his father, a commission for recovery of written documents was granted in the course of the proceedings, and the Lord Ordinary after hearing parties pronounced the following interlocutor:—"19th December 1835.—Finds, that the question mainly in dispute between the parties is the question of fact, whether or not the nominal raiser of the multiplepoinding and defender in the furth-[138]-coming, Sir James Boswell, intromitted with the unentailed property and effects of his late father Sir Alexander Boswell: finds, that Mr. Montgomerie, the real raiser, and the pursuer of the furthcoming, declines to confine himself to the evidence in support of his case already recovered under the diligence formerly granted: finds, that no sufficient ground has been stated for departing in this case from the usual course for ascertaining disputed questions of fact, and therefore remits the case to the jury roll."

* 14 D., B., and M., 378; ibid. 681; 16 S. C., D. and B., 395; ibid. 1086.

Against this interlocutor Sir James Boswell presented a reclaiming note to the First Division of the Court, praying their Lordships "to recall the remit to the jury roll, and to remit to the Lord Ordinary with directions to grant a diligence to both parties, and to grant a commission for a proof, in so far as the testimony of witnesses may be offered or required by either party."

On this reclaiming note their Lordships pronounced the following interlocutor: "29th January 1836.—Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and remit to his Lordship to grant diligences to the parties, or to grant a commission for proof, or to proceed otherwise in the cause as to his Lordship shall seem just."

The appellant, Mr. Montgomerie, being apprehensive that this interlocutor might be held, in the circumstances, entirely to preclude his being allowed the benefit of a trial by jury in the case, presented a petition for leave to appeal as from an interlocutory judgment; and the following interlocutor was then pronounced: "10th March 1836.—The Lords having [139] advised this petition with answers thereto, and heard counsel, refuse the desire of this petition, in respect that, according to the true meaning of the interlocutor remitting the cause to the Lord Ordinary, diligence should in the first place be granted for recovering documentary evidence; and that on considering such evidence the Lord Ordinary should judge whether any farther investigation should proceed by a proof on commission or otherwise."

The case having returned to the Lord Ordinary, a fresh commission for recovery of written documents was granted; and parties having been again heard, the following interlocutor was pronounced by his Lordship: "5th December 1837.—In respect that the pursuer does not confine himself to the written evidence now in process, but demands a farther proof by witnesses, and that the defender does not maintain that the said written evidence is such as to exclude parole proof, finds that farther investigation is necessary; and finds that no sufficient cause is assigned by the defender for departing from the general rule for ascertaining disputed questions of fact, and therefore remits the case to the jury roll." *

* " Note.—The question between the parties is truly a question of fact, viz. whether or not Sir James Boswell, the defender in the action of forthcoming and the nominal raiser in the multiplepoinding, took possession of the unentailed property of his late father Sir Alexander Boswell and intromitted with his personal effects. Under the diligence originally granted, and that which has been since issued agreeably to the remit from the Court, a vast mass of papers, consisting of letters, vouchers, and accounts, has been recovered. But, on the one hand, Mr. Montgomerie, who is truly the pursuer, states that he does not confine himself to that written evidence, and proposes to fortify it by the examination of witnesses; on the other, it is not contended by Sir James Boswell that the documents are conclusive of his defence, and are such as to exclude parole proof. There being no doubt, then, that some farther investigation is necessary, the only point is, whether it shall proceed by jury trial or by proof on commission.

"In considering this point it must be kept in view, in the first place, that this is not a case in which both parties concur in resorting to a proof by commission; and secondly, that the jury trial is demanded by the pursuer, who manifestly has a legitimate interest to insist in a course of investigation peremptory in its forms and conclusive in its results, in preference to that required by the defender, which in practice admits of being indefinitely protracted, while the conclusion of it only forms the opening of a litigation on its import competent in every successive tribunal from that of the Lord Ordinary to the Court of last resort.

"In these circumstances the Lord Ordinary thinks that nothing short of a conviction that the case was absolutely unfit for the consideration of a jury would warrant

[140] Against this interlocutor Sir James Boswell again reclaimed to their Lordships of the First Division, and the following interlocutor was pronounced: "27th January 1838.—The Lords having advised this [141] reclaiming note, and heard counsel for the parties, refuse the desire thereof as incompetent, in so far as it reclaims against an order remitting the cause to the jury roll. Quoad ultra, of consent recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary hoc statu, in so far as it contains findings in the cause; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as shall be just."

The case having again returned to the Lord Ordinary, the respondent, Sir James Boswell, moved that the cause should be retransmitted from the jury roll to the ordinary roll of the Court of Session. The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor: "14th February 1838.—The Lord Ordinary, having heard parties procurators on the motion of the defender to retransmit the case to the ordinary roll on the ground that it involves matters which cannot be satisfactorily investigated by a jury, in respect that the pursuer does not confine himself to the written evidence now in process, but demands a further proof by witnesses, and that the defender does not maintain that the said written evidence is such as to exclude parole proof, finds that further investigation is [142] necessary; and finds that no sufficient cause is assigned by the defender for departing from the general rule for ascertaining disputed questions of fact by the verdict of a jury, and therefore refuses the motion." * him to depart from the ordinary course; and after hearing the matter argued, he remains of the opinion that there is no sufficient ground for refusing the pursuer's motion.

"In the first place, though there are now recovered and put into process on the part of the pursuer an enormous collection of papers, which from their nature might perhaps afford the materials of a very intricate accounting, that does not appear to be the true character of the inquiry. There is no question here as to the amount of the intromissions with which the pursuer is charged, and no pecuniary result, in the proper sense of the term, is sought to be inferred from these papers by the pursuer. The only point which he seeks to establish is, that the defender took possession of the unentailed estate and personal property of the late Sir Alexander Boswell. The Lord Ordinary understands, that these documents, or part of them, are to be adduced in support of that averment, and, for any thing yet seen, the use to be made of those materials may be such as to render a very limited selection of them necessary; and the combined investigation of them and of the parole evidence of the factors, managers, or other witnesses examined in relation to them may turn out to be a much more convenient and satisfactory procedure for reaching the truth than a proof by commission.

"Secondly, the demand of the pursuer is unquestionably agreeable to the general rule, sanctioned by statute, for the investigation of disputed matters of fact; and it would seem inexpedient and improper to adopt a different course in opposition to that demand, founded on what at best must be but a presumptive and hypothetical view of his case. The Lord Ordinary is not entitled to anticipate, and the pursuer cannot be called upon, at present, prospectively to open the kind of case he is to submit to the jury; and when the proper time comes for his doing so, and if it shall turn out from the statement for the pursuer that it is utterly unsuited for the consideration and determination of a jury, experience has shown that there are practically the means of obliging the pursuer to withdraw his case from that tribunal, and to adopt a course of investigation better fitted to do justice between the parties.

"On these grounds the Lord Ordinary does not conceive himself warranted in refusing the pursuer's motion for a remit to the jury roll."

* "Note.—As by the former interlocutor of the 5th of December 1837 the Lord Ordinary did not merely remit the case to the jury roll subject to the contingency of being retransmitted, but found expressly, after an argument on the point, that it was fit for the consideration of a jury, he considered that the interlocutor might be competently brought under review,—and indeed he so expressed it,—for the very purpose of enabling the defender to take the opinion of the Court, as had been done before. But as that procedure was found incompetent, and as the question has now been again raised in the form of motion to retransmit to the ordinary roll, he sees no reason to alter his former opinion; and therefore repeats the interlocutor, mutatis mutandis, and the reasons given in his former note."

Against this interlocutor Sir James Boswell reclaimed to the First Division of the Court, and their Lordships pronounced the following judgment: "12th May 1838.—The Lords having considered this reclaiming note, and heard counsel for the parties, alter the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to retransmit the cause to his Lordship's Court of Session roll, and to order a proof by commission."

Against this interlocutor the appellant appealed.

The parties put in issue the general question of competency of reviewing a Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ordering a cause to be tried by jury, but the House of Lords reversed, simply on the ground that the Court were in error in considering the question between the parties not fit to be tried by jury. An analysis of the statutes bearing upon the general question, with some valuable observations, will be found at the close of the Lord Chancellor's speech.

[143] Appellant.—1. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was incompetently altered, inasmuch as under the statutes passed with reference to jury trial in Scotland the appointment by his Lordship of a jury trial was final and conclusive.

The temporary statute 55 Geo 3, c. 42, which established trial by jury in Scotland in ordinary civil causes, was superseded by the 59 Geo. 3, c. 35, which permanently created the jury court.

By the first section of this act it was rendered imperative on the Lord Ordinary to remit certain specified cases (being all of the nature of actions of damages) to the jury court in order to be tried by a jury; by the fourth section it was declared to be discretionary to the Lord Ordinary also to remit all other cases in like manner, and by the fifteenth section it is declared incompetent to bring under review the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor making such remit.

Then followed the 6 Geo. 4, c. 120, the fifteenth section of which provides in express terms, "that where the parties differ as to facts which require to be ascertained by jury trial, the Lord Ordinary shall have it in his power either to remit the whole cause to the jury court for trial, or to send to that court a particular issue or issues, in order to have such matter of fact ascertained as he may deem necessary for deciding the cause; and the order by the Lord Ordinary, in so far as it thus remits a cause, shall be final."

The next statute bearing upon the point is the 1 Will. 4, c. 69, by which the jury court was entirely abolished as a separate tribunal: it was declared, "that the jurisdiction for trial by jury in civil causes [144] shall be united with and shall form part of the ordinary administration of justice in the Court of Session in Scotland." Since the passing of this act, in place of there being a jury court to which cases were transmitted by the Lords Ordinary, each Lord Ordinary has possessed a jury roll, to which causes appropriated to jury trial are remitted by him; he himself thereafter proceeding to mature these cases for trial in the same way in which the now abolished jury court would have done.

Where the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary remits a case to the jury roll on the ground of its being proper for jury trial, no reclaiming note to the Inner House is competent against that interlocutor; and this being so, it is difficult to perceive how the power of review should be gained merely by directing the reclaiming note against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary refusing to retransmit the case to the Court of Session roll as unfit for jury trial. The refusal to retransmit is in fact, like the remit itself, a finding by the Lord Ordinary that the case must be tried by jury. The twelfth section of the 59 Geo. 3, c. 35, which appears to have given rise to some misapprehension in the Court of Session, does not apply, as the jury court has ceased to exist as a separate tribunal.

2. Supposing the Inner House had a discretionary power of review, the interlocutor was erroneously altered, inasmuch as the case was an apt and proper one for a jury trial, and not for a proof on a commission.

In order to entitle the respondent to obtain the judgment under appeal, the onus lay upon him to prove in a clear and satisfactory manner that the case was one which was not fitted for trial by jury. The [145] general rule established by the statutes, and by the practice of the Court of Session following on those statutes, unquestionably is, that all cases involving disputed matters of fact must be tried by jury; and in order to withdraw any individual case from a jury, it is necessary to substantiate good and sufficient reasons for holding that case to form an exception to the general rule; the now settled system of the Court of Session is to send all cases involving disputed matters of fact to a jury, unless very sufficient grounds are shown for an opposite course.

This case is of a character which renders it peculiarly fitted for the cognizance of a jury, as it is one in which the whole question is substantially one of fact, and hinges upon the mere fact of intromission by the respondent with the estate and effects of the deceased Sir Alexander Boswell his father. Assuming that a question of law might arise, this forms no reason whatever why the case should not be tried by jury, for in almost every case which is tried by jury a question or questions of law are involved; and as cases are sent for trial on a general issue, there can scarcely occur one in which there is not matter of law for the direction of the judge; and if this were a reason for withdrawing cases from the cognizance of a jury, there would be scarcely a single case tried. So little has the objection now considered weighed in the practice of the Court with reference to a case of the present kind, that the very issue of vitious intromission, out of which a question of law too delicate for a jury is supposed to arise, is in use to be sent to trial as matter of ordinary course. A case is reported in which the issue runs in these identical words:—"Whether [146] subsequent to the death of the said Robert Penman the defenders or any of them vitiously intromitted with the funds and effects of the said Robert Penman?" (Kerrs and Co. v. Penman, 11th Jan. 1830; Murray's Jury Reports, vol. v. p. 143).

The mere amount of documents recovered under a commission in the preparation of a cause forms no sort of test whatever of the extent to which these documents will afterwards be used in the actual trial; the commission forms the mere instrument for the recovery of such documents as by possibility may be used on the trial. It is employed to recover all manner of writings, without any discrimination, in the first instance, between what is admissible and what is inadmissible evidence; and from this mass the selection is made at the trial, of what is to be given in as evidence; and in this way a very large mass of recoveries often presents the smallest possible extent of actual available documents (Ersk. b. iii. tit. 9, sec. 49, 53, and note; Macfarlane, Practice in Jury Causes; Scott v. Lord Belhaven, 25th May 1821; Forbes v. Forbes, 12th June 1823; Bald v. Kerr, 19th June 1837, 3 Sh. and Maclean, 1; Sir Gibson Craig v. Sir Wm. Rae, 5th Feb. 1822, 1 Shaw, 270, new ed.).

Respondent.—1. It is admitted that by the law and practice of Scotland the Court of Session has power to ascertain disputed facts by ordering a proof to be taken on commission, by remit, or in presentia, in all causes, with the exception of those appropriated to jury trial by special statutes; and it will be kept in view that the Court of Session possesses the powers and jurisdiction both of the Courts of Common Law and the Courts of Equity in England, besides deciding admiralty and consistorial questions, including a vast [147] variety of cases to which trial by jury cannot be beneficially applied.

By the twelfth section of 59 Geo. 3, c. 35, it was provided, "that it shall be competent for the Jury Court, when it appears to the said Court in the course of settling an issue or issues that a case turns upon matter of complicated accounts, or other matter to which trial by jury is not beneficially applicable, to remit back the whole process and productions as aforesaid with their report thereon, in order that the division, Lord Ordinary, or Judge Admiral may proceed with the same in such manner as shall appear to be most expedient for the administration of justice."

By the thirteenth section of the same statute it is expressly declared, "that nothing in this act contained shall extend to prevent the Court of Session in either of its divisions, or the Lords Ordinary (save and except in the cases concluding for damages herein-before enumerated), or the Judge Admiral, unless otherwise instructed as aforesaid by the Court of Session, to take proof on commission by a remit or in presentia, and thereafter disposing of the cause in the manner now practised in such cases."

These provisions shew that the Court has full discretionary power to ascertain disputed facts without resorting to a jury trial in all cases except those specially enumerated in the statute.

The twenty-eighth section of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 120, declared, that the actions there enumerated "shall be held as causes appropriated to the Jury Court, and shall for the purpose of being discussed and determined in that Court be remitted at once to that [148] Court in manner herein-after to be directed." In all other cases the Court of Session was left in possession of full discretionary power to take proof on commission by remit, or in presentid, and the Jury Court was authorized as before to retransmit all causes to which trial by jury was not beneficially applicable. By the 1 Will. 4, cap. 69, trial by jury was united to the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court of Session, and under this statute the whole powers formerly possessed by the Jury Court have been transferred to and are now exercised by the Court of Session.

These statutes do not make it imperative on the Court of Session to send a cause for trial before a jury unless it happen to be one of the enumerated actions which have been expressly appropriated by the legislature to that mode of trial; and this construction of the acts of parliament has never been called in question; on the contrary, it is confirmed by numerous decisions of the Court (Barker, 27th Feb. 1834, 12 S. and D. 500; Kerr, 10th March 1837, 15 D., B., and M., 784; Hutcheson v. Tod, 2 S. and D. 318, affirmed 15th June 1824, 2 Shaw's Appeal Cases, 386; Ralston v. Farquharson, 7 S. and D. 812; Buchanan, 17th Dec. 1836, 15 D. and B. 286).

2. The course of proceeding adopted by the Court of Session in refusing to send this case to be tried before a jury was highly proper and expedient, because the question turns upon an investigation of numerous and complicated accounts and a great and intricate mass of documentary evidence, so that the cause is one to which trial by jury is not beneficially applicable. The terms of the statute 59 Geo. 3, c. 35, itself are a declaration by the legislature, that there are causes to which jury trial is not beneficially applicable, [149] as it has expressly recognised their existence, and given directions for disposing of them.

By the above statute the discretionary power of retransmission to the ordinary roll is still possessed by the Court of Session, and has never been limited or taken away by any of the statutes which regulate the system of jury trial in Scotland; and the respondent submits, that the present case is one which ought to be retransmitted to the ordinary roll of causes in the Court of Session under the provision of the statute now alluded to, because the question in dispute is one to which trial by jury is not beneficially applicable. If there is one case more than another to which jury trial cannot be beneficially applied, it is the case now under consideration. The enormous mass of papers which the appellant has forced into process could not be explained or made intelligible to a jury during the period of a trial; and, therefore, unnecessarily to subject the cause to this form of trial would be to inflict a serious injury upon the parties concerned, and expose the respondent to the hazard of an ill-considered, rash, and unjust judgment. If this cause be sent back to be tried by a jury, various intricate and important questions of law must be brought under the decision of the judge trying it, and among other questions which would arise, there would be one which this House in a recent case thought it necessary to remit back to the Court of Session, viz., the question of vitious intromission by a minor (Kerr v. Bremner, 14th July 1837, 2 Shaw and Maclean, 895).

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, it is unnecessary [150] to state to your Lordships the course of pleadings in this cause, which are complicated; the result, however, of the proceedings in the cause is to raise a question on the part of the appellant, who contends that the respondent, Sir James Boswell, by having intromitted with the estate of Sir Alexander Boswell, has made himself liable for debts due to the appellant as a creditor of that estate. After a voluminous delivery of documents in the cause, the Lord Ordinary considered it a case to be tried by a jury, and accordingly he remitted it to the jury roll for that purpose. There had been an intermediate application to the Court of Session which came to nothing; they considered that at the time it was not proper to be remitted. The Lord Ordinary pursued the inquiry for the purpose of the production of original documents, and then the object of the party having been accomplished by that production he again remitted it to the jury roll to be tried. From that order of the Lord Ordinary the parties appealed to the Inner House, and the judges were of opinion that under the act they had no jurisdiction to interfere with the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; and accordingly they declined to interfere with what he had ordered.

An application was afterwards made to the Lord Ordinary for the purpose of transferring this cause from the jury roll into the Court of Session roll, the effect of which would have been, that it should proceed as a Court of Session cause, and not proceed as a cause to be tried by a jury. The Lord Ordinary, adhering to the opinion he had before expressed, that it was a proper cause to be tried by a jury, refused that application; from which order of his refusing the application, [151] the parties again applied to the Inner House; and the Inner House thought they had jurisdiction to interfere with that order of the Lord Ordinary, and therefore they remitted it back to him with directions to have the cause transferred from the jury roll to the Court of Session roll; which was the main object of the parties who made the application interfering with the order of the Lord Ordinary, and effected the object of the parties, who wished it to be tried by a proceeding in the Court of Session and not by a jury. Against that last order the present appeal is presented.

My Lords, there were two questions discussed at your Lordships' bar: the first was, whether under the section of the act of parliament, the Court of Session had power so to deal with the order of the Lord Ordinary; that is to say, whether by the course adopted they had the power of interfering and altering the decision of the Lord Ordinary directing the cause to be tried by a jury? The second was, whether, if that jurisdiction existed, it was wisely exercised in the particular case in question? I shall call your Lordships' attention to the second point first, because, if your Lordships should agree with me in the opinion I have formed as to the nature of this cause and the proper tribunal before which it should be tried, it will not be necessary for your Lordships to come to any decision upon the first point. The question between the parties is simply this: the appellant says, you the respondent have so dealt with the estate of your father, by interfering with the personal estate and by interfering with the real estate, that you have by the law of Scotland made yourself responsible for all the debts for which your father was liable. That depends upon the fact of how far the [152] respondent has or has not interfered with his father's property.

My Lords, we have in this country a case, not frequently arising, very similar in its nature, namely, a claim made against a party charged as executor; that is, a party who has taken upon himself to interfere with the administration of the effects, and by so doing become responsible to those who have claims against the estate. It is true the law upon the subject is not the same, but the question to be tried is identically the same in both cases; both depending upon the fact how far the party sought to be charged has or has not interfered with the estate of the deceased. The consequences are very different according to the laws of the two countries, but in considering what is the proper tribunal to investigate such claim the question to be tried is very much the same. By the laws of this country, these are questions which are almost uniformly the subject of action, and the subject, therefore, of a trial and investigation before a jury: they turn entirely upon matters of fact. It is true a question of law founded upon those facts may arise, but it is absolutely necessary to ascertain the facts before the law can arise. What degree of interference, and what particular circumstances connected with that interference, will make a party liable as executor for his own acts in this country, and what interference will make a party liable in Scotland who takes upon himself to deal with the estate of his ancestor without authority so to do, will be matter of law; but, speaking of intromission, the circumstances connected with it are purely matter of fact, to be established by the evidence of those who can speak to them, or by the production of documents [153] by which it will appear what course has been adopted. There has been a large production of documents, which has been complained of on both sides. On the part of the appellant it has been complained that those who were called upon to produce documents had taken upon themselves to introduce many which were not required; but they say, you asked for all documents, and all documents you shall have. The party seeking the documents says, there have been more produced than were required; as on the part of those ordered to produce it is said, there has been an extravagant use of the power the Court gives of calling for the production of documents. Undoubtedly in point of number a great many have been produced, but for the purpose to which they may be used in investigating the facts it is very likely that very few will be required, except such documents as may prove the act of the respondent in interfering with the estate of the deceased. There is no question of accounts which can arise in the course of this cause. The mode in which particular sums have been dealt with,—whether, for instance, they have been received by a factor or an agent,—whether they have been received by that factor or agent on account of the estate, and assuming an authority to interfere with the estate,—or whether they were received by the factor or agent as dealing with the party sought to be charged, namely, the respondent, and acting for him,—may be undoubtedly ascertained by reference to some of those documents; but the purpose for which these documents have been used, and the character in which the property has been interfered with, are undoubtedly facts to be tried between those parties.

My Lords, the judges of the Inner House appear to [154] have been impressed up to the last with a conclusive opinion that this was not a case to be tried by a jury, but that it was expedient to carry the investigation further, in order that it might be ascertained whether reference to a jury should be ultimately necessary or not. My Lords, there is a marked difference between the course the statutes prescribe to the Court of Session, in directing cases to be tried by a jury, and that which prevails in courts of equity in this country. The courts of equity in this country, except in cases where the question of devisavit vel non arises, exercise their own judgment first upon the matters proved, and they resort to reference to a jury only, where, from the facts brought in the course of the hearing before it, the Court feels that it cannot come to a satisfactory conclusion. Then it is in the habit of sending an issue to be tried in order that the facts may be investigated by the vivâ voce examination of witnesses in the presence of a jury, and the finding of the jury upon that evidence may give the Court better information upon the facts than the Court might be able to obtain by the mere production of the documents. But the acts of parliament with reference to the Courts of Scotland do not look to that course of proceeding; they enumerate certain actions in which proceedings by trial before a jury are directed without any discretion to be exercised by the Court; then in all other cases it is left to the discretion of the Court; but not to the discretion of the Court, after the Court itself has endeavoured to ascertain the facts and to decide upon them, but to a discretion to be exercised according to the nature of the case and the issue joined between the parties; that discretion being exclusively in the first instance to be exercised [155] by the Lord Ordinary, unless he feels it necessary from the difficulty of the case not to decide the case himself, but to report to the Inner House.

The first question to be considered is, what is the issue between these parties? Now, in looking through the case as stated on the one side and the other, there is no doubt that the safest way of ascertaining that, is, by referring to one or two statements to be found in the proceedings in the Court below and the mode in which these statements were made; and I think your Lordships will have no difficulty in saying that the whole question to be tried is, how far the respondent in this case has or has not intromitted, and under what circumstances he has intromitted, with the estate of the party in question?

My Lords, in the revised condescendence of Mathew Montgomerie, the appellant, there is this statement:—"Sir Alexander Boswell also left behind him moveable property and funds to a large extent. This comprehended a valuable library and household furniture, and also a right to a large sum of money, estimated at £3500, part of the fortune which came to him with Lady Boswell his wife, which was payable on the death of a Mrs. Cumming, then a very old lady." This article is denied, with the exception "that Sir Alexander Boswell was possessed of a library and household furniture, which were sold by the late Mr. Hamilton Douglas Boswell, the executor creditor of Sir Alexander. It is admitted also that Sir Alexander Boswell had a reversionary right, which was lately recovered by Mrs. Hamilton Douglas Boswell, the executrix creditor of Sir Alexander, for behoof of Sir Alexander's creditors, and which [156] amounted to about £2300 sterling. The respondent believes that the whole of Sir Alexander's personal funds and property were considerable." The fifth article of the condescendence is in these terms:—"On Sir Alexander Boswell's death the nominal pursuer Sir James Boswell, his son and apparent heir, by himself or by others on his behalf intromitted with the whole or with part of the moveable property left by his father, taking possession of and realizing the same, and paying therefrom alleged claims and debts to some extent." The answer to that is: "The statements in this article are wholly unfounded and are expressly denied."

The next allegation is in these terms:—"In regard to the unentailed heritable property of the deceased, the nominal raiser Sir John Boswell also by himself or by others in his behalf entered into possession thereof in whole or in part, and drew the rents. In or about the month of October 1822, a deed of factory was executed by Sir James, under which the rents were collected by the factor appointed by him and accounted for to him or his agents; more particularly there were so drawn the rents of the before-mentioned lands of Willochshill, Dalgere, and Howford, over which there was no heritable burden, and to which there was no title on the part of any one, except that possessed by Sir James on his apparency." The answer to which is: "The statements here made are also untrue, and are denied."

The next allegation is, "That in the year 1824, and in or about the month of October thereof, arrangements were made between the creditors of Sir Alexander Boswell and the pursuer, or those acting for [157] his behoof, under which a dividend of 2s. per pound was paid to the personal creditors of Sir Alexander. In the scheme of division Mr. Alexander Boswell was, after having made affidavit to the debt, ranked as a creditor for the above-mentioned sum of £2794 10s. 8d., and on the 11th of January 1825 he drew the sum of £276 18s. 4d., being the dividend corresponding to the said claim;" therefore charging the present Sir James Boswell as a party in the arrangement. The answer to that is: "It is denied that any arrangement whatever as there stated was entered into between the creditors of Sir Alexander Boswell and the respondent. The respondent believes that a scheme of division of part of the personal estate of Sir Alexander Boswell was made up by Mrs. Hamilton Douglas Boswell, the executrix creditor of Sir Alexander Boswell, and in that scheme Mr. Alexander Boswell was ranked for the claims here set forth, and drew the dividend stated," but not under his authority. This, therefore, leaves no doubt as to what is the nature of the case. There is a further statement in the condescendence, thus: "In consequence of the said transaction Sir James Boswell not only acquired right to the other personal funds of Sir Alexander Boswell, mentioned in the said letter of 1828, but has actually realized the same to a considerable extent, and in particular a sum of not less than £2300." That is also denied.

My Lords, upon this view of the case it appears, therefore, that the contest between these parties might have been purely a matter of fact, namely, whether Sir James Boswell had or had not done that which these allegations charge him with having done, and [158] which he denies. The Lord Ordinary thought that a proper question for investigation before a jury. I do not find any substantial reason stated why it should not be tried before a jury: if it depends upon documents, the documents may be produced before the jury, or the fact may be proved of his having taken the management of the estate by those who will state whether they had so managed on the authority and under the direction of Sir James Boswell or under other authority; which will exempt him from the consequences of the intromission with the property of the deceased. I see no reason why those facts should not be tried by a jury in Scotland, in the same manner as a question of the same nature would be tried in a cause in this country raising that question. The reasons given by the learned judges who have given an opinion that it should not be tried by a jury appear to rest in a great degree on the supposed difficulty of bringing this case before a jury, arising, as I apprehend, from the suspicion that it is a little complicated, because there has been a great number of documents produced; documents which both parties agree were, by far the greater number of them, wholly inapplicable to the present case.

I find the Lord President says: "I think it clear that a case of this kind should not be sent per aversionem to a jury. It is chiefly written evidence, apparently, that will require to be considered, and in applying the law to the facts of intromission which may thereby appear I think there is no need for the intervention of a jury." Lord Gillies says: "I am not sure but that a general question, whether there has been vitious intromission or not, may not be [159] quite proper for a jury to try, but in this special case I disapprove of the general remit which has been made." Lord Mackenzie says: "I think it would be following an inexpedient course to send this case as it stands to a jury; I think it would be inconvenient for a jury to try. It would be better to allow a proof on commission in supplement of the written evidence, if this should be necessary." Lord Balgray concurred.

My Lords, it appears to me pretty obvious that if the question had been simply whether on such an issue it was proper to refer the case to a jury, the judges would not have come to the conclusion they did after hearing what can be said upon the documents by the counsel on either side. Looking to the nature of the documents, it appears to me that it is scarcely possible that many of them should be submitted to a jury; but even if a large portion of them were to be submitted to a jury, I cannot see any reason why they should not be submitted accompanied with such observations as may be called for in order to enable the jury to come to the right conclusion on the question, whether the one party or the other is justified in the allegations they have made; namely, whether Sir James Boswell has or has not so intromitted with his father's estate?

My Lords, it is very desirable that cases which in their nature are proper to be tried by a jury, should be sent to that tribunal, not only because it would come to a much more speedy conclusion, but that it would generally come to a much more satisfactory conclusion. The parties know the issue to which the case has come, and see whether they can prove it on the one side, and [160] on the other. The Learned Judge who tries the case directs the jury, and if he mistakes there are obvious means of setting that right, instead of incurring the expense and delay which arise from proceedings in the discussion of the evidence submitted to the Court. I see nothing in the nature of the cause, no peculiar circumstances in this case which appear to deprive it of the character of causes which ought to be tried before a jury; therefore, I am of opinion the Lord Ordinary came to a right conclusion upon the form of issue joined between the parties, when he decided that a jury was the proper jurisdiction to which this case should be referred. If your Lordships concur in that opinion it will be decisive of the present case, for all your Lordships have to do is to decide between the opinion expressed by the Lord Ordinary, and the opinion expressed by the judges of the Inner Court who took into consideration the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

My Lords, on the second point, therefore, or rather the first, as it was argued at your Lordships' bar, it will not be necessary to come to any decision, but at the same time I think it right to make some observations on the construction which has been put on the acts of parliament relative to trials by jury in Scotland; because this case exhibits, what one is very sorry to see, a direct contradiction in the proceedings in the very same cause. I will refer presently to the directions in the acts of parliament; but if your Lordships will permit me, I will first call your attention to the two interlocutors as they stand, and nobody can doubt, looking to the acts of parliament, that the object and intent of those who framed those acts of parliament [161] were, that your Lordships should not have to exercise the jurisdiction which you are now called upon to exercise; that the object was to make the consideration of the preliminary point of the jurisdiction by which the cause was to be tried conclusive, in order to avoid the great delay and great expense which arise upon appeals on interlocutory matters. It was seen that if, in every instance in which a question arose whether it was to be tried by a jury or heard before a division of the Court of Session, the cause were remitted in the first instance from the Lord Ordinary to the Inner House, and from the Inner House appealed to your Lordships, that course would be attended with great expense and delay; when your Lordships had decided that question, the cause would have in fact to be commenced. That is attended with an evil too obvious to the parties seeking redress to be permitted, and the statutes were anxiously framed to guard against that consequence.

My Lords, substitution of trial by jury, as your Lordships are aware, was effected by the institution of a separate court for the purpose of trying those issues. The Lord Ordinary deciding that a case was proper to be tried by a jury, the proceeding was immediately remitted to the Jury Court, and the act of parliament declared the interlocutor upon this subject to be final in certain questions, either before the Court of Session, or your Lordships' House; the act so limits the power of appeal from the Lord Ordinary. The Lord Ordinary, in the present case directing it to be sent to the jury roll, which is now substituted for the Jury Court, the Court said, we have no jurisdiction to [162] interfere; the statutes give the Lord Ordinary absolute power on that point; they therefore refused to interfere, thinking, and properly thinking, they had no jurisdiction under the acts of parliament. It being thought expedient that the matter should be well considered, whether they had any jurisdiction to interfere with the Lord Ordinary's order that the case should be sent to the jury roll for the purpose of being tried by a jury, the Lord Ordinary being applied to, refused to transfer the cause from the jury roll to the Court of Session roll, which had no jurisdiction over it. But though that order stands as a final order by the acts of parliament, and no other judge has a right to interfere with it, there is a subsequent order of the Inner House that the cause shall be transferred to the Court of Session roll. I throw out this, because it is worthy of the consideration of those whose duty it is to come to a decision upon these acts of parliament. It is quite obvious that if that be the proper construction of the statutes, it entirely defeats the professed object of the statutes, viz., that the decision of the Lord Ordinary should be final as to whether the cause should be tried by Jury or not.

It is well known that when the trial by jury was first introduced into Scotland it met with very great opposition on the part of the bar; an opinion fast giving way since the system has come into operation. I wish I could add that it was now viewed altogether with as much favour as I think it ought to be, and that attempts were not made to get rid of the wholesome provisions of the act of parliament giving jurisdiction for the trial by jury in certain cases.

I will very shortly refer your Lordships to some [163] of the provisions of the very few acts which have been passed upon this subject, and I think your Lordships cannot doubt that the intention of the acts was not only that you should never have a question of this kind to decide, but that the order of the Lord Ordinary should be final. The act of the 55th Geo. 3, c. 42, directs, "that it shall and may be lawful for either Division of the Court of Session, in all cases that may be brought before them during the continuance of this act, wherein matters of fact are to be proved, to direct issues." The second section directs the Lord Ordinary "to report to the Division of the Court to which such Ordinary belongs, so that the said Division may determine whether such issue shall be sent to the said Court to be tried by a jury." There the Lord Ordinary had no jurisdiction; the first step was to authorize him to look to the nature of the case, and forming an opinion upon it himself, to report it to the Inner House for their final decision. That act in its fourth section provided "that it shall not be competent either by reclaiming petition or appeal to the House of Lords, to question any interlocutor granting or refusing such trial by jury;" leaving it to the Court of Session finally to decide upon the question, whether the cause should be tried by a jury or not.

The act of 59 Geo. 3, c. 35, altered this scheme in many important particulars: it directed that in certain descriptions of actions, which are enumerated, the Lord Ordinary should remit "the whole process and productions forthwith to the jury court in civil causes, which last-mentioned court is authorized and [164] required, according to rules and regulations which the said Court and the Court of Session are herein-after empowered to make, to settle an issue or issues, and to try the same by a jury, to be summoned and impannelled under the provisions now in force or herein-after enacted for that purpose."

The second section directed, that if questions of law or relevancy arose, the Lord Ordinary was to dispose of them, and then to remit the cause to the jury court; and there is this provision: "that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ordering the cause to be remitted to the jury court, whether with or without reservation of the alleged question of law, shall not be subject to review by representation, petition, appeal to the House of Lords, or otherwise." That related to those actions which were enumerated.

The fourth section related to all other cases. In all other cases where matters of fact were to be proved, the Lord Ordinary was authorized to remit the whole process to the jury court and to direct the matter to be tried, the jury court being to settle the issues.

Then the sixth section gave the Court of Session a similar power to direct issues, and the fifteenth section contained this provision: "that it shall not be competent by representation, reclaiming petition, bill of advocacy, appeal to the House of Lords, or otherwise to bring under review any interlocutor by the said Divisions, Lords Ordinary, or Judge of the Admiralty ordering a trial by jury." Now, my Lords, there can be no ambiguity or doubt upon these enactments.

Then comes what has been thought to be very [165] important in the previous part of the suit. The Lord Ordinary having remitted the whole cause to the jury court to settle the issues and proceed to trial, there is this provision: "that it shall be competent and lawful for the jury court, when it appears to the said Court in the course of settling an issue or issues, or at any time before trial, in the cases remitted to them as aforesaid, that there is a question or questions of law or relevancy which ought to be previously decided, to remit back the whole process and productions to the Division of the Court of Session, the Lord Ordinary, or Judge Admiral who remitted the same to the jury court, that the question or questions of law or relevancy may be considered and determined there." Then comes this provision in the same clause, which also is relied upon: "and it shall be competent for the jury court, when it appears to the said Court in the course of settling an issue or issues that a case turns upon matters of complicated accounts, or other matters to which trial by jury is not beneficially applicable, to remit back the whole process and productions as aforesaid with their report thereon, in order that the Division, Lord Ordinary, or Judge Admiral may proceed with the same in such manner as shall appear to be most expedient for the administration of justice." Now, this was to arise by an act of the Jury Court after the Jury Court had taken cognizance of the cause, and had proceeded to settle the issues; a proceeding equally well adapted to the then state of the law of Scotland introducing a new system: not that the judges of the Court of Session should do this, but the Jury [166] Court, who were familiar with the whole proceedings of the Court, and, therefore, much more competent in investigating the nature of the case to discover any difficulties in the particular case in hand which prevented the beneficial effect of the trial by jury. The act gave to that Court,—not to the Lord Ordinary or the Court of Session,—but the Jury Court exercising a jurisdiction under the act, a power to send it back not to the Court of Session generally, but to the Lord Ordinary or the Division of the Court of Session before whom the cause had been fully investigated as to that objection which had occurred. If this course had been to be followed this question never could have arisen.

My Lords, other acts of parliament were afterwards passed. By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 120, (the fifteenth section,) it is thus provided: "that where the parties differ about facts which require to be ascertained by jury trial the Lord Ordinary shall have power to remit the whole process to the Jury Court, or send particular issues of fact to be tried, and the Jury Court shall settle the issues." But it contains this particular enactment: "the order of the Lord Ordinary, in so far as it remits the cause, to be final." So the law stands as to any positive enactment respecting the order of the Lord Ordinary being final.

The object of the next statute was to get rid of the Jury Court as a distinct jurisdiction, and to unite it to the Court of Session; and accordingly the act of 1 Will. 4. c. 69, contains this enactment: "That from and after such union all causes and issues, which if they had occurred after the passing of this act must by law have been tried by jury in the Jury Court, shall be [167] tried by jury in the Court of Session, and such causes shall be prepared for trial by the Lords Ordinary respectively before whom such causes shall be pending." That simply unites the Jury Court with the Court of Session, and does not profess to make any alteration in the scheme provided by the prior acts of parliament as to the mode in which the trials should take place. But it seems to be presumed that, because the Jury Court no longer exists as a separate jurisdiction, the positive enactments of prior statutes which made the decision of the Lord Ordinary final no longer exist, and that this question, whether a case should or not be tried by a jury, may by a circuitous mode become matter of litigation and appeal, just as if no such act had been passed.

My Lords, I find the scheme by which this has been attempted explained in Mr. Macfarlane's treatise on jury process; he states this in the fortieth page: "As a remit with a view to trial is a most serious step in consequence of its finality, the Court have suggested that where the remit is objected to, the Lord Ordinary should report the case." He undoubtedly had power so to do, but it was at his discretion whether he should do so or not; and by a previous decision it would appear that where a party is dissatisfied with a remit to the Jury Court, his course is to move to get the case retransmitted, for the purpose of having the question of law or relevancy on which he founds disposed of. "In this way the question of law or relevancy,"—which your Lordships recollect is one of the excepted cases in the prior statutes in which it may be proper to have the opinion of the Court [168] before it is sent to the jury court,—"In this way the question of law or relevancy is brought under discussion, and by section sixty-five of the A. S., 11th July 1828, it is provided, that in all cases of retransmission by the Jury Court to the Lord Ordinary of the Court of Session, for the purpose of determining any point of law or relevancy occurring previous to trial, the said Lord Ordinary shall report to the Inner House all such matters, and that either verbally or by cases, as to him shall seem expedient; and in case of dilatory defences the Lord Ordinary shall proceed as in the case of dilatory defences in actions before the Court of Session. In all cases, therefore, where a dilatory defence or plea of relevancy or law arises, the course is obvious by which the opinion of the Inner House can be obtained; but the difficulty still remains where expediency merely of a jury trial is questionable and no proper plea of law or relevancy has arisen. It is not to be supposed, however, that the Lord Ordinary will ever refuse, where the circumstances seem at all to require it, to give the parties an opportunity of going to the Inner House on the subject of a remit, either by reporting the case or pronouncing such findings as may be reclaimed against in the manner explained in the following section." Undoubtedly in a case which requires it, the Lord Ordinary would not perform his duty without doing that, and therefore it is not to be supposed he would take the course of declining to give the parties the opportunity of taking the opinion of such Court where the case required it. But the course adopted here makes it feasible in very case. The [169] Lord Ordinary says, this is a proper case to be tried by a jury; accordingly he sends it to the jury roll. This is not subject to appeal; it must stand therefore; the Lord Ordinary's direction that it shall be tried by a jury is not to be questioned. So the Inner House have decided in this very case; but in the very next step of the case an application is made to the Inner House to bring it back again, and that is granted; by which it must be taken to be assumed, not only that it is the matter of a reclaiming note to the Inner House, but of appeal to the House of Lords. It is an expedient, therefore, by which, if successful, the express intention of the legislature will be defeated, and the parties in all cases whose cases have been directed to be tried by a jury, will be coming continually to your Lordships' bar. I am sure your Lordships will not be disposed,—and it is not now necessary to make any further observations upon the subject,—that your Lordships will not sanction a practice which will occasion such consequences as that. If your Lordships should be asked to sanction such a practice, it will then have to be considered, whether it is necessary to make a further legislative provision, if the circumstances in the Court below should appear to render it necessary. I make these observations without feeling it necessary to advert to any opinions which the learned Judges in the Court below have expressed upon this subject, as both parties agree that this point had not been raised in the Court below, and it is therefore one entirely unaffected by the decision of this case; and if that point should arise again, I have no doubt that it will receive all the attention in the power of [170] the learned Judges. It will, however, be unnecessary for your Lordships to enter upon that if you shall agree with me that the facts of this case are such as ought to be tried by a jury.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said interlocutor complained of in the said appeal be and the same is hereby reversed.

A. DOBIE—JOHN BROWNLEY, Solicitors.

[171]      APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

JAMES JOHN FRASER, Writer to the Signet, Appellant.—Buchanan; JAMES CARNEGIE and Others, Trustees of the late ALEXANDER STEVENS, Respondent.—John Stuart [25th April 1839].

[See Stuart v. Carnegie, 1839, Macl. and R. 192.]

Trust—Fraud.—A party executed a settlement in favour of certain trustees, who accepted and chose an agent to act for them: the agent in conjunction with one of the trustees, the husband of a cestui que trust, who was also heir at law of the truster, procured said cestui que trust to make up a title to part of the trust estate passing over the trust, and thereupon to execute a disposition in his favour, on the ground that it was in security of advances for the trust. The agent thereupon took infetment, and executed a conveyance in favour of third parties: Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Session), that the agent was bound in the first instance, without awaiting the result of an accounting, to restore the estate in integrum against the real security created by the disposition and infetment.

The facts, as far as they relate to this appeal, are sufficiently detailed in the note by the Lord Ordinary and in the speech of the Lord Chancellor, but they will also be found at greater length in the next case.

[172] The respondents, as trustees of Mr. Stevens, brought an action of count and reckoning against the appellant for his intromission with his trust estate, in which the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, on the 20th January 1836:—"Sustains the action, without prejudice to any question as to the competency of the said John Stout and James Fyffe resigning their office of trustees in any other matter or discussion; and on the merits of the cause finds, that from the nature of the transaction narrated in the summons no reduction is necessary for enabling the pursuers to maintain the conclusions thereof: Finds, that the defender, being in the full knowledge of the trust deed executed by the deceased Alexander Stevens, and of the acceptance and actual operation of that trust under which he admits himself to have been the acting agent, was in mala fide to create or to accept of the bond and disposition in security libelled on, whereby Mrs Jean Stevens or Fyffe, by her title completed as heir at law of the said Alexander Stevens, disposed a valuable part of the trust estate to the defender in security of an assumed debt of £2500, said to be contracted by James Fyffe her husband, who, though named a trustee, was expressly excluded from all personal interest in the trust estate, and by three of the children of the said James Fyffe; suppressing altogether the said trust, and the rights and interests thereby created: Finds, that the said defender farther acted in mala fide, in so far as he did take infetment on the said disposition and thereafter assign the same to third parties for valuable considerations, not disclosing to such third parties the existence [173] and operation of the said trust: Finds, that whether the debt acknowledged by the bond was a just debt for money actually advanced to the parties therein mentioned or not, and whatever may be the just state of accounts between the defender and the pursuers on the said trust estate, the defender is bound in the first instance, and without waiting the adjustment of any such accounts, to restore the estate in integrum against the real security created by the said disposition and the infetment thereon, as now standing in the third parties his assignees.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary is convinced that very little is necessary to be said in explanation of the above interlocutor. On the merits of the cause the only difficulty is to imagine how it should be defended at all.

"The short state of the case is this: Stevens the brother of Mrs. Fyffe executed a settlement, by which he conveyed his whole property, heritable and moveable, to the trustees named: the trust was expressly accepted. By the terms of it, there was first a liferent to the testator's widow, and then a liferent to Mrs. Fyffe, and on her death a fee to her children, who were eleven in number at the date of the disposition in security; and the jus mariti of Mr. Fyffe (he being bankrupt) was excluded. In this state of things, after the death of the widow and another trustee, Mr. Fyffe, being the only trustee resident in Scotland, employed the defender, as he himself says, as agent in the trust; and it is too clear that the very least of the case is, that schemes were formed for making the trust [174] estate available to Fyffe himself, or to the defender and others advancing money to him, to the prejudice of the wife's liferent and the ultimate purposes of the trust in the disposal of the reversion. Finding that this could not be done directly, the defender devised the plan of making a title in the person of Mrs Fyffe as heir at law, in which of course the trust was not mentioned. The pursuers do not complain of this, because it was in itself useful, and should have been followed by a disposition by her to the trustees; but instead of this the defender immediately took the bond and disposition in security for a debt stated simply as the personal debt of Fyffe himself and three out of his eleven children (even the wife disponent not being stated as a debtor at all), and then having taken infetment assigned the security to certain creditors of his own, concealing the existence of the trust. How this can be attempted to be justified the Lord Ordinary cannot conceive. The defender says that he had made advances for the better aliment and for the education and outfit of the family, and that there was a power to the trustees in the trust deed to sell or uplift part of the estate for the latter purposes. But was this transaction anything like an execution of such a power? The Lord Ordinary is constrained, however unwillingly, to think that it was, on the contrary, a very deliberate proceeding for defeating the trust, and creating a security by covert contrivance which could not have been created even by the surviving trustees concurring in any direct trust act. But it was known that that could not be even attempted.

[175] "What may have been the state of the defender's advances to Mr. Fyfe or for the family does not appear to the Lord Ordinary to be very material, or indeed at all material, to the chief point involved in this action. The defender's statements on this subject are denied by the pursuers, who state, on very probable grounds derived from documents in process, that the security was truly meant to be given for money to be advanced, and which never was advanced. But supposing it were otherwise, and that the pressure of such a state of advance was the stimulus which led to the extraordinary measure adopted, would that at all justify it, or afford any answer to the demand of the trustees that matters shall be restored to the state in which they ought to have been, whatever other questions may remain?

"The Lord Ordinary had some difficulty as to the correctness of the proceeding without John Stout concurring in the action; but,

"1. There is no plea on the title, or on that as a defect in the form.

"2. The defender could not plead such a point, because his own case requires that he should say that Stout had ceased to be an acting trustee long before his resignation.

"3. The action is by a full quorum of three trustees. Mr. Fyfe is necessarily called as a defender, and the defender Mr. Fraser has by his pleadings in the record rendered it impossible to discuss any question as to the competency of Stout's resignation or the necessity of his being a party. The last plea in law refers to Mr. Fyfe alone.

[176] "If the defender reclaims the bond and disposition ought to be printed."

The appellant reclaimed to their Lordships of the Second Division, who pronounced the following interlocutor, on the 8th March 1836.—"Adhere to the interlocutor complained of; refuse the desire of the note; find additional expenses due; allow the account of expenses to be given in, and remit to the auditor to tax and report. Farther, the Lords having considered the special circumstances of this cause, they, before further answer, appoint the proceedings to be laid before the Keeper of His Majesty's Signet and the Commissioners, in order to report to the Court their opinion thereon with reference to the professional conduct of the defender, and that with their earliest convenience."

Against these interlocutors Mr. Fraser appealed.

Appellant.—This action, as laid, cannot be maintained, inasmuch as the documents which have been founded on as instructing a title to pursue confer no such power. The appellant is called to account at the instance of certain individuals styling themselves trustees of the late Alexander Stevens, architect in Edinburgh; whereas these persons neither were originally appointed trustees nor have they by any lawful instrument been properly assumed into the trust.

Neither can this action be maintained, inasmuch as it is altogether "a fraudulent and collusive device between the present pursuers and Fyfe with a view of defrauding the defender of large sums of money [177] bona fide advanced." Moreover, it is not "maintainable as laid, Fyfe never having been effectually excluded from the trust."

The Lord Ordinary has found that the action is brought by a full quorum of trustees; but, with all deference, even if a quorum have power to sue alone, which the appellant by no means admits, unless possibly after an application to and refusal by the other trustees to join in the action, it is clear that they ought to have designed themselves as a quorum in the summons, which they have not done.

By the original deed power is given to assume new trustees, "to be joined with themselves in the management of the affairs committed to their care by this deed." The warrant, therefore, which Stout and Fyfe had for nominating new trustees did not empower them to resign the trust, but, on the contrary, expressly recognizes their continuance in office ; otherwise it would not have declared that the new trustees should be joined with the old trustees in the management. It is one thing to have a power to appoint persons to act along with other individuals, but it is another thing to have a power to appoint persons to act in place of other individuals.

Mr. James Fyffe and his wife were entitled to create an heritable burden in security of such advances ; and inasmuch as the trust deed expressly declares, that " the purchasers shall be noways concerned with the application of the price," the appellant has no concern whatsoever with the manner in which the monies so received were disposed of.

It is said that the appellant as agent, being cognizant of the trust, ought not to have made the advances, [178] and if he did so it must be at his own risk. This proposition, with great deference, is not a correct one. The appellant admits that he was agent under the trust as it then existed ; that is to say, he was the agent of Mr. James Fyffe, who gave himself out and was considered to be the only acting trustee under Stevens's settlement ; and the appellant dealt with Fyffe as a party having full power to deal with the trust estate, and upon that supposition made the advances in question.

The law of Scotland does not, like the Courts of Equity in England, recognize any incapacity in a law agent to deal with his clients ; he is as capable of buying from and selling to them as any other person ; but even the English Court of Chancery would support such a transaction as the present (Williams v. Piggott. 1 Jacob, 598 ; Pitcher v. Rigby, 9 Price, 79 ; Montesquieu v. Sandys, 18 Vesey, 302 ; see Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Vesey, 266 ; Wood v. Downes, 18 Vesey, 120 ; Sugden's V. and P. chap. xiv. sec. 2 ; Gordon v. Trotter, 11th July 1833, 11 S. D. and B. p. 696).

Without hearing the counsel for the respondents the Lord Chancellor immediately proceeded as follows :—

Lord Chancellor :—My Lords, of all the clear cases which have ever come under my consideration this is the clearest, and admits of the least doubt ; in fact it would be scandal to the law of Scotland if it did admit of doubt. Two courts in Scotland have already decided against the appellant, and in those decisions I do most cordially concur. It has been said that the case ought to be sent to a jury, but the mere statement of the facts would in any civilized country entitle the plaintiffs below to a decree. In opposition to the inter-[179]-locutors of the Courts below it has been said, that they would injuriously affect the character of the appellant. Well, if they do, how can that be helped ? This injurious effect is the necessary consequence of those acts in which he is concerned.

The following are the circumstances of the case to which in particular, my Lords, I would direct your attention. A trust deed was executed by Mr. Stevens to provide for the support of his wife in case she should survive him, and after her death to provide for her children. This deed, after providing for certain contingencies, then proceeds in these terms :—" In the fourth place, after the decease of the said Margaret Stout my wife, and failing children of my body then existing, my said trustees, or survivors or survivor, and foresaids shall apply the free annual produce of my heritable and moveable estate to the ailment, maintenance, and support of Jean Stevens, spouse of the said James Fyffe, my sister, and the ailment and education of her children of the present or any other subsequent marriage, in such way and manner as shall appear to my said trustees best suited to the comfort and advantage of her and her children of the present or any subsequent marriage, in such way and manner " as it is hereby specially provided and declared, that the said James Fyffe during the subsistence of the marriage between him and the said Jean Stevens, or any other husband she may marry in case of the death of the said James Fyffe, shall have no concern with the rents and annual proceeds of my means and effects, heritable and moveable, in virtue of his jus mariti, courtesy of Scotland, or any other title whatsoever, and that the [180] same shall neither be liable to their deeds nor subjected to the legal diligence of the creditors of the said James Fyffe, or any future husband of the said Jean Stevens. In the fifth place, after the decease of the said Jean Stevens my sister, my said trustees shall convert my whole subjects and effects into cash, and divide the free proceeds thereof equally amongst the children procreate or to be procreated of the body of the said Jean Stevens of her present or any subsequent marriage, equally betwixt them share and share alike ; whom failing before majority or marriage, my said trustees shall make over the whole residue of my means and effects to my own nearest heirs or assignees whatsoever. And it is hereby specially provided and declared, that my said trustees, and survivors or survivor of them, and foreaids, shall have full power and liberty, in the event of my leaving no children of my own body, to sell any part of my heritable subjects, or uplift any debts due to me for the purpose of fitting out any of the said Jean Stevens's children in life, putting them to apprenticeships, or such like, or laying out the same in any other way advantageous to her family; on this condition always, that the said Margaret Stout's consent be previously had thereto, and she fully and completely satisfied and secured as to her liferent of the sums so uplifted and applied in manner aforesaid."

He then empowers the trustees to sell and dispose of any part of the property. He then gives powers to the trustees, "and the survivors or the survivor of them, if they think proper, to assume any person or persons to be joined with themselves in the management of the affairs committed to their care by this deed, declaring [181] that such trustees so to be assumed shall have the same powers and privileges vested in them as are hereby vested in my said trustees before named."

Under these circumstances two trustees died: one of the surviving trustees lived in England; the other, Captain Fyfe, was living in Scotland. Unfortunately the management of the property fell to this individual, who by the trust seems to have been in some degree excluded from the management, and who does not appear to have been very fit for the office. It appears that when this management devolved on him he was labouring under difficulties, in fact that he was greatly involved in debt. In these circumstances Mr. Fraser the appellant became concerned as law agent in the arrangement of the trust affairs: so far there is no dispute. It appears that soon after this, a negotiation was commenced to sell part of the property; this failed. An endeavour was next made to raise some money on it by way of pledge or mortgage; this also failed. It appears, however, that at a subsequent period the security was executed under which the present appellant claims. By the bond executed by James Fyfe and three of the children, the appellant had the personal security of those parties, at all events, for the repayment of the advances which he had made. Not content with this, however, he takes also from Mrs. Fyfe a disposition in further security of part of the property as heiress at law to her brother, and without taking any notice of the deed of trust. This is not only important to be considered, but it goes to the substance of this case. Now, it is submitted by the appellant that that is not proved; why, it is the case that is proved, from beginning to end. Then it is said that it is no objection, because it is [182] not unusual where money has been previously advanced for the support of the family to sell a part of the estate for that purpose. That may be often done as to part, where the parties for whose behoof the advances are made have such an interest as will entitle them to dispose of a part, but it goes to the very substance of the present case that these children had only an expectancy. The provision is not for the children of Mrs. Fyfe only by her then husband, but the children she might have by any other husband. If there was an expectancy in the children, and if they had thought proper to bind their expectancy, it is unnecessary to consider what might have been the effect of such a transaction. But it turns out that the deed proceeded on a false recital, that the money was not advanced for three of the children, but for the support of the whole family. Even taking it, according to that which is stated in justification of this transaction, not to have been money advanced, as the deed itself imports, but that the money had been advanced for the support of the family generally, it would have been an advance which the trustees would not be entitled under the trust deed to dispose of the estate to repay, because the trust is only to apply the year's income as it arose for the maintenance of the family. If, therefore, this insolvent husband had advanced money, or Mr. Fraser had advanced money, for the support of the family, there would be no ground for charging on the corpus of the estate any accumulated amount of money so advanced; the trust prohibited that, and the parties, the cestui que trusts, would not be liable; and the importance of this false recital is obvious, for if the fact had been correctly recited according to the now representation of the appel-[183]-lant, it would have constituted no debt, and, therefore, no consideration for such a charge.

The security bears date the 1st of May 1830, and there is a letter dated the 24th of June, which I see is in the certified copy of the proceedings, and, therefore, must have been before the Court below. Now, that letter shows the connexion between that professional person and his client:—

LETTER from Captain JAMES FYFFE to JAMES JOHN FRASER, W.S., then residing in London.

Edinburgh, 24th June 1830.

"Dear Sir,—At a conference a few days previous to your leaving Edinburgh, at which were present yourself, Mrs. Fyffe, and myself, you intimated to us that on the following Monday your clerk would give Mrs. Fyffe or myself the sum then immediately required, and that I might intimate to remaining creditors that on the 20th May last you would pay them off. Confiding, therefore, as I conceived I had every right to do, in your promise so given, I gave the intimation, and Mr. Jamieson was applied to on Monday, who said he had no money then, but to call in a day or two, and he would have funds. After being repeatedly applied to, he ultimately several weeks since, declared that he had no money, and as frequently said that day after day you were to be in Edinburgh. I am, therefore, from the peculiar circumstances under which I am placed, again required to address you in the matter. You were, when you intimated as above to me, perfectly aware of the difficulties under which I labour, and which have been very considerably increased by your withhold-[184]-ing the pecuniary aid promised by you at the two distinct periods as aforesaid, even to my incarceration by one creditor, who, with others, considered that a noncompliance with a settlement on the 20th of May was mere fiction on my part towards them. I feel all this the more grievous, as you know that I have done every thing you required on my part. I am loath to attribute blame in the matter, for perhaps it may be ascribed to negligence in some other quarter; but how is it that you did not make any reply to a letter which I gave Mr. Jamieson to forward to you, which you surely must have received?"

It then goes on to state matters of debt, and then Mr. Fraser's answer, on the 29th June 1830, says: "The person who was to advance the money did not deem the security sufficient; I have not been able to get it elsewhere, but I am in daily expectation of it. I will be in Edinburgh in the course of eight days, when I hope to get matters arranged to your satisfaction." Now, taking the security, that letter, and the answer to it, I think there is no great difficulty in forming a satisfactory conclusion as to the nature of the transaction between these parties.

It is said that Mr. Fraser had no notice or might be supposed to be ignorant of Mr. Stout being a trustee; it does not appear to me to be very material, in the course ultimately adopted, whether that was so represented or not, because he did not take the security from Mr. Fyffe as trustee; if he had, there was no power in Mr. Fyffe to execute any such charge on the estate. What he pretended to take was a security from a married woman and from the three children. Now, to say that a party having a trust deed in his possession, [185] appointing two persons as trustees, is to make a title against the cestuique trusts, because he did not know that one of the trustees had accepted the trust, is absurd, and it is impossible there can be any law or any rule in Scotland which can so affect the rights of parties in Scotland or in any civilized country. The party sees on the deed who are the trustees. If he deals with one without inquiring about the other, he must necessarily be liable to all the consequences that may result from the other being a trustee. If he chooses to assume that he is dead, or that he never was known, or if he chooses to believe Captain Fyffe without inquiry, it is impossible that that circumstance can be taken in his favour. That, however, is not the nature of the transaction: the transaction is a security taken from the wife and children,—the wife who is anxious to protect her husband against his debts, and the children who derive no benefit from the money transaction between Mr. Fraser and the father. Then we have Captain Fyffe in his character of trustee abusing his trust, committing a gross breach of trust, endeavouring to deprive his wife and family of a benefit the settlor intended they should have, and we have Mr. Fraser, either for the accommodation of his client Captain Fyffe, or for his convenience, or for some consideration that might have passed between himself and Captain Fyffe, making himself a party to that transaction, and now claiming against the wife and against the cestuique trusts a title to the property which was the subject of that trust.

Having got this property, he thought the safest way was not to take it to himself, and passing over the trustees of whom he had most distinct knowledge, he [186] makes up a title in order to extend the fraud to some third party; and therefore making up a title in Mrs. Fyffe as heiress to the settlor, he succeeds probably in representing to some third party advancing the money, that there is a clear title, and of course of the trust deed the party advancing the money had no information. However that may be, an interest is created in a third party, but the cestuique trusts, those who are attempted to be so defrauded, apply and ask for relief; and the relief they ask, so far as it is considered by the interlocutor pronounced, is, that those who have been parties to this transaction may do what is here prayed, in order to restore them to the situation in which they were previously; because it is only the second and third heads of relief to which the interlocutor pronounced applies. The first is not touched; that is left for further consideration. The first is: "That James John Fraser, defender, ought and should be decerned and ordained by the decree of the Lords of our Council and Session to exhibit and produce before our said Lords a full and particular account of his whole actings in regard to the property of the said trust estate, and to hold just count and reckoning with the pursuers as trustees foresaid for the same." That is reserved, and the interlocutor does not touch that.

The next the interlocutor does touch, and it gives the relief prayed: "The said defender ought and should be decerned and ordained by decree foresaid to reconvey, renounce, and give up the title created in his favour by the bond and disposition in security before mentioned, so far as he himself has still any interest therein, and also to free and relieve the said [187] heritable property in Charlotte Street as aforesaid of the burdens constituted over the same by means of the title fraudulently made up as before stated in the person of the said Mrs. Jean Stevens or Fyffe, by discharging and paying off the debts contracted on the faith of that title, and by getting the said heritable securities extinguished, and to make payment to the pursuers as trustees aforesaid of the rents of the property over which the said security was fraudulently created since the date of the said bond and disposition in security. And in the event of the said James John Fraser failing so to do, then and in that case the said James John Fraser and the said James Fyffe ought and should be decerned and ordained by decree foresaid jointly and severally, one or other of them, to make payment to the pursuers, as trustees foresaid, of the sum of £2500 sterling as the loss or damage which the trust estate has sustained through the title fraudulently made up as aforesaid in the person of the said Mrs. Jean Stevens of Fyffe, and the burdens thereby constituted in favour of third parties over the said heritable property, with legal interest of said sum from and since the date of said title till paid."

Now, the substance of that is this;—here has been a charge fraudulently created on this property, you have been instrumental in creating it, having been the instrument by which a fraud has been committed, you are in the first place decreed to relieve the estate from that burden; if you fail in doing that, whether there is a title existing in a third person which you cannot get rid of, or not, if you fail to restore the cestuique [188] trusts to the place in which they ought to be if the fraud had not been committed, you are decreed liable to repay the trust that loss which it sustained by the breach of trust. It is so as against Captain Fyffe the trustee and the professional person who takes a benefit from the trustee. Now, that is according to the ordinary course of proceeding in this country, and there is nothing suggested to show that that most wholesome rule of indemnifying cestuique trusts against any fraud committed by their trustees is not consistent with the law of Scotland, or that it is excepted from the act for the trial by jury. It is compensation for a breach of trust, which in the first instance is directed to be set right by a restoration of the property itself to the party; not by way of damages, but by returning that property which the law will assume to be in their hands, and whether it be money which ought to be in their hands or not, the Court will consider it in their hands, and administer it therefore subject to the provisions of the trust deed.

My Lords, the fourth head is also not touched by the interlocutor, which is, that the defender ought to be decreed to make payment to the pursuers of the expenses; that forms no part of the interlocutor. The first remains untouched; the substantial relief is as expressed in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the second and third heads. Then the interlocutor being pronounced, and this being carried into the Inner House, there was added to this interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary a reference to the proper authorities there, to consider the conduct of Mr. Fraser in his professional character. It is quite immaterial [189] and unnecessary to consider whether that could be the subject of appeal, because I feel quite satisfied, if your Lordships by appeal have jurisdiction to entertain the merits of Mr. Fraser in his professional character, that acting for a trustee he was acting for the cestuique trusts. He had a duty to perform, not for Mr. Fyfe for whom he was acting, but for Mrs. Fyfe and the children of that family. That duty he grossly violated, and I think it was an extremely proper course to pursue, to refer it to the proper authorities to consider what course under those circumstances ought to be adopted with respect to him; therefore it is quite unnecessary to consider how far the Court should have jurisdiction. If your Lordships should be of opinion that the Court had jurisdiction, then they most properly exercised it.

Another objection in point of form was, that the present pursuers have no character in which to sue, because they are not properly constituted trustees. My Lords, the trust deed authorizes the trustees to appoint other trustees, who are to have the same power which they had themselves. Now, the argument is, that although there was a power to appoint new trustees to join with the existing trustees, there was no power in the old trustees to retire. Now, whether that be so or not, the record is thus framed: the record is by the trustees appointed, and about the validity of their appointment there can be no question. If there was no power in Mr. Stout to retire from the trust, then Mr. Stout remains a trustee with them; if, on the other hand, Mr. Stout had power to retire from the trust, then the present pursuers are the sole trustees. [190] But supposing Mr. Stout had no power, the result would have been that the present pursuers, with Mr. Stout, will constitute the trustees. The present pursuers are also the major part of the trustees and competent therefore to sue, and Mr. Stout, if a trustee at all, is a trustee out of the jurisdiction of the Court residing in England, and has so little to do with the trust that the foundation of the appellant's case is that he is no trustee at all. It would be strange indeed if that argument should prevail, but it is quite consistent with the fact of Mr. Stout being a trustee manifestly out of the jurisdiction, for the Court to entertain jurisdiction on the application of those who clearly are trustees, whether with Mr. Stout or not, is a matter immaterial for the present purpose.

My Lords, it does not appear to me that there is a shadow of doubt on the propriety of the decision which has been come to by the Court below, and it would be most lamentable if it were otherwise according to the admitted facts. I am not adverting to any doubtful facts; I am adverting to written documents, which show what the history of this transaction was. It is sufficient for your Lordships to come to a decision, that this instrument ought not to exist or to have any validity against the cestuique trusts, that is, against the wife and children of this family, and that those who were instrumental in creating this burthen on the property of the cestuique trusts should be directed to restore the property so injured by them either in specie or by compensation to the amount raised by them. That is in fact the whole case we have to adjudicate on, and if your Lordships agree with me [191] in the opinions I have submitted to your consideration, the course I propose to your Lordships will be, to affirm the interlocutor of the Court below, with costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed, this house, and that the said interlocutors therein complained of be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellant do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is also further ordered, That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

APPEAL FROM COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

Mrs. BARBARA STUART or HERRIOT, Widow, and Others, Trustees of the late ROBERT HERRIOT, Appellants.—Buchanan; JAMES CARNEGIE and Others, the only acting Trustees of the late ALEXANDER STEVENS, and H. M. GIBB and Others,* Respondents.—John Stuart [29th April 1839].

[See Fraser v. Stevens's Trustees, 1839, MacL. and R. 171.]

Inhibition—Arrestment.—Circumstances in which (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) inhibitions and arrestments used against trust estates were simpliciter recalled.

The late Mr. Alexander Stevens, on occasion of his sister's marriage with Mr. James Fyfe, and being a party to their marriage contract, conveyed to them in conjunct fee and liferent for the husband's liferent use certain heritable subjects in the town of Ayr; and by a subsequent conveyance on the 31st March 1796, he conveyed to the same parties other heritable subjects in the town of Leith in the same terms.

Mr. Stevens, who had no family of his own, previously to his death in the year 1825, executed a trust settlement, whereby he conveyed his whole real and personal property to his wife Margaret Stout, her brother John Stout, merchant in Lancaster, James [193] Fyfe, and John Rhind, writer in Edinburgh, and the survivors or survivor of them accepting, any two to be a quorum while two are in life, to be held for the uses and purposes declared by the deed, which were, in the first place, the payment of the truster's debts; secondly, to apply the free annual proceeds of the property for behoof of his wife during her life.

After the wife's death, and on failure of children of the marriage then existing, the trustees were directed "to apply the free annual produce of my heritable and moveable estate to the aliment, maintenance, and support of Jean Stevens, spouse of the said James Fyfe, my sister, and the aliment and education of her children of the present or any subsequent marriage, in such way and manner as shall appear to my said trustees best suited to the comfort and advantage of her and her family." The legal rights of the husband in virtue of his jus mariti or otherwise in the rents and annual proceeds of the property were excluded.

The deed also declared, that "after the decease of the said Jean Stevens, my sister, my said trustees shall convert my whole subjects and effects into cash, and divide the free proceeds thereof equally amongst the children procreate or to be procreated of the body of the said Jean Stevens of her present or any subsequent marriage, equally betwixt them, share and share alike; whom failing before majority or marriage, my said trustees shall make over the whole residue of my means and effects to my own nearest heirs or assignees whatsoever. And it is hereby specially provided and declared, that my said trust[194]-tees, and survivors or survivor of them, and foresaids, shall have full power and liberty, in the event of my leaving no children of my own body, to sell any part of my heritable subjects or uplift any debts due to me for the purpose of fitting out any of the said Jean Stevens's children in life, putting them to apprenticeships, or such like, or laying out the same in any other way advantageous to her family; on this condition always, that the said Margaret Stout's consent be previously had thereto, and she fully and completely satisfied and secured as to her liferent of the sums so uplifted and applied in manner foresaid." The deed farther contains powers of sale generally of the heritable subjects, authority to name factors for collecting the rents, and various other powers and clauses.

Mr. Stevens died in 1825 without issue, and Mr. Rhind and Mrs. Stevens both died in 1826.

On Mr. Stevens's death, in May 1825, Mr. Stout came from England to attend the funeral, and on that occasion signed, along with Mr. Rhind and Mr. Fyfe, a minute containing a pro formâ acceptance of the trust by them.

Mr. Fyfe had a brother John Fyfe, a Baron of the Austrian Empire, who resided in Vienna, but was possessed of considerable property in houses situated in Edinburgh.

* 14 D., B., and M. 670.

He died in 1826, leaving a last will and disposition and settlement, by which he named certain persons as his executors; and among other bequests made the following in favour of Mr. Fyffe:—"I hereby give, grant, bequeath, and dispo[n]e to my brother Captain James Fyffe, his wife Jane Fyffe, and chil-[195]-dren, two third parts of all my houses, shops, and tenements lying in Union Place, Picardy Place, Broughton Place, and Drummond Street."

In 1827 Mr. Fraser became agent under Mr. Stevens's trust, and continued to act until the year 1830, during the whole of which period Mr. Fyffe was the sole acting trustee under the trust; and Mr. Fraser made advances to Mr. Fyffe to the amount of £4600 besides accounts incurred for business done to the amount of near £400.

No title to the property was ever made up in the person of the trustees, and Mr. Fraser having agreed to advance certain sums to Mr. Fyffe obtained from him the absolute conveyance of a house in Charlotte Square, Edinburgh, part of the trust estate of which Mr. Stevens had died seised. The conveyance contained an acknowledgment from Mr. Fyffe of the receipt of £2500, but as this sum was not in fact paid, but was intended to pay debts of Mr. Fyffe at that time unascertained, Mr. Fraser granted to Mr. Fyffe a letter in the following terms:—"You have this day granted me a receipt for £2500, being price of house No. 1, Charlotte Square, sold to me by you as sole trustee of the late Alexander Stevens; and I oblige myself, in the event of its turning out, upon the examination of the cash account of Mr. Stevens's trust estate, that the amount of cash advances to you as trustee as aforesaid does not amount to £2500, to pay you the difference."

On the 1st May 1830 Mrs. Fyffe, under the advice of Mr. Fraser, executed in his favour, with consent of her husband, a bond and disposition in security for the sum of £2500 over the house in Charlotte Square as [196] sister and heir of the late Mr. Stevens; and the disposition bears as its consideration that the said James Fyffe and three of his children had "instantly borrowed and received from James John Fraser the sum of £2500." The personal obligation in the bond was undertaken by these four persons in addition to the heritable security granted by Mr. and Mrs. Fyffe. Mr. Fraser immediately took out from the superiors, the magistrates of Edinburgh, a precept of clare constat in favour of Mrs. Fyffe as heir at law of her brother, upon which infetment followed on the 23d June 1830.

In November 1830 Mr. Fraser having obtained an advance of £2500 from the late Mr. Robert Herriot, the husband of the appellant, assigned and conveyed over to him by a regular deed of assignment the sum of £2500, being a part of the debt due to him by Mr. Fyffe.

Differences having arisen between Mr. Fraser and Mr. Fyffe, and Mr. Herriot having demanded payment of the debt contained in the assignation to him, and payment having been refused, Mr. Herriot brought an action before the Court of Session for the purpose of obtaining payment, but before any progress had been made in that action he died, leaving a trust deed under which the appellants were appointed his trustees.

In these circumstances an agreement was entered into between Mr. Fraser and the appellants, by which there was the following arrangement as to the proceedings already instituted: "and it is also agreed, that the proceedings for recovery of debts due to Mr. Fraser and assigned by him to Mr. Herriot, and for which suits have been commenced, shall be carried on by [197] Mr. Fraser in the name of Mr. Herriot's trustees, he relieving them of the expenses."

In pursuance of this agreement Mr. Fraser, who had acted as the late Mr. Herriot's agent, continued to take charge of that action, and had the conduct and superintendence of the proceedings under it, though these were carried on in the name of the late Mr. Herriot's trustees.

During the dependence of this action the appellants applied for and executed against the defenders in the action the diligence of inhibition, by which they were legally prohibited from selling, alienating, or in any way disposing of any of the heritable subjects comprehended under the settlements of Mr. Stevens or Baron Fyffe to the prejudice of the appellants or of the debts sued for. They also obtained the diligence of arrestment, which was duly executed against the tenants of these different subjects, by which the rents payable by them were legally attached till the issue of the action.

The trust deed conferred no power on the trustees of resigning, but by it an authority is given to the "trustees and the survivors or survivor of them, if they think proper, to assume any person or persons to be joined with themselves in the management of the affairs committed to their care by this deed;" and under this clause Captain Fyffe and Mr. Stout assumed, as sole trustees, Mr. James Carnegie, a clerk in the Commercial Bank, and two persons of the names of Richardson and Anderson, writers in Edinburgh, and upon them they devolved the whole trust powers, rights, and duties. They then resigned their own offices as trustees.

[198] The cause proceeded (Mr. Stout having been called by a supplementary summons), and a record being prepared and closed, the following interlocutor was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, "20th January 1836.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the closed record, and heard parties procurators thereon, and made avizandum, finds it admitted that the pursuers, Herriot's trustees, can only maintain this action as in the right of James John Fraser, from whom they derive right by assignation, and subject to all pleas and defences competent against him: Finds, that the defender John Stout, called by the supplementary summons, having accepted of the trust under the deed of Alexander Stevens and acted therein, must be considered as having been still a trustee during the whole period within which the debt by advances of money is stated to have been contracted to the said James John Fraser: Finds, that by the terms of the trust deed, in the event which occurred, the whole 'annual produce' of the trust estate was applicable 'to the aliment, maintenance, and support of Jean Stevens, spouse of the said James Fyffe, my sister, and the aliment and education of her children of the present or any subsequent marriage, in such way and manner as shall appear to my said trustees best suited to the comfort and advantage of her and her family,' with an express exclusion of the jus mariti of her husband, and of all right in him or his creditors to interfere with the 'rents or annual proceeds' thereof: Finds, that in so far as advances might be made by the said James John Fraser to the extent of the rents or annual proceeds which were applied to the aliment of the [199] said Jean Stevens, or the aliment or education of her children, such advances might become just and lawful debts exigible from the said trustees, and effectual against the alimentary fund under their management in each year. But finds, that it was not competent to the trustees, or a quorum of them, except in virtue of the special power conferred on them and by a regular trust act in conformity thereto, and altogether incompetent to one trustee acting by himself, to pledge either the fee or reversion of the said trust estate or the future annual rents thereof for advances made generally on the order of the said James Fyffe, or of others of the family, in whatever manner the same might be applied, without prejudice always to the personal liability of the parties giving such orders or receiving such advances; and that no third party cognizant of the terms of the trust can be held to have made any such advances on the faith of the trust estate except to the extent above expressed: Finds, that the said trust deed contains a special power to the trustees 'to sell any part of my heritable subjects or uplift any debts due to me for the purpose of fitting out any of the said Jean Stevens's children in life, putting them to apprenticeships or such like, or laying out the same in any other way advantageous to her family,' on condition of the consent of Margaret Stout, the testator's widow, being obtained: Finds, that this power could only be exercised by a regular act of a quorum of the trustees, and to the effect and according to the precise terms so expressed. And in respect that no such act of the trustees was done or executed, and that no such sale or uplifting did take place by [200] authority of the trustees, finds it unnecessary to determine how far the power fell or subsisted after the death of Margaret Stout: Finds, that in so far as the said James John Fraser may have made advances for making up titles to the trust estate, or in the necessary management of the trust, according to the terms and qualities thereof, such advances are just debts against the trustees and the trust estate itself. Therefore finds, that in so far as this action and supplementary action conclude against James Fyffe and John Stout as trustees of Alexander Stevens, or is insisted in against the other trustees now sisted, it cannot be maintained against them, or to the effect of adjudging the trust estate, except to the extent expressed in the previous findings:

Finds, that in so far as the summons concludes against Mrs. Fyfe personally, as proprietrix of an heritable estate, for the purpose of attaching that estate, it was incumbent on the pursuer to show by some act or deed legally effectual that the said Mrs. Fyfe did bind or pledge her said separate estate for the payment of such debt: Finds, that the pursuers have not condescended on any such act or deed: and finds, that Mrs. Fyfe, as a married woman residing with her husband, cannot be made liable either in her person or in her separate estate for personal debts contracted by her husband, whether for the support of his family or for other purposes: but finds, that in so far as any advances may have been made in the management or for the preservation of the subjects belonging to Mrs. Fyfe in her own right, such advances will constitute a just debt against her and her said estate: Finds, that in so far as by the set-[201]-tlements of Baron Fyfe there was any right and interest vested in the said James Fyfe in the estate left by him, the pursuers are entitled to obtain decree in this action against the said James Fyfe for any debt or debts which shall appear to have been legally contracted by him personally, and to the effect of attaching such right or interest in the estate of the said Baron Fyfe: but finds, that in so far as the rights and interests in the estate of the said Baron Fyfe are vested in the children of the said James Fyfe, there is no competent conclusion in the summons under which any judgment can be pronounced to affect the said children, or their rights and interests in the said estate; and with these findings, before farther answer, excepting as after expressed, remits to to examine the accounts and vouchers referred to in the deed of assignation as constituting the debt now sued for, and to report whether or to what extent there was a good and subsisting debt in the person of James John Fraser comprehended in the said accounts in conformity to the principles laid down in this interlocutor, with power to him to call for all books or writings necessary for explaining the transactions to which the said accounts relate, and to call for and receive all explanations from either of the parties," etc.

To this judgment the Inner House, on disposing of a reclaiming note for the pursuers of the action, adhered on the 8th March 1836.

In the month of June following the respondents presented a summary petition, praying the Court "to recal the said inhibition, loose and discharge the said arrestments, and all other arrestments used at the [202] instance of the said trustees, in virtue of the said letters of arrestment, in the hands of the persons above named, or of any others in whose hands they may have been used to affect sums belonging to the petitioners, and that without caution or consignment; to prohibit and discharge the said trustees or their agents from troubling or molesting any of the persons in whose hands such arrestments may have been used as aforesaid, and from using any new inhibition or arrestment in virtue of said letters of inhibition and arrestment or of any other upon the dependence of said action; to grant warrant to the keeper of the register of inhibitions to mark the recal of the said inhibition in the record of inhibitions; to find the said Mrs. Barbara Stuart or Herriot liable in the expenses of this application, proceedings to follow hereon, and of such other expense as may be necessary to get the incumbrance and nexus on the petitioners' property and funds by said inhibition and arrestments completely removed, reserving to the petitioners any claim of damages they may have against the said trustees on account of the said diligence; or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper."

A joint petition to the same effect was presented by the respondent Mr. Gibb, who was a creditor in respect of a bond of £1954, and six of the children of Captain Fyfe, who had regularly assigned their interest to Mr. Gibb.

These petitions also prayed for an order of service both on the appellants and on Mr. Fraser, as being the original creditor in the debts, and the party truly [203] interested in the subsistence of the diligence; and accordingly the Court, on the 23d June 1836, made the following order:—"The Lords grant warrant for serving this petition on the persons within named and designed, and allow them to give in answers thereto within eight days after service."

At the time when these petitions were presented Mr. Fraser was absent in London on business, and a note was put in to the Court in the name of Mr. Herriot as acting trustee and factor for the other appellants, stating the circumstances and craving time for giving in the answers.

When the case was advised by the Court, no answers had been put in for the appellants or for Mr. Fraser, and no appearance was made for the latter. In that situation the Court, on the 7th July 1836, pronounced the following ex parte judgment upon the petition for the respondents Carnegie and others:—"The Lords having considered this petition, with the note for Mrs. Barbara Stuart or Herriot, and other proceedings, and heard counsel thereon, recal the inhibition within mentioned so far as regards Captain James Fyfe as a trustee; loose and discharge the arrestments also within mentioned, and all other arrestments used at the instance of the said trustees, in virtue of the said letters of arrestment, in the hands of the persons within named, or of any others in whose hands they may have been used to affect any sums belonging to the petitioners, and that without caution or consignment; prohibit and discharge the said trustees or their agents from troubling or molesting any of the persons in whose hands such arrestments may have been used, and [204] from using any new inhibition or arrestment in virtue of the said letters of inhibition or arrestment, or of any other upon the dependence of said action; grant warrant to the keeper of the register of inhibitions to mark the recal of the said inhibition on the record of inhibitions: Find the said Mrs. Barbara Stuart or Herriot liable in the expense of this application and the proceedings following thereon, and in such other expense as may be necessary to get the incumbrances and nexus on the petitioners property and funds by said inhibition and arrestments completely removed; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same when lodged to the auditor to tax and report; reserving to the said Mrs. Barbara Stuart or Herriot all claims for relief against James John Fraser, writer to the signet, as accords." On the same day the Court pronounced the following ex parte judgment on the petition for Gibb and others:—"The Lords, having considered this petition and the note for Mrs. Barbara Herriot, loose and discharge the arrestments within mentioned, and all other arrestments used at the instance of the said trustees, in virtue of the said letters of arrestments, in the hands of the persons within named, or of any other in whose hands they may have been used to affect sums belonging to the petitioners, and that without caution or consignment; prohibit and discharge the said trustees or their agents from troubling or molesting any of the persons in whose hands such arrestments may have been used, and from using any new arrestment by virtue of the said letters of arrestments or of any other upon the dependence of said action against [205] the petitioners: Find the said Mrs. Barbara Stuart or Herriot liable in the expense of this application and proceedings following thereon, and of such other expense as may be necessary to get the incumbrance and nexus on the petitioners property and funds by said arrestments completely removed; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same when lodged to the auditor to tax and report; reserving to the said Mrs. Barbara Stuart or Herriot any claim for relief against James John Fraser, W.S., as accords."

Against these judgments the appellants appealed.

Appellants.—1. The judgments under review having been pronounced ex parte, and in absence of the appellants and of Mr. Fraser, they are therefore entitled to have them set aside.

It was impossible for Mr. Fraser to have his answers lodged within the time, while any extension of the time, though specially required by the appellants, was not granted, and the judgments under review were taken by the respondents at their own risk. They are, in every view, judgments in absence of the party having the real interest, and cited as such; and this absence, or the ex parte character of the judgments, was wholly occasioned by the fault of the respondents or their agents in pressing and precipitating the order for answers in Edinburgh within so limited a time (Ersk. tit. i. sec. 69).

2. The respondents Carnegie and others not being legally appointed trustees by the trustor, or in virtue of [206] powers derived from him or contained in the trust deed, have no legal title to assume the office or powers of trustees, or to act in any matter as such, or to sue or insist in that character in any suit, action, or proceedings at law whatever.

The trust deed contains a power to the trustees named of assuming other trustees to act with them in the management, and so it makes provision for the case of the trustees named not all accepting, or, where they do accept, of their numbers being diminished by death; but the trustees to be thus assumed were not to come in place of those named by the testator or to supersede or set aside their nomination, and far less was it contemplated that the trustees making the assumption were to withdraw themselves from all farther charge and from all past responsibility, and to surrender the whole trust management into new hands; and no power is given to resign, and much less to make an entire devolution on strangers.

But even if it were true that the respondents had a good title, they have failed to show any legal, just, or relevant ground for the interference of the Court, in summarily recalling the legal diligence used by the appellants as creditors for the recovery or security of their debt.

According to the authorities inhibition or arrestment in security can only be recalled where the diligence is used oppressively, or where it is a superfluous and vexatious precaution; and the instances to which reference is made are, in the first place, where the diligence is resorted to when the debtor is in good credit and his means remain unimpaired; and, secondly, where the creditor is already secured by prior diligence, by [207] some lien over property or effects accessible to him, or by good and sufficient caution. Where the debt sued for is plainly, on the showing of the creditor himself, fictitious or groundless, or exposed to objections instantly verified, the Court will and ought to take into view the character of the claim in judging of the question as to the recal or modification of the diligence. But the Court have seldom or never recalled the diligence without caution or consignment, and the more common course is to restrict the sum for which caution is required, and only to recal on condition of such caution being found (Bell's Principles of the Law of Scotland, p. 668, 669. 671, 672. 680; Duncan, 22d January 1822, 1 Shaw's Rep. 257; Todd, 21st November 1823, 2 Shaw's Rep. 513; Jeffrey, 11th March 1824, 2 Shaw's Rep. 797; Herbertson, 19th February 1830, 8 Shaw's Rep. 564.; Rose v. Macleay, 4 Shaw's Rep. 812; affirmed on appeal, 2 Shaw and Maclean, 958).

Respondents.—The judgments appealed from were substantially pronounced with the consent of the appellants, who have judicially waived all opposition to the petitions the prayers of which were granted by these judgments; and in as far as the diligences recalled by the interlocutors appealed from had been used against the trust estate of Mr. Stevens, they were rightly and justly recalled, because they were radically void and inept, inasmuch as they were not directed against the proper party, but only against one trustee; while it was found by the final judgment in the action that there was an existing quorum of accepting and acting trustees, who alone were entitled to represent and bind the trust estate.

To establish the validity of such diligence it must [208] be directed against the proper debtor. In the present case part of the subjects against which the diligence was executed consisted of the trust estate of Mr. Stevens, vested in his trustees for the purposes of the trust; and the diligence could be legally used only by a person who had become a creditor of the trust estate; and no person could be such a creditor except in respect of a debt contracted by persons entitled to bind the trust estate, that is, by the trustees acting in terms of the trust settlement.

In order to make the debts said to have been contracted by Mr. Fyffe as a trustee good claims upon the trust property, it was necessary that Mr. Fyffe should have had power to burden and bind that estate. Whatever may be the effect of deeds done or debts contracted by a whole body of trustees, or by a majority or a quorum of that body, no single trustee is entitled to usurp these powers, unless the settlement which constitutes the trust were to contain a provision that every one of the trustees should have all the powers of the whole body. Unless all the powers of Mr. Stevens's trustees had either been given to Mr. Fyffe by the trust deed, or had come to be vested in him by the death or refusal to accept of all the other trustees, he could no more bind and dispose of the estate as a single trustee than as an individual not a trustee; and those who deal with a person professedly acting as a trustee, are bound to satisfy themselves as to his powers, and that he is acting within them.

As the summons which is the foundation of the diligence was exclusively directed against Mr. Fyffe as the sole accepting and acting trustee, it was only [209] as against him that inhibition and arrestment could be used.

The arrestments recalled by the interlocutors, having been used to attach the rents of Baron Fyffe's property, were rightly and justly recalled, because the respondents, who were owners of that property, not only were not debtors to the appellants, but were not said to be debtors, and the action on the dependence of which the arrestments were used was neither directed against them nor contained any conclusion against them.

Arrestment of the rents of this property could be used only on debts due by the proprietors, and no arrestment at the instance of a creditor of one of the proprietors could be valid to attach any thing more than the share of the rents belonging to that one. But not one of the children, neither the respondents nor any of their brothers and sisters, were so much as named as defenders in the summons, which proceeded exclusively against Mr. and Mrs. Fyffe, for whose debts, if they had contracted such debts, the children were not responsible, and their property could not be attached; neither was there any conclusion for payment against any of the children, simply because the appellants could not aver that any one of them had contracted a debt; and even the summons was not executed against any of the children, nor were they called as defenders in the action. Accordingly, the final judgment in the cause has found that, "in so far as the rights and interests in the estate of the said Baron Fyffe are vested in the children of the said James Fyffe, there is no competent conclusion in the summons under which any judgment can be pro-[210]-nounced to affect the said children, or their rights and interests in the said estate."

As Mr. and Mrs. Fyffe and six of the children had conveyed their shares of Baron Fyffe's property to the respondent Mr. Gibb as a heritable security for money advanced by him to them, and that security was granted and completed by a recorded infestment before the arrestments at the instance of the appellants were used, these arrestments were of no effect as in a question with him, and therefore were rightly and justly recalled at his instance by the interlocutor under appeal.

Under these circumstances the respondents submit that the judgments appealed from ought to be affirmed, because, as the inhibition and arrestments thereby recalled had been used on the dependence of an action to constitute certain alleged claims as debts against the trust estate of Mr. Stevens, and the shares of Baron Fyffe's property belonging to Mr. Fyffe's children, and it was found and decided that these claims did not form good debts against the one property or the other, the diligences themselves necessarily fell to be discharged (Bell, ii. 151).

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this case, which is very much connected with that upon which your Lordships gave judgment last week, was heard before that case, but I thought it expedient to postpone the consideration of the judgment in this case until that had been disposed of. My Lords, I think the result has [211] proved that to be a good arrangement, inasmuch as the decision to which your Lordships came in that case will no doubt weigh very much upon your minds in the present.

This was an appeal against an order "recalling the inhibition as far as regarded Captain James Fyffe as a trustee, discharging the arrestment mentioned, and all other arrestments used at the instance of the trustees by virtue of the said letters of arrestment in the hands of the person therein named." But then it reserved to Mrs. Barbara Stuart or Herriot all claims of relief against James John Fraser, writer to the signet, and so on. The result of this was, that after an interlocutor declaring the rights of the parties in this suit of intromission, the attachments which had been obtained pending the suit on the application of the parties against whom they were obtained were discharged in the manner stated in the interlocutor. The nature of the suit was a claim on behalf of those who claimed originally through Mr. Fraser as the party actually pursuing, but claiming through him in respect of a trust estate which had been given by Mr. Stevens in trust for the separate use of the wife, and after her death to the children, excluding the husband. By that trust deed the husband was made a trustee with several other persons; it also affected certain estates which had descended from Baron Fyffe, which he gave to his brother James Fyffe and his wife and their children in equal portions. My Lords, it has been argued that that gave an estate to James Fyffe which he had power to dispose of. I apprehend it is quite immaterial for the present purpose that your Lordships should consider that question, inasmuch as it is a point not made [212] by the pursuers here; and it is a question not only not made by the pursuers, but the interlocutor as it stands assumes that the children had an immediate interest in that property. The summons states the title of the parties in these words:—"That Baron Fyffe died, and the said James Fyffe, Mrs. Jean Stevens or Fyffe, and their children on that event by virtue of the said last-mentioned will or deed of settlement succeeded to the two third parts or shares of the different properties." And in the interlocutor which is appealed from, and which declares the rights of the parties to the suit which is the subject of the present appeal, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, which is affirmed on reclaiming to the Inner House, states, "that so far as the rights and interests in the estate of Baron Fyffe are vested in the children of James Fyffe, there is no competent conclusion in the summons under which any judgment can be pronounced to affect the said children, or their rights or interests in the said estate." The children were in fact not made parties to that suit.

My Lords, the law of Scotland as relating to this subject is, I believe, very accurately stated in the case of the appellants. I have referred to the authorities there cited, and I see no reason to doubt the accuracy of it; and taking the law as there laid down, I think your Lordships will have very little difficulty in applying it to the present case. It is stated in the eighth page of their case:—"But arrestments or inhibitions in security, or in other words used for securing debts, either future or contingent, according to their own nature, or, like the debt in the present instance, actually claimed to be due but not yet constituted [213] by decree, the diligences are liable to be abused, and creditors are occasionally found employing them for the purposes of vexation or oppression. In these cases the Court of Session, in the exercise of their equitable powers, are authorized to grant a remedy by either recalling the diligence in toto or on caution to a limited extent. But in all applications of that nature by the debtor, it lies upon him to make out a case of vexation or oppression, and to show sufficient cause for the interference of the Court, as the recall or modification of diligence is an extraordinary exercise of power, to be applied only in cases of excess or abuse of legal remedies (Bell's Principles of the Law of Scotland, p. 680). Thus it is also observed by Professor Bell that arrestment in security may be recalled without caution or loosed on caution in the following cases: first, where arrestment in security is used oppressively, and even where used nimiously (i.e. where it is a superfluous and vexatious precaution), the Lord Ordinary on the bills seems entitled to recall it, or restrict it, or grant warrant for loosing without caution, as in a future or contingent debt, where there is no change in the debtor's credit, or where the creditor is already secured by diligence, caution, etc., and there is no ground to suspect the security: second, loosing on caution when the time of payment has not arrived or the debt is not yet constituted, or when it is under suspension; the arrestment may be loosed on caution, and the arrestee authorized to deliver up the subject or pay the debt. This is done on a bill for loosing the arrestment in the Court of Session, on an application to the Judge [214] by whose warrant the arrestment has been used. The proceeding is either, first, for a special loosing of some particular arrestment, or second, for a general loosing of all arrestments used or to be used by the creditor (Bell's Principles of the Law of Scotland, pp. 671, 672). In like manner as to inhibition the same author observes, that inhibition may be recalled, if injurious or oppressive, where the debt is future, contingent, or not yet constituted; not where the debt is due" (Ibid. p. 680).

Now, my Lords, assuming that to be a correct representation of the law of Scotland, it is only necessary to call your Lordships' attention to the facts of the case, and to see whether this is not a case in which the Court was bound to recall these attachments. My Lords, the claim, as I have stated, was made by the party pursuing, claiming in the right of Fraser, upon the inhibition and arrestment having issued. No application was made to get rid of them until the interlocutor to a certain extent had adjudicated upon the rights of the parties. When that interlocutor had been pronounced application was made to get rid of these proceedings. The only party in the cause, (Fraser having parted with his interest) was Mrs. Stuart, claiming in the right of Fraser, and therefore of course affected by all the equities which might affect Fraser.

The first objection to this order was, that there was not a proper service; that Fraser himself, being no party to the record, was at the time in England, and there was no regular service of the order; that, though regular in point of form, in substance it was no notice to Fraser. Now, what was the proceeding which was [215] adopted by the parties pursuing, against whom the application was made? They certainly applied in the first instance for time to communicate with Fraser; then this representation was made to the Court:—"The respondent begs farther to state, that, although in consequence of the arrangement which her son made with Mr. Fraser, she is not yet perhaps in a situation to prevent the latter from using her name, if he thinks proper, in answering this petition, notwithstanding steps which she is adopting in order to get rid of the predicament of allowing her name to continue to be used in this manner. She herself has no intention to trouble the Court with opposition to the petition upon its merits if Mr. Fraser shall not so oppose it in her name; she presumes that in that event petitioners would not demand expenses from her." Though the parties were to go on in the name of Fraser, she forbids their going on in her name; but he was the only party with whom the other parties could deal, and the only party with whom they were contending upon the record. In point of fact, she does not make any resistance to the order so obtained.

My Lords, with respect to the merits of the case; first of all, as to Stevens's estate. Here is a trust under which, by some strange arrangement, the husband, against whom a provision was made, was constituted a trustee for the wife, the property being settled on the wife and children to the exclusion of the husband. The husband, in his character of trustee, to a certain degree deals with this property. That is decided by the interlocutor which is appealed from to be improper,—that there was no right of dealing with the rents of [216] this estate, which were to be applied yearly to the aliment of the wife and family. There was a power in the trustees, in an event which never took place, of raising money; but that power not only never was exercised, but never could be exercised so as to interfere with the property. There, therefore, in regard to that estate was nothing which could be constituted a debt except the year's rent. In the summons there is no other claim; but the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary opens a door to the possibility of a further claim, namely, that by possibility there may have been expenses incident to the trust, that is, in executing the trust to which Captain Fyfe as trustee may have a claim against the estate. There is no such statement in the summons. It is a possibility, according to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, which might affect the rights of the parties; and if such a claim did arise, it might affect the corpus of the estate. Now, first of all, there is an extreme improbability of the parties making out a claim which they never thought of suggesting upon the record, but still the interlocutor leaves it open to them, if they care to make it out.

With regard to the estate of Baron Fyfe, the interlocutor, without referring at all to the will under which the question must arise, states that quoad the interests of the children, they, not being parties to the proceeding, could not possibly be affected by the proceedings which took place between the parties. The claim of Fraser is through James Fyfe acting as trustee for Baron Fyfe's estate; there was no trust, so far as James Fyfe might be a debtor to Fraser. No doubt, any interest he might have in the estate might be subject to the proceedings; but as far as the wife and children [217] are concerned, which is affirmed in the interlocutor, and is assumed indeed by the language of the summons itself, they cannot be affected by any proceedings which have taken place in this cause.

My Lords, under these circumstances the interlocutor which has been adhered to in the Inner House has declared, that quoad the trust estate there was no right in Fraser beyond a possibility, which does not touch the present question; for there is no question as to the current year's rent; the proceeding is in respect of future years' rent; and as to the interest of the wife and children in Baron Fyfe's estate, there is no question which can arise as to any right existing in Fraser claiming through James Fyfe to so much as may belong to James Fyfe himself. Under these circumstances, there being nothing against the trust estate but this possibility of a claim—so little likely to succeed as not to be included in the summons, the whole of the trust property and the whole of Baron Fyfe's property are subjected to this process of attachment upon the application of the parties who were appellants. According to the authorities referred to by the appellants themselves the court thought proper to recall this attachment, and, if there were nothing else, it would be quite clear that the Court made a proper adjudication of the rights as far as the interlocutor goes. Under the adjudication of those rights there is very little which by possibility can remain to the pursuer to recover in that case. If no more were shewn, I should have thought the Court had exercised a sound discretion in recalling the attachment in respect of this property. But, my Lords, there are other circumstances in the case to which I have not alluded, [218] but which are perfectly conclusive. This all proceeds upon the ground that Fraser is a creditor upon the trust estate; your Lordships have had before you an interlocutor of the Court of Session which makes him a debtor of £2500 upon the same estate. In the case which stood immediately after the one now under consideration, there is the judgment of the Court of Session in favour of that demand against Fraser, and your Lordships have affirmed that interlocutor. The demand therefore is finally established, and instead of being a creditor he is proved to be a debtor to the estate. That fact is quite conclusive in this case; the parties who appear here as respondents come here not only to protect their interest against the demand of Fraser but to establish a claim against Fraser. It is unnecessary to go further into the case, because when you find, independently of the merits of the case as established upon this record, the party claiming the benefit of these proceedings by his appeal is by the judgment of your Lordships' House proved to be a debtor instead of a creditor, there must be an end of any debt which would entitle him to be paid out of this supposed security which is the subject of the proceedings now under discussion. There are now, therefore, additional reasons beyond those which appeared to the Court of Session for this interlocutor, and I cannot help saying that in my opinion there never was a case which has come before your Lordships in which it was more clearly shewn that the interlocutor of the Court of Session ought to be affirmed, and affirmed with costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this [219] House, and that the said interlocutors therein complained of be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellant, the said James John Fraser, do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal since he so sisted himself as appellant as aforesaid, the amount of such costs to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is also further ordered, That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

[220] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

THE PRESBYTERY OF AUCHTERARDER, Appellants.—Sir F. Pollock—Pemberton—R. Bell; The EARL OF KINNOULL and the Rev. ROBERT YOUNG, Respondents.—Attorney General (Campbell)—Knight Bruce—Whigham* [3d May 1839].

[See 3 St. Tr. N.S. 1298. S.C. 6 Cl. and F. 646, 7 Scots R.R. 154, and, in Court below, 16 Dunlop, 661, and Robertson's Report of the Auchterarder Case (1838). See also Ferguson v. Kinnoull (Earl of), 9 Cl. and F. 251. See also the Church Patronage (Scotland) Act, 1874.]

Patronage—Church—Jurisdiction—Acquiescence.—A patron granted a presentation to a vacant church and parish in favour of a presentee, who accepted of it; the presbytery of the bounds found that they must proceed to fill up the vacancy, in terms of an act of the general assembly 31st May 1834, entitled "Overture and Interim Act on Calls," and the relative act of assembly, 2d * Rep. 16 D.B.M. 661, and see "Report of Auchterarder Cause," by Charles Robertson, Esq., Advocate, 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1838.

June 1834, entitled "Overture with Regulations for carrying the above Act into effect," in which sentence the patron acquiesced; the presbytery further "did, in pursuance of the first regulation of the act of assembly anent calls, in so far sustain the presentation as to find themselves prepared to appoint a day for moderating in a call to the presentee;" the call was signed by three individuals; no special objections were stated against the presentee, but a veto or dissent was lodged by a large majority of the male heads of families, members of the congregation, and in full communion with the church. The patron and presentee took appeals to the superior church courts against the admission of those dissents; but, on the ground exclusively that the provisions of the acts of assembly had not been adhered to, these appeals [221] were dismissed. The presbytery thereafter, without taking the presentee on trials as to his life, doctrine, or literature, etc., did, in respect of that dissent or disapproval, and in conformity with the above acts of assembly, "reject the presentee, so far as regarded the particular presentation on their table, and the occasion of that vacancy in the parish." The patron and presentee then raised a declarator against the presbytery, concluding, inter alia, that the presentee had been validly and effectually presented to the church and parish; that the presbytery were and are bound to make trial of his qualifications, and, if they found him qualified, were bound to receive and admit him as minister of the church and parish; and that their rejection of the presentee was illegal, and contrary to the laws and statutes libelled. The presbytery admitted the validity of the presentation, but, as to the other conclusions above recited, they declined the jurisdiction of the Civil Court as incompetent to determine as against them, their duty as a Church Court being in a matter ecclesiastical; but, under reservation of that objection, they pleaded in defence that their whole proceedings were, on the merits, unchallengeable:—Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Session) that the objection to the jurisdiction of the Court ought to be repelled; that the pursuer, the presentee, was validly and effectually presented to the church and parish; that the presbytery did and do refuse to take trial of his qualifications, and had rejected him as presentee, on the sole ground that a majority of the male heads of families, communicants in the said parish, had dissented, without any reason assigned, from his admission as minister; that the presbytery in so doing acted to the hurt and prejudice of the pursuers, illegally and in violation of their duty, and contrary to the provisions of the statutes libelled, particularly 10 Anne, c. 12, intituled "An Act to restore patrons to their ancient rights of presenting ministers to the churches vacant in that part of Great Britain called Scotland;" and that the defences of the presbytery should be in so far repelled.

[222] At a meeting of the general assembly of the kirk of Scotland, held on 31st May 1834, it was declared and enacted, among other things, "that it shall be an instruction to presbyteries, that if, at the moderating in a call to a vacant pastoral charge, the major part of the male heads of families, members of the vacant congregation and in full communion with the church, shall disapprove of the person in whose favour the call is proposed to be moderated in, such disapproval shall be deemed sufficient ground for the presbytery rejecting such person, and that he shall be rejected accordingly, and due notice thereof forthwith given to all concerned." Regulations were framed at a meeting of assembly on 2d June 1834, and transmitted as an interim act to presbyteries for their approval.

The church and parish of Auchterarder became vacant by the death of the Rev. Charles Stewart, on 31st August 1834.

Upon the 16th September 1834 the Earl of Kinnoull, the undoubted patron of the said church and parish, granted a presentation in favour of the Rev. Robert Young, a duly qualified licentiate of the church of Scotland.

At a meeting of the presbytery of Auchterarder, held at Trinity Gask on the 14th of October 1834, Mr. Robert Hope Moncrieff, writer in Perth, on the part of the Earl of Kinnoull, laid on the table of the presbytery the said presentation, duly executed, his lordship in the usual form thereby nominating and appointing Mr.

Young to be minister of the said church and parish, and requiring the reverend the moderator and presbytery of Auchterarder to take trial of the qualification, literature, good life, and conversation of the said [223] Robert Young; and after having found him fit and qualified for the functions of the ministry in the church and parish of Auchterarder, to admit and receive him thereto, by ordaining and admitting him in due and competent form accordingly, all conform to the deed of presentation itself.

There were produced to the presbytery by the said Robert Hope Moncrieff a certificate that the Earl of Kinnoull had, as patron, qualified himself to exercise his right of patronage by taking the requisite oaths to government; a letter of acceptance, by the Rev. Robert Young, of the presentation; a certificate of his having qualified himself to accept of and hold the said presentation, by taking the usual oaths to government; also the usual parochial certificate; and a certificate signed by five ministers of the presbytery of Dundee, that the pursuer, the Rev. Robert Young, was a duly qualified licentiate of the church of Scotland, having received his licence from the said presbytery. There was likewise produced an engagement to exhibit an extract of the pursuer's licence as soon as a meeting of the presbytery of Dundee should be held. The deed of presentation and relative papers having been read, they were appointed to lie on the table till next meeting of presbytery.

At a meeting of the presbytery, which was held at Auchterarder on the 27th of October 1834, Mr. Robert Hope Moncrieff, on the part of the Earl of Kinnoull, produced an extract of the licence of the pursuer, the Rev. Robert Young, as a preacher of the gospel, and testimonial in his favour by the presbytery of Dundee; which having been read, and the presbytery "considering that all the documents usually given in [224] cases of this kind have already been laid on the table, along with the presentation by the Earl of Kinnoull to Mr. Robert Young, preacher of the gospel, to be minister of the church and parish of Auchterarder," did so far sustain the presentation as to find themselves prepared to appoint a day for moderating in a call to the pursuer; and accordingly they appointed one of their number to preach in the church of Auchterarder on Sunday then next, being the 2d of November, and to intimate that the presentee would preach in the church of Auchterarder on Sunday the 16th, and again on Sunday the 23d of the same month. Intimation was likewise directed to be made that the presbytery would meet in the church of Auchterarder on Tuesday the 2d of December, to moderate in a call, in the usual way, to the pursuer, the Rev. Robert Young, to be minister of that parish. In the foresaid deliverance of the presbytery of Auchterarder Mr. Hope Moncrieff, on the part of the Earl of Kinnoull, acquiesced, and took instruments in the clerk's hands; but in so far as the deliverance at all sustained the presentation, two of the members of the presbytery dissented, on the ground that by so doing the presbytery did seem to homologate and approve of patronage.

At a meeting of the presbytery which was held at Auchterarder on the 2d of December 1834, for the purpose of moderating in a call to the pursuer, there was produced and read a call, subscribed in his favour by three of the parishioners, to be minister of the said church and parish; whereupon the presbytery, in terms of the said interim act of assembly, afforded an opportunity to the heads of families, members of the congregation and in communion with the church, by [225] themselves, or by an agent duly authorized, to state any special objections or dissents to the settlement of the pursuer, of whatever nature such objections might be; but no special objections were given in. In terms of the said interim act the presbytery then proceeded to afford an opportunity to the male heads of families, whose names were alleged to stand on a roll, "to give in dissents on the call and settlement of Mr. Robert Young as minister of the parish. The following heads of families (287 in number), whose names stand on the roll, did then appear before the presbytery, and did personally deliver their dissent or disapproval of the presentee:" and the presbytery thereupon found that "dissents have been lodged by an apparent majority of the persons on the roll inspected by the presbytery," and they adjourned consideration of the case until their next meeting, to be held at Auchterarder on the 16th of December 1834; against which sentence a protest was taken for Mr. Young.

At another meeting of the presbytery, which was held at Auchterarder on the 16th of December 1834, in respect that none of the persons who had dissented from the settlement of Mr. Young appeared to withdraw their dissents, the presbytery again found "that there is a majority of the persons on the roll still dissenting."

These proceedings having been submitted to the review of the superior church courts, viz., the synod of Perth and Stirling and the general assembly, and a remit having been made to the presbytery to proceed in terms of "the interim act of the then last general assembly," at a meeting of the presbytery held at Auchterarder on the 7th of July 1835, the presbytery, [226] by their deliverance and sentence, did "reject the pursuer, Mr. Robert Young, the presentee to Auchterarder, so far as regards the particular presentation now on their table and the occasion of this vacancy in the parish of Auchterarder, and do forthwith direct their clerk to give notice of this their determination to the patron, the presentee, and the elders of Auchterarder."

No special objections were stated against the presentee's qualification or settlement; the presbytery nevertheless did not take him upon trials, and pronounce judgment on his qualifications as presentee foresaid; but refused to do so, and to admit and receive him as minister of the said church and parish.

Thereafter a summons of declarator was brought in the Court of Session by the Earl of Kinnoull, as patron, and Mr. Young, as the presentee of the parish of Auchterarder, which summons (as amended) libelled on the statutes 1567, c. 7; 1592, c. 116 and 117; 1690, c. 23; 10 Anne, c. 12 (1712); and set forth the above proceedings, and refusal of the presbytery to induct the presentee. It then proceeded:—"That the foresaid judgments or deliverances of the said presbytery, of date 2d December 1834 and 7th July 1835, were ultra vires illegal and unwarrantable, in so far as that though by the laws and statutes before libelled the presbytery were bound and astricted to make trial of the qualifications of the pursuer, Robert Young, as presentee to the church and parish of Auchterarder, and were not entitled to delegate to or devolve that duty on third parties, or to denude and abandon their right and duty as a church court, to judge of [227] and decide upon the qualifications and fitness of the presentee for the pastoral office and charge; and after examination by said presbytery, if the pursuer, the said Robert Young, as presentee foresaid, was found to be duly qualified, the said presbytery were bound and astricted as aforesaid to have admitted and inducted him into the office of minister of the church and parish of Auchterarder; nevertheless, though the pursuer, the said Robert Young, is duly qualified as a licentiate of the church of Scotland and presentee foresaid, as well as in all other respects, to be received and admitted minister of the church and parish of Auchterarder, and though no objections have been stated against his qualifications, the presbytery not only refused, and continued to refuse, to take the pursuer upon trials, and to pronounce judgment on his qualifications as presentee, or to admit and receive him as minister of the church and parish of Auchterarder, but have by their sentence rejected him as presentee to the said church and parish without trial, without taking cognizance of his qualifications as presentee, and expressly on the ground that they cannot and ought not to do so in respect of a veto of the parishioners. In all which respects the said presbytery, and the individual members thereof, have exceeded the powers conferred on them by law, and acted illegally, in violation of their duty and of the laws and statutes libelled, and that to the serious prejudice of the patrimonial rights of the pursuers: and although the pursuers, as patron and presentee foresaid, have often desired and required the said presbytery and the present individual members [228] thereof to discharge their duty in terms of law and the statutes libelled, by proceeding with the trials, admission, and final settlement of the pursuer, the said Robert Young, as minister of the church and parish of Auchterarder, yet they illegally, contumaciously, and in violation of their duty, and to the serious injury and prejudice of the patrimonial rights of the pursuers, refused and continue to refuse so to do."

The principal conclusion was, "Therefore it ought and should be found and declared, by decree of the Lords of our Council and Session, that the pursuer, the said Robert Young, has been legally, validly, and effectually presented to the church and parish of Auchterarder: That the presbytery of Auchterarder, and the individual members thereof, as the only legal and competent court to that effect by law constituted, were bound and astricted to make trial of the qualifications of the pursuer, and are still bound so to do; and if in their judgment, after due trial and examination, the pursuer is found qualified, the said presbytery are bound and astricted to receive and admit the pursuer as minister of the church and parish of Auchterarder according to law: That the rejection of the pursuer by the said presbytery as presentee foresaid, without making trial of his qualifications in competent and legal form, and without any objections having been stated to his qualifications, or against his admission as minister of the church and parish of Auchterarder, and expressly on the ground that the said presbytery cannot and ought not to do so in respect of a veto of the parishioners, was illegal, and injurious to the patrimonial rights of [229] the pursuer, and contrary to the provisions of the statutes and laws libelled."

The summons also contained other conclusions, the first of which was directed against the presbytery and the collector of the ministers widows fund, for decree ordaining them not to molest the said Robert Young in the possession and enjoyment of the stipend, manse, and glebe, and whole other emoluments belonging and pertaining to the said church and parish.

The next conclusion was directed against the heritors, for decree against them to pay their respective shares of the stipend to the said Robert Young during his life, and to perform and fulfil all the other obligations incumbent upon them, as heritors, to him, as legally, validly, and effectually presented to the said church and parish, or otherwise to declare that the Earl of Kinnoull had legally and validly and effectually exercised his right as patron; and that the said presbytery of Auchterarder, and the individual members thereof, had illegally and in violation of their duty and of the several laws and statutes before libelled, refused to make trial of the qualifications of the said presentee, but had illegally and in violation of their duty and of the laws and statutes libelled as aforesaid, rejected the said Robert Young as presentee; and therefore that the pursuer, the Earl of Kinnoull, had right to and was entitled to receive and retain the whole stipend and emoluments of and pertaining to the said church and parish of Auchterarder from the date of citation hereto, and in all time coming during the life of the said Robert Young; and it being so found and declared, the presbytery and collector of the widows fund, and all others, should be ordained to desist from molesting the pursuer, the said Thomas Ro-[230]bert Earl of Kinnoull, in the possession and use in time coming, during the life of the said Robert Young, of the stipend, manse, glebe, and other emoluments belonging and pertaining to the said church and parish, and that the heritors of the parish should be accordingly ordained to pay their respective shares of stipend to Lord Kinnoull during the life of Mr. Young.

The presbytery in their defences admitted Lord Kinnoull's right of patronage and the validity of the presentation, but objected to the jurisdiction of the civil court to take cognizance of and decide on proceedings of a church court, which, according to the enactments of the superior church judicatory as established by law, and by virtue of which the presbytery had acted, were warrantable and regular.

It was agreed that the discussion should be confined to the first or principal declaratory conclusion. A record was made up and closed.

The question at issue was raised by the following statement in the condescence for the pursuers:—Art XI.—"That the foresaid sentence" (that is to say, the sentence of the presbytery of 7th July 1835,) "whereby the presbytery rejected the Rev. Robert Young, pursuer, as presentee to the church and parish of Auchterarder, proceeded exclusively on the ground of the veto or dissents exercised by the alleged majority of heads of families or parishioners of Auchterarder."

The answer made to that statement by the presbytery was, Ans. XI.—"Admitted."

The Lord Ordinary reported the cause on Cases, and by order of the Lords of the First Division a hearing in presence took place before the whole [231] Court, and their Lordships, having taken time to consider, delivered their opinions seriatim at great length.

Thereafter, upon hearing counsel for the parties and before pronouncing judgment, the Court, 8th March 1838, allowed the following minutes to be lodged:—

"MINUTE for the Reverend the Presbytery of Auchterarder.

"Mr. Solicitor General for the presbytery of Auchterarder, of consent of the Dean of the Faculty, for the pursuers, craved the Court to allow the following plea in defence to be added to the record:—

"The pursuers are barred by acquiescence from objecting to the proceedings of the presbytery of Auchterarder and pleading that the same were illegal.

(Signed) And. Rutherford.

"Edinburgh, 8th March 1838.—The Lords, having heard the above minute of consent of parties, allow the above plea in defence to be added to the record. (Signed 10th March.) (Signed) C. Hope, I.P.D."

"MINUTE in answer for the pursuers.

"Before the Court proceeded to give judgment and pronounce their interlocutor the Dean of Faculty, on the part of the pursuers, stated that he did not and never had objected to the Court entertaining and considering any plea raised by the defenders in argument, either as to the alleged personal objection to the action founded on acquiescence stated in the proceedings of the presbytery under the veto act, or as to the alleged objection to the sufficiency of the summons.

(Signed) John Hope."

The following interlocutor was thereupon pronounced: [232]—"Edinburgh, 8th March 1838.—The Lords of the First Division having considered the Cases for the Earl of Kinnoull and the Reverend Robert Young, and for the presbytery of Auchterarder, with the record and productions and additional plea in defence admitted to the record, and heard counsel for the said parties at great length in presence of the Judges of the Second Division and Lords Ordinary, and having heard the opinions of the said judges, they, in terms of the opinions of the majority of the judges, repel the objections to the jurisdiction of the Court and to the competency of the action, as directed against the presbytery: Further, repel the plea in defence of acquiescence: Find, that the Earl of Kinnoull has legally, validly, and effectually exercised his right as patron of the church and parish of Auchterarder, by presenting the pursuer, the said Robert Young, to the said church and parish: Find, that the defenders, the presbytery of Auchterarder, did refuse, and continue to refuse, to take trial of the qualifications of the said Robert Young, and have rejected him as presentee to the said church and parish on the sole ground (as they admit on the record) that a majority of the male heads of families, communicants in the said parish, have dissented, without any reason assigned, from his admission as minister: Find, that the said presbytery in so doing have acted to the hurt and prejudice of the said pursuers, illegally and in violation of their duty, and contrary to the provisions of certain statutes libelled on, and in particular contrary to the provisions of the statute of 10 Anne, c. 12, intituled, An act to restore patrons to their ancient rights of presenting [233] ministers to the churches vacant in that part of Great Britain called Scotland: In so far repel the defences stated on the part of the presbytery, and decern and declare accordingly, and allow the above decree to go out and be extracted as an interim decree; and, with these findings and declarations, remit the process to the Lord Ordinary, to proceed further therein as he shall see just. (Signed 10th March.) (Signed) C. Hope, I.P.D."

The presbytery appealed.

Appellants.—Two questions had to be considered: (1) whether the general assembly were competent to pass, cum effectu, the interim act of 2d June 1834? and (2) whether, supposing that such interim act was alleged to be ultra vires of the general assembly, the Court of Session had power to entertain the question of its legality? Now, all that related to the call, trial, induction, or collation of ministers was matter purely of ecclesiastical regulation, and cognizable only by the ecclesiastical courts. The acts of the different assemblies from 1560 downwards proved that all such matters as now sanctioned by the laws and daily practice of Scotland were so determined on by the assembly in exercise of its strictly ecclesiastical powers. The propriety or wisdom of the different acts of assembly did not come into question; the proper inquiry being, whether the assembly had the right. Now, the usage or actual exercise of power afforded the strongest confirmation of its legality. The constitution of the kirk of Scotland, as sanctioned and approved by acts of parliament, afforded no trace of any authority in the civil court to overrule [234] and control their proceedings in matters ecclesiastical, excepting during three short periods, which confirm the general rule.

With regard to the respective powers of the ecclesiastical Court and the Court of Session, it seemed to have been assumed that the Court of Session had an immemorial right to interfere in all matters affecting the rights of individuals; but this could not be, as that Court was established and its powers defined by act of parliament, which confined its proceedings to civil actions, and gave no jurisdiction in matters ecclesiastical. It could not be shown that ecclesiastical jurisdiction had been given by any subsequent statute. Besides the Court of Session or Supreme Civil Court, Scotland had also its Court of Justiciary or Supreme Criminal Judicatory, as well as its Church Courts, consisting of the General Assembly of the Kirk, and its subordinate tribunals, so that there were three separate coexistent though independent jurisdictions. The kirk, as reformed, succeeded to the whole jurisdiction exercised by the pope and bishops; and that was now vested in the proper Church Courts. The Commissary Court, now merged in the Court of Session, took cognizance of certain cases which might be considered partly civil and partly ecclesiastical; but no argument could be raised from that fact.

The recognition of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, exercised by its proper courts, was proved by abundant statutory authority; also by the text writers, excepting Bankton,* (the value of whose authority had been [235] commented on by Lord Moncreiff in his opinion below). The opinions of Forbes and Erskine were confirmed by decisions, and had been fortified by the actual exercise of legislative powers by the general assembly,—the inferior church judicatories being bound to give obedience to laws and usages sanctioned by the general assembly. The decisions of the Court of Session, corrective of excess in the exercise of statutory powers by inferior courts, were not applicable, particularly where a party had not followed out his regular course of appeal through such inferior judicatories.

And even although the act of assembly complained of might be ultra vires, still, as was shown by the authorities, well explained by Lord Cockburn below, the Court of Session had no power to direct an inquiry by civil process into the legality or illegality of the act, for it is a civil court merely, possessing only civil jurisdiction, as given by statute; and where it possessed jurisdiction in certain ecclesiastical matters it was only where such jurisdiction was given by statute.

Did the question here involve matter of civil or ecclesiastical jurisdiction? The call and ordination of a minister to discharge the duties of the cure of a parish could not be considered otherwise than as ecclesiastical matter. There was no such thing in Scotland as ministerium vacuum; for there a minister is licensed, and when ordained is set apart to a particular cure. Then the call is no mere matter of form. No minister could be admitted unless there had been a moderation of the call, which was, therefore, a necessary as well as a substantial part of the ecclesiastical procedure in the settlement of a minister. Upon the record as between these parties there was no question [236] upon which the Court of Session could pronounce a valid decision. Viewing it as a question of the fitness of the minister presented, that Court had no power; it was not enough to say that it related to the acceptableness of a minister, and not to his fitness, as if it were not true that although acceptableness might not be fitness, still his unacceptableness was clearly unfitness, and therefore raised an inquiry as to his being qualified or fit, or not, for the cure of this particular parish. There was no instance of interference by the Court of Session, unless the right of the patron or stipend was affected. To synods there had been numerous and repeated appeals in ecclesiastical matters, and touching settlements, and also to the general assembly both by reference and appeal. In this case the appellant, Mr Young, had taken that course, although he afterwards thought proper to depart from that which was the legitimate mode, of having the authority of the general assembly, and the regularity of the proceedings of the presbytery enquired into and determined.

Respondents.—They now complained of a civil injury sustained through the refusal to admit a presentee duly licensed, and not on the score of qualification, as hitherto understood, but on the sole pretext of a veto or dissent, which went to a complete denial of the right of the patron. The important question then was, whether the patron and presentee had any remedy for the latter having been so illegally prevented from being admitted to the benefice. The appellants do not say there is any remedy; they allow that the present mode adopted was the proper remedy, or there was none; but said, the Court of Session had no jurisdiction, [237] and therefore the presentee had no redress. Suppose there had been a wrong, there must be a remedy; and to ascertain whether there was jurisdiction in the Court where the remedy was sought, the wrong—the illegality of the veto act—must be assumed. Injuria et damnum must be shown, and then the right of action arises; but there must be both.

Generally, the sound and obvious view was that up to the year 1834 it was not pretended that there was any law entitling presbyteries to refuse to take on trial presentees who, if qualified, were entitled to be ordained and inducted into the cure of the parish. Had the law before 1834 sanctioned exclusion on the score of dissent, there would have been no necessity for, and there would in fact have been no ecclesiastical legislation attempted on the subject. And the necessity of such legislation through the want of any such pre-existing right of dissent without reason, was evident from the notorious fact that the framers of the scheme did not at first agree as to the class of persons in whom such right of dissent, without reason assigned, should be placed; so that it must have been not in its administrative capacity as an ecclesiastical court, but as a legislative body, that the assembly acted in 1834; and it now sought as a court to interpret and enforce the law, not as sanctioned by the legislature and explained by the judicatories of the land, whether civil or ecclesiastical, but the law as confessedly made or altered by the assembly itself. Thus there was no conflict, and could be none betwixt the two courts, considered strictly as courts; and no conflict of decisions, so long as both courts confined their proceedings within proper judicial bounds.

The stat. 1592, c. 16, establishing presbytery, gives [238] collation on presentations to the presbytery, "providing the said presbyteries be bound and astricted to receive and admit quhatsoever qualified minister presented be his Majesty or laick patrons:" And by the 10th Queen Anne, c. 12, (1711,) it was again enacted and declared, on restoring patronage (which the stat. 1690, c. 23, had suspended,) "That the presbytery of the respective bounds shall and is hereby obliged to receive and admit in the same manner such qualified person or persons, minister or ministers, as shall be presented by the respective patrons:" And the duty thus imposed upon presbyteries by the legislature has never been discharged by any act of the legislature, and cannot be repudiated, destroyed, or abandoned by the kirk of Scotland, or any right of peremptory rejection of the presentee given by the church to a third party, to the effect both of excluding the duty imposed on the church courts and of defeating the patron's rights.

The interim act of the general assembly 1834 in the principle of it necessarily raises and disposes of questions of civil right, the determination of which belonged to and was within the jurisdiction and competence of the civil court; for the veto or right of peremptory rejection thereby conferred on the male heads of families in a parish was altogether distinct and separate from a call by the congregation, and unauthorized either by the nature of a call, or by any of the enactments of the church in regard to calls; and accordingly in this case the moderation of the call was over before the dissents or veto were given or asked for.

A call was never, during any period in the history of the kirk of Scotland prior to 1690, in which the right of patronage was recognized by law, admitted or acted upon as a means of controlling the right of patronage, [239] or as any part of or necessary to the title or appointment of the presentee, and to his right to be taken on trials, and (if found on trial to be qualified) to be inducted. The call, in its origin, object, and principle, was a mode of appointment or nomination when patronage was not in force or secured by law. After the restoration of patronage by the statute of Queen Anne the call continued to be acted upon as a mode of election in some cases in which the patrons did not choose to exercise their right of presentation at all; sometimes also as a mode of appearing to elect the presentee of the patron, in the hope of preserving a kind of protest against the act of parliament; but it was known and acknowledged that a call was not a form applicable to the case of presentation by a patron, or which could in that case have any effect against the title of the presentee, and his right to be taken on trials. And it came also to be resorted to for a considerable time by parties in the church, in order to thwart the right of presentation by an admitted perversion of the true object of a call.

A call by the congregation, in the sense of warranting peremptory rejection by the male heads of families without reasons assigned, is inconsistent with the rights of lay patronage, as part and parcel of the law of the established kirk of Scotland; and it had, by a series of adjudged cases in the Supreme Ecclesiastical Court, been determined that a call is of the nature of an invitation, which it is desirable the congregation should give for the encouragement of their pastor, and which in practice they are asked to give, but which is not part of ordinary vocation, (that is, of election or of title,) as defined in the book of discipline, nor anywise [240] essential to a presentee's induction and settlement as minister of a parish.

Whether the right of veto or of peremptory rejection, which is given to the male heads of families by the interim act of the general assembly of 1834 and relative regulations, be civil or ecclesiastical, it is wholly beyond the power of the church to confer on the members of congregation, or on any section of them, such power of rejection. The right of nomination to the office of minister of a church and parish is by law vested in the patron, subject to no approval or rejection by the people or congregation, but solely to the power of collation in the church courts, to try and adjudge the qualifications of the presentee.

Assuming that the general assembly had power as a legislative body to make regulations as to the qualifications of presentees, they were not entitled, consistently with the statutes founded on by the respondents, to enact and require that the presentee should be acceptable to the people, as the condition of his being taken upon trials and inducted to the office of minister of a particular church and parish, acceptableness not being a quality in the presentee at all, either absolutely and with reference to the duties of a minister in general, or relatively as regards the discharge of those duties in the particular parish to which he is presented. Acceptableness per se is not a matter within the province of collation, though the collators may inquire whether the want of it has arisen from a good and sufficient cause. If they give to it any other effect, they delegate to the male heads of families the office which was delegated to themselves, they substitute the choice of the male heads of families for the choice of the patron, and [241] to the exclusion of others just as capable to judge as the male heads of families thus arbitrarily selected.

The exercise of the right of nomination to the office of minister of a church and parish in Scotland, as well as to the benefice, is reserved and secured by statutes to lay patrons as a condition on the establishment of the national church of Scotland. And when the church courts jure devoluto nominate or call an individual to the office, it is by the exercise of the right of presentation which was in the patron, but which he had failed to exercise, and which in consequence is transferred to the church by a statutory devolution; and the right is then exercised by a deed of presentation flowing from the right of patronage as much as when it is exercised by a lay patron.

The power to give collation upon presentations, that is to say, of examining and admitting ministers to parishes, which is vested in the kirk of Scotland as a national establishment, is statutory in its origin, and defined and limited by statute; and but for the enactments of civil statutes the presentation would have filled the office, the act of ordination alone remaining to the church, but without any power of rejection of an unqualified person. The state conferred the power and imposed the duty of collation on the church, as a check upon the exercise of the right to present to the office, and as the only check consistent with the fair and free exercise of the right of patronage.

The power conferred and the duty imposed on the judicatories of the church by the statutes to judge of the qualifications of presentees, and to decide on objections stated to their qualifications, was one of the leading principles of presbytery; and the power and duty could [242] not, consistently with the statute law, either be wholly abandoned by the church courts, or devolved by them in whole or in part, on the congregation, or on any section of them, or on any other body or class of persons; and any claim of right to legislate on any matters, civil or ecclesiastical, which had been the subject of statutory enactment or provision, or to interfere with and affect the provisions of statutes, is inadmissible in point of law.

The church of Scotland established at the reformation was an entirely new ecclesiastical establishment. The state abolished the former established church, and all its powers, authority, and jurisdiction, and then by degrees, and by enacting special statutes to that effect, it formed and adopted another establishment. These statutes are, in Scotland, the sole origin and foundation of the national church as an establishment. The national church received from these statutes certain powers within which it must be confined, while at the same time certain duties were imposed in regard to the right of presentation. Those duties were again confirmed and imposed by the act of Queen Anne, and the established church cannot refuse to discharge them without its presbyteries committing a civil wrong, which is cognizable by the Supreme Civil Court. The church was limited, restrained, and confined as to its own powers and functions in regard to all the matters which formed the subject of statutory enactment: Hence the position recently broached on the part of some of the presbyteries of the church of Scotland,—that it is in truth the old church of Scotland, (that is, the popish church,) only reformed from its errors,—is as inconsistent with statute as it is absurd and extravagant, when the juris[243]-diction of the pope and the nature of presbytery are considered and compared.

A claim for an inherent power of legislation by an established church so as to destroy, restrain, or impair any civil rights, is inconsistent with any sound constitutional principle applicable to the connexion between the state and established church, and most dangerous to the rights and true liberties of the people of Scotland. And when any such claim is brought forward, it is the duty and province of the Supreme Civil Court to decide on the validity of such pretensions, and to enforce civil rights, and at the same time to restrain all bodies in the country within the limits assigned by law, so as to preserve the civil rights of others: this is clear upon the authorities. There was none to show that the church had the supreme legislative power; but on the contrary, there was authority that if the church courts exceeded their powers they were amenable to the law of the land. Where secular rights are concerned the Court of Session would interfere.

If the analogy of the law of England be resorted to, it would be found that that law was entirely adverse to the pleas of the appellants.

The arguments of counsel having been concluded (23d March 1839),—

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, the great importance of the question which you have now to determine, and the extent of matter which is necessary to be considered before you can safely come to an adjudication in this case, will, I am sure, induce your Lordships to postpone the consideration of it for such a length of time as may be necessary for that purpose; but at the [244] same time this is a case which for obvious reasons ought not to remain undecided beyond the period which may be absolutely necessary for the purpose of a due consideration of it. I would therefore suggest to your Lordships to postpone the consideration of the case for the present; but to resume the consideration of it at as early a day after the recess as may be consistent with your duly considering it.

Lord Brougham.—My Lords, I entirely agree with my noble and learned and much esteemed friend in recommending your Lordships to postpone your decision in this case, for the purpose of the necessary consideration of it in all its bearings, regard being had to its extreme importance; and, my Lords, at the same time I agree, as well for the peace of the church as of the people, we ought not to adjourn so indefinitely the consideration of it as to run the least risk of the decision of this cause not being finally given before the meeting of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.

My Lords, that being the opinion of my noble and learned friend and myself, I shall not at all enter into the merits of the question at present, farther than to say that I regard the question as one of very great importance, and that I do not see, in any view I can take of the case, any conflict whatever between the rights of patrons on the one hand, and of the church on the other, or between the church as an ecclesiastical or spiritual body on the one hand, and the flocks on the other,—hardly any conflict between the temporal and the spiritual courts on either side; but that I regard the interests, the views, and the peace of the whole community, the church and the laity, the courts spiritual and temporal, as all bound up together, and that in the [245] decision to which your Lordships may come you will not be giving the balance to one or the other of the conflicting parties, but adjusting it for the common interests and behoof of the whole.

My Lords, it greatly increases the difficulty of this case that not only is there some conflict of authority,—that not only is there very great discrepancy of opinion among some of the most learned and most able judges, who have dealt with the question on either side in the Court below; but that we are in this position; I say it particularly with reference to what last fell from the very able and learned counsel who has just addressed your Lordships in his most able, singularly able reply, where he alluded to a legislative measure; and something was said upon that also in the Court below, as well as on the other side of the bar by the counsel for the respondent. Now, my Lords, as the peace of the church and of the community is first of all to be considered, I am of this clear opinion, as at present advised, that it will be much better consulted by a judicial determination of the case than by a legislative measure,—that it will be much better and safer dealt with by having a declaration from the high authority of this highest court of law, of what the law is and what it always has been, and what the rights of all parties are under the law as it is and always has been established in Scotland, than by interposing with the strong hand of the supreme legislative power, and by an act of that supreme power making a new law to regulate the conflicting or supposed conflicting rights of the parties. If there is any disposition on any part to fall out with the ultimate decision I am quite sure [246] of one thing, that that disposition will be far more likely to be shown to fall out with an act of parliament, with an interposition, as it were, of a legislative nature, than with a judicial declaration of your Lordships, calmly considered, on the case, as if it were a question of science; without regard to conflicting interests, where indeed there is no conflict; without regard to conflicting passions and feelings, of which I am afraid there is considerable, than if it were left to an act of parliament, armed as parliament unquestionably is with supreme authority. My Lords, for this reason, then, I concur with my noble and learned friend and the rest of your Lordships, whose assistance I crave in considering the case. I shall be most happy to hear from them, as I know my noble and learned friend also will, what impression the arguments (to which they have given most exemplary attention, as good Scotchmen as well as judges of this High Court,) have made upon their minds, when we apply our minds to the case in a judicial point of view for the sake of coming to this, as I think, only satisfactory determination of it.

My Lords, it is quite unnecessary to state,—what it will be satisfactory to the people of Scotland to know, and it is for that reason I state it,—that never was a case of importance argued with greater resources and learning and ability than the case we have heard argued at your Lordships bar.

I suppose that the General Assembly meet on the 13th of May.

Mr. Whigham.—The 15th, my Lord

Lord Brougham.—Then we must give judgment before the 15th; and if I cannot be here I shall write [247] mine and send it to my noble and learned friend. Whether I am present or not I shall consider it my duty to write my judgment.

Judgment deferred.

Lord Brougham.—My Lords, in rising to state the opinion which I have formed upon this case, I own that I approach the question with very considerable anxiety,—an anxiety occasioned by its vast importance, increased by my knowledge of the deep and universal interest which it excites all over the kingdom of Scotland, and consummated by the very considerable difference of opinion which has prevailed among the learned judges who have decided it in the Court below,—a decision pronounced by very little more than a bare majority of the Court, preceded by very elaborate argument at the bar, accompanied also with very elaborate argument from the bench, and dissented from by no less than five of those learned persons who are among the most distinguished of the Scottish judges.

A circumstance occurs which might at first sight seem rather to relieve me from some part of this anxiety, but which, nevertheless, is in itself a source of considerable uneasiness—a circumstance common to myself and to my noble and learned friend, who is about to give his opinion upon this case. After an unremitting attention for five days to the able and learned arguments on both sides of the bar, I deemed it my duty equally to examine the reasons adduced in the ample discussion which the case received from the Scottish bench, having access to their opinions and their arguments in a shape which it were to be wished we had in all cases of any importance, and the want of [248] which it has often been my lot here to complain of, namely, the statement of their own reasoning, I may venture to say so far corrected by themselves as to be given in their own words. These reasons from those thirteen learned judges occupy a volume of nearly five hundred pages closely printed. It may therefore be safely assumed, that there is no one part of this question which has not been visited by all the light which their learning and capacity were fitted to throw upon it; and that we have every thing before us that passed below, as well as all that could be urged before your Lordships here, to enable us to steer our way through the various difficulties, or supposed difficulties of this subject.

Now it does so happen that in a case which has undergone so much discussion below, which has given rise to so great divisions among the judges below, which has been argued on either side at such length both at the bar and on the bench, both in Scotland and here, it does so happen that I have been with the utmost diligence seeking for difficulties, and found them not; that I have been, with all the power which I could bring to bear upon the investigation, wholly unable, and am to this hour unable to discover wherein the very great difficulty consists; and that I have come to my conclusion without any sort of doubt whatsoever resting upon that conclusion, or upon the grounds whereupon it is formed.

Now although this at first sight, as I have already said, may seem to relieve me from the anxiety natural to the position of one who is to decide upon an appeal such as this; yet in another view it rather increases that uneasiness, by making me dread lest matters which have [249] occurred to others, have been the source of their doubts, and the cause of their divisions, should have escaped me, and lest I may fall into error in exercising the function I am now called upon to perform. But it is a great satisfaction for me to know, and it bears me up completely in the position I am to occupy, that my noble and learned friend and myself have arrived at the same conclusion without any communication whatever upon this subject. From the time when the argument began, during the course of the argument, at the close of the argument, and during the interval that has since the argument elapsed, we have never had the least communication on the subject in any way, direct or indirect, till the last time of your Lordships sitting here, when we agreed to give judgment this morning; and upon that communication we both were found to have arrived at precisely the same conclusion; and I rather think (but my noble and learned friend will be better able to tell you than I am) that we entertain as little hesitation in our judgment the one as the other, being both of us unable to account for the question of law now at issue having been made the subject of such long and pertinacious contest.

My Lords, I say all this without the slightest disrespect to that most learned and venerable tribunal which has judged upon it below; because I know full well that it is of the nature of men, and the more so the more learned, and subtle, and able they are, that in proportion as a case coming before them is of great importance, and occupies the minds of the people by whom they are surrounded,—it is of the nature of men, and even of judges in such circumstances sometimes, rather to overdo the matter; and perhaps it is the safest [250] side upon which to err, because at all events it betokens their attention bestowed upon the subject, and it precludes the possibility of a hasty or unwary decision.

And now, before proceeding to state the grounds upon which, in my opinion, there can be no doubt whatever that the Court below have come to a right conclusion, and that their judgment should be affirmed here by your Lordships, I will take notice of a topic which we have heard more than once, and in more shapes than one urged at the bar. It was adverted to below; it was adverted to even in the judgments that have been pronounced; and I cannot withdraw from taking notice of it here. In reference to the great anxiety which this case excites in Scotland, and to the possible consequences of an affirmance of the judgment, much has been said of the public feeling in two forms, the feeling of the flock and the feeling of the pastor. With respect to the flock, I have no reason whatever to doubt, I am not permitted to doubt, that they will render a respectful obedience to the law of the land: but if I have no reason to doubt of this respecting the laity, how much less dare I question it with respect to the ministers of the gospel! To menace a tribunal with any disrespectful reception of its lawful decrees from the laity of the land is hardly conceivable; but to menace it with any disrespectful reception of a sentence pronounced by the judges of the land, to menace such lawless conduct on the part of the clergy, of the christian clergy of a christian church, the church of Scotland, whose head is Christ Himself, is not only indecorous, but it is preposterous, it is monstrous: I will not believe it till I see the fact,—a fact which I hope I shall not live to see, and which I hope no one [251] else will live to see, of the church of Scotland refusing to yield a willing as well as a respectful obedience to the lawful decision of the highest court of judicature in the realm, the court whose office it is to pronounce the law of that realm. It is for me to add, that if it were as certain the other way, still the law must take its course. If it were just as clear that the judgment we are about to give would be resisted, as I know it to be demonstrably certain that it will be cheerfully obeyed, still it is the office of your Lordships to pronounce your opinion upon the question of law brought before you; and you would betray your duty most grossly if you were to suffer yourselves to be diverted from pursuing the course of your duty by any fear of other persons still more scandalously betraying their duty both as ministers and as subjects, and still more flagrantly violating the law.

I will now proceed to state the reasons upon which I have come to a conclusion in favour of the judgment under appeal. They are short and satisfactory to my mind. They consist in reference to the statute law of the country, and they leave upon my mind no doubt whatever, unless we are to allow niceties drawn from antiquarian lore, subtleties gathered from disputed points of church history, refinements borrowed from the controversies among theologians of past ages and metaphysical distinctions and arguments ab inconvenienti, and misconceived notions with respect to the bounds and limits of jurisdictions to pervert the plain intendment of statute law, that intendment which is to be gathered from the words of the legislature, which is confirmed by the reason of the thing, which is established above all by the manifest purpose of the enact-[252]-ment, as declared by the law-givers themselves, and which is ultimately clenched, as it were, and made fixed and sure by comparison with other branches, other principles, and other provisions of the law itself.

Now, my Lords, when I go at all, after what I have said, into the historical matter belonging to, or rather, perhaps, brought into and made to encumber this case, and much of which is more curious than useful in the argument, your Lordships will presently perceive it is with a view of helping out the construction to which I am coming, and for no other purpose. I shall, therefore, for a moment look to what was the original interposition of the people in question of presentment and induction into benefices, and then I find that at no time, even when the rights of patronage were the least known, and therefore the worst secured, at no time did the people's share in the operation bear the least resemblance to what is contended for in the present case.

But, first of all, it is certainly convenient and satisfactory to find that we have no dispute whatever here relating to the facts: Lord Kinnoull's undoubted right to the advowson, or the patronage of the living, is clear; his having presented Mr. Robert Young to that living is clear. The presentment having by the presbytery been received within due time is admitted; it having been sustained, as they are pleased to call it, is admitted also. What effect that sustentation has had, or what use or purpose it has served, is another question. The refusal afterwards of the presbytery to ordain and induct Mr. Young to the living is admitted; and, in the sixth place, the ground of that refusal (and this is most important) is distinctly admitted; it forms the whole subject matter of the controversy, and I shall now call [253] your attention to the statement of it upon the record in the eleventh article of the condescendence, and the answer of the presbytery. The allegation in the condescendence is this:—"The aforesaid sentence, whereby the presbytery rejected Mr. Robert Young as presentee to the church of the parish of Auchterarder, proceeded exclusively on the ground of the veto,"—a new word introduced, I apprehend, into the Scottish law; but a translation of it is given in the same sentence,—“on the ground of the veto, or dissent,”—a most important word,—“or dissent exercised by the alleged majority of heads of families or parishioners of Auchterarder.” Such is the allegation. The answer is, “admitted.” Thus, therefore, it is clear that there is raised before your Lordships the question, Have the majority, or the alleged majority (an allegation not traversed) of the heads of families, of any families, the right to exercise a veto or dissent (I prefer the English translation to the Latin original, a dissent)? and is the presbytery bound by that dissent, unaccompanied with any reasons, and not followed by any inquiry on their part into the validity of the causes of dissent, to reject the patron’s presentee? In other words, Is the patron’s right of presenting subject to the acceptance or refusal, that is, the choice of the congregation? That is the question, and the most important question raised before your Lordships; that is to say, is or is not, by the law of Scotland, the right of patronage in the patron, or is it in the patron conjointly and currently with and shared by the parish as well as the patron? That is the question raised by force of the word “dissent;” for it is a mere refusal of assent; it is a choice negative exercised by one party after a choice affirmative exer-[254]-cised by the other, neither party being bound to assign any reason other than his mere will.

My Lords, I come, therefore, to observe upon what has at different times been the right of the parish or the congregation, even in times when the right of the patron was most feeble and worst ascertained. Let us see what right have they in point of fact, and by practice or usage enjoyed.

Now it is to be observed that before endowments were numerous, when there were very few patrons to present, when all that the church consisted of was a number of congregations, and when the provision for the parson or the priest was feeble as the church itself, when he was paid accidentally, by casual offerings, by various fees from time to time increased by clerical encroachments, but when there was no provision regularly made by formal and substantial endowment, it is clear that the right of patronage could hardly be known; and as the priest must be chosen by somebody, it appears that he was then chosen, not by the congregation who were to be his scholars, not his patrons, but he was chosen by the clergy, by the clerical portion of the church. For your Lordships will find that there was a canon in the year 428 referred to by one of the learned judges, which shows that the election was in the clergy, though with the assent of the congregation. “Plebis” (Van Espen. II. t. 3, c. 9), says the canon, “non est eligere, sed est electioni consentire.” That is, all the function of the people. The clergy chose, the people assented; and this in 493 was extended to bishops; for it is then laid down by another canon, “in electione episcopi populus debet adesse,” just as in the enthronement of the king, which has been [255] originally the actual choice of soldiers of their imperator or emperor in ruder ages, beyond the period of authentic history. Long after that election had been disused, there continued the remnant of it, which we have at coronations up to this hour, by asking the people’s assent as a form. The people may here be said to be adesse, for they are called upon to give their assent, though the coronation, the enthronement, the allegiance, and the prerogative would have been just the same if they refused as if they gave their assent, and would have been just the same if their assent had never been asked.

Then, in a work which is deemed a great authority among the fathers, I mean Cyprian’s letter to the Spanish people, we find it written that no one should “be ordained but in the presence of the people.” Now, why? The reason is given, and it throws light upon the call; for I take the call to be a sort of remnant of this popular presence. The nature of the call is exceedingly ill defined, and its history is admitted on all hands to be very obscure, as far as it ever existed in any thing like a substantive shape, (except at one period, when patronage was avowedly abolished by law;) it is now put down by law, as I shall show in a further part of my argument. But its nature seems to be illustrated by the reason which Cyprian assigns for the presence of the people at ordinations:—“No one should be ordained,” (it is rather an advice or a recommendation than a law, or a construction put upon a law,) “no one should be ordained but in the presence of the people, to the end that the demerits of the bad may be disclosed and the merits of the good proclaimed.” An opportunity was to be given for showing whether the life and conversation were good [256] or bad ; because that tended to inform the conscience of the bishop, who was to ordain the clerk, and that tends, in presbyterian government, to inform the conscience of the presbytery, who are to judge, as I shall presently show, and only to judge of the candidate's qualifications, the life and conversation being one of those clerical qualifications. It was for the purpose of informing the party who was to decide, that he might inquire, and upon inquiry might determine.

Then there is in 493 a rescript of Gelasius, which states that the right of rejection does not exist at all in people ; for it expressly says, " if their objections are groundless," which implies giving a reason, and implies no veto, no dissent ; dissent is a mere refusal. But this must have been grounded upon reasons ; because he says that those reasons are to be submitted to the clergy, and if groundless the clergy are to remove them by admonition, and thereby to compel an assent. Does not that clearly show, that if the reasons, in the opinion of the clergy, were groundless, the clergy were to proceed as if there had been no dissent ; and to deem a dissent founded upon bad reasons, or upon no reasons at all, as of no force at all ?

Then in the year 886 Pope Stephen says, referring distinctly to the same subject, "docendus est populus, non sequendus" (1 Dec. Dist. 63) ; a very pontifical doctrine, no doubt, and one which by most pontiffs was very amply and very accurately practised, together with another principle as religiously acted upon, namely, that the flock were to be fleeced as well as taught ; that, however, belongs to the papal and, God knows, not at all to the presbyterian church.

[257] Now, what says Boehmer, in a book which is of great authority,—authority in foreign countries as well as among the canonists of our own ; I mean his Jus Parochiale ? It is cited by one of the learned judges (Lord Corehouse). He says (Jus Paroch. iii. 1. 18 ; Jus Eccles. prot. iii. sec. 77 and 78), "patrono votum decisivum in electione tribuatur." Now see the difference between the patronus and the populus :—"Populo negativum, ut possint dissentire." But how ? Not as the Auchterarder people have done, and as the presbytery have allowed them to do, merely to dissent without reason, and with nobody to judge of the reason :—" Non tamen aliter quam si justas dissensus causas allegare queant." They must not only dissent and give their reasons ; but their dissent must be grounded upon such just reasons as they "allegare queant," that is, as they are able truly to allege. Then the question is, who is to decide upon the justice of those reasons ? and that question is best answered by coming to the point now in contest between the parties. How has the Scotch law determined that those reasons shall be examined and decided upon ? We are thus led to what is certainly the very pinch of this case, and which, in the view I take of it, makes decisively against the appellants ; for I now come to the statute law of Scotland, upon which the whole controversy must ultimately depend. Let us first go to the original act, regulating the presbyterian scheme, the act 1592, chapter 116. After providing for the exercise of the judicial and administrative functions of the various church judicatories in Scotland, it concludes in these words :—" Ordains all presentations to benefices to be direct to the particular presbyteries in all time coming, [258] with full power to give collation thereupon, and to put order to all matters and causes ecclesiastical within their bounds according to the discipline of the kirk, providing the aforesaid presbyteries be bound and astricted to receive and admit whatsoever qualified minister presented by his Majesty or laick patrons." So that they were bound and astricted by the force of this statute to admit, and if they did not admit they broke the law ; they acted illegally, and were liable to the consequences, civil and other, of disobeying the clear and positive order of a statute to receive and admit whoever was presented by a lay patron, if duly qualified ; they were only to judge of his qualification, and if qualified they were bound and astricted, that is, they were ordered by the law, to admit him. It was at their peril, quoad civilem effectum, and also quoad alios effectus, that they refused to obey the positive mandate of the King and the estates of parliament.

At different times doubts were entertained whether the law ought to be continued, and some fluctuations existed even in the practice under it in one or other of the troublous periods of Scotch church history. Nevertheless it was not till the year 1690 that the legislature itself made any even apparent alteration of the statute, there having been an act passed immediately upon the revolution, the act of 1690, chapter 5, which revives, renews, and confirms the act of 1592, with the one exception of that part of it that I have just read relating to patronages, and states that this matter is hereafter to be taken into consideration; and in performance of that promise, and in compliance, as it were, with that legislative notice, came in the same year the 23d chapter, which it is most material, therefore, that I should now bring under the view of your Lordships. [259] It is entitled "An act concerning patronages," and it undoubtedly introduced, for the first time, a total change in the law of patronage. It abolished the right of patrons, and indeed radically extirpated patronage; it professed to do no less. It did not proceed, as some would have done, by a side wind, professing to do one thing and doing another, but it honestly, openly, and manfully avowed, in a spirit worthy of men the legitimate successors of the covenanters, and who had just brought about the revolution of 1688 in Scotland,—it avowed that nothing less was intended than to root out patronage from the land. This famous statute, therefore, begins by pronouncing the doom of patronage; and it gives the cause of the doom, namely, the crimes of the offenders:—"Our sovereign Lord and Lady, etc., considering that the power of presenting ministers to vacant churches of late exercised by patrons hath been greatly abused, and is inconvenient to be continued in this realm." The sentence has thus gone forth against patrons, and whatever is done after this preamble must be taken to be in execution of this judgment for the offence, namely, the abuse and inconvenience ascribed to the right of patronage; the sentence is neither more nor less than utterly abolishing that right for that cause. Now this is most effectually done; but it is material to consider how it is done, and what is substituted in place of it; because one part of the argument, and the greater part of it, is a falling back from the act of 1711 (the 10th of Anne) upon the act of 1690, in a way and by a process of reasoning which I marvel at,—the more I read the more I wonder at, and upon which I shall presently have to say somewhat to your Lordships. The act proceeds, "that in [260] case of the vacancy of any particular church, and for supplying the same with a minister, the heritors of the said parish, (being protestants,) and the elders of the said parish are to name and propose the person to the whole congregation, to be either approved or disapproved by them." The process therefore is clear; it is not the people, it is not the congregation, who are to call; but it is a very select portion; it may be five people, it may be four people, there may be but one heritor and three elders, and these are constituted a kind of corporate body; for what purpose? for the purpose of presenting to the people.

Then the presentation is hereby taken from the patrons, because they have abused it, and because it was found inconvenient; and it is transferred to this new body, the heritors and elders, who are to present to the congregation. If the congregation disapprove, the disapprovers are to do what? to exercise a veto? to give their dissent, as the second article of the condensation states and the answer to it admits, and as the presbyteries state to be their sole reason for not admitting Mr. Robert Young? No such thing; the "disapprovers" are "to give in their reasons;" just as the canon of 428, just as the canon of 493, just as the rescript of 493, and as Pope Stephen's rescript of 886, and as Boehmer's authority with respect to these old times states to have been the church law even then. Now what is to be done upon the reasons, and why are they to give them? "To the effect the affair may be cognosed upon by the presbytery of the bounds, at whose judgment and by whose determination the calling and entry of a particular minister is to be ordered and concluded."

Now I pray your Lordships to stop here, and to form [261] a clear idea, (for it is most important to the subsequent part of my argument,)—to form a clear idea of what the scheme is of presentment and admission which is laid down by this important statute. Patronage was to be abolished. It had sinned in two ways: first, by its abuse, and secondly, by its inconvenience; therefore it was to be extinguished, and another process of election to be substituted in its room. Then what is this process? The heritor or heritors and elders are to present to the congregation, and the congregation are either to say that they approve, or that they disapprove. If they disapprove, they are to give their reasons; those reasons are to be decided upon, not, certainly, by the heritors and elders, but by the presbytery of the bounds, and by the presbytery of the bounds cognoscing, that is to say, judicially examining, the truth and sufficiency of those reasons. Here, as in all cases of judicial examination, two things may happen: the presbytery may either demur, as it were, and deny the relevancy of the grounds stated by the congregation; they may say, if all these things are true they are no objection to the admission ; or the presbytery may go to issue upon the fact. They may say it is true ; that if the statement of facts be well grounded, it forms a sufficient cause for our rejection ; but the fact is denied or is doubted. Inquire as to the fact. If upon both of those inquiries they find that the congregation is right, then, the reasons being well founded in fact and law, the presbytery are to reject the party presented. If either inquiry proves against the congregation, if either the facts amount, in the judgment of the presbytery, to no disqualification, or if the statement of fact be found untrue, then the presbytery are to reject, not the can-[262]-didate, but the reasons of the congregation, and to admit and induct the presentee. So that here is a completely new form of proceeding instituted for the first time in Scotland ; an abolition of the right of patronage, and a transfer of that right to the heritors and elders, who are to name and propose a person to the whole congregation, who, if they disapprove, shall submit their reasons to the judgment and determination of the presbytery ; and all those parties combining, the operation is completed one way or another : either the presentee of the heritors and Kirk Session is rejected, or their presentee is admitted, and obtains possession of the cure.

My Lords, keeping the provision of the act of 1690 steadily in view, let us see what next took place. If this had continued the law of the land, if this statute had been left unrepealed, no man could have said that Lord Kinnoull, or any other patron, had the right of presentation. It was abolished ; it was avowed to be abolished. The reason of the abolition was given ; a transfer was made, and the party was indicated to whom the transfer, as the substitute of the patron, was effected by the act. But if this is true, another thing is equally true, that nothing like the present arrangement, laid down by the general assembly and followed by the presbytery, would have arisen under that law. This argument is something wholly different : it is no presentment to the congregation by the heritors and Kirk Session ; it is no refusal upon reasons given in by the congregation ; it is no cognoscing and adjudication by the presbytery ; but it is a totally different proceeding, invented for the first time in the year of grace 1834, and which at the revolution of 1690 was no more [263] dreamt of than it was in the reign of James the Sixth, in the year 1592. It is a totally different process, not in the slightest degree resembling the other, so that if we are driven back in the argument from the statute of Anne, to which I am now coming, and are to fall back upon the statute of William and Mary, we are then no doubt driven away from the right of patronage, and the act of Anne is repealed, (though only by our misconstruction of it, and not by the legislature). But we do not fall back upon the present proceeding of the Auchterarder presbytery, or anything like it ; we fall back upon a totally different state of things, namely, patronages transferred from the patron to the heritors and Kirk Session, and reasons to be given for dissent by the congregation, and those reasons to be adjudicated upon after being cognosced by the presbytery ; which is a thing as different from what has been done upon the present occasion as can well be imagined. Therefore let us see now what was done, and why it was done, by the act of Anne in the year 1711 : I must here say, that, with all the respect and reverence which I habitually feel for the authors of the revolution both in England and Scotland, if they had never done anything wiser, or anything more just or more considerate, than they did in passing the act of 1690, chapter 23, I should not have thought them entitled to all the veneration with which we are wont almost instinctively to mention their names. I cannot conceive anything more strikingly different from the conduct of the Somerses, the Godolphins, and the other great men who brought about the revolution in this country, whose conduct in all particulars, civil and ecclesiastical, was marked by the most careful, and delicate, and cautious dealing with all [264] existing constitutional positive rights, all vested interests. I can conceive nothing more widely different from the spirit that presided over all the proceedings of those great men than this act of the Scotch estates in parliament assembled ; for upon a vague and general allegation of abuse and inconvenience, it takes away the rights of the lay patrons ; it gives them no opportunity of defending themselves against the one charge or arguing against the other ; and it then admits, in express terms, that they have a valuable right of property, because it professes to give them a compensation : 600 merks Scots were given, equal to about £33 sterling. And be it observed, that this very hasty, rude, and ill-worded provision gave the same compensation for all advowsons, whatever might be the difference in their value. It was, therefore, a very great encroachment, very hastily and violently made, upon the rights of private property, the existence of which it admitted, while it gave nothing that could be called equivalent in return for what it confiscated. But after twenty-one years of this new scheme, then comes the statute of Anne in 1711, and its reasons are given in the preamble:—"Whereas by the ancient laws and constitutions of that part of Great Britain called Scotland the presenting of ministers to vacant churches did of right belong to the patrons, until by the act of 1690 the presentations were taken from the patrons and given to the heritors and elders of the respective parishes; and in place of the right of presentation the heritors and life-renters of every parish were to pay to the respective patrons a small and inconsiderable sum of money: and whereas by the fifteenth act of the fifth session, and by the thirteenth act of the sixth session, the one [265] entitled 'An act for encouraging of preachers at vacant churches be-Northforth,' and the other entitled 'An act in favour of preachers be-Northforth,' there are several burthens imposed upon vacant stipends, to the prejudice of the patron's right of disposing thereof: and whereas that way of calling ministers has proved inconvenient." Here they adopt a very opposite mode of reasoning ab inconvenienti, which, although no argument in construing a statute or expounding a law, is an admirable reason for making a law, or for repealing one already made, and for altering a practice tried by experience, especially as that practice was only twenty-one years old, "and has not only occasioned great heats and divisions amongst those who by the aforesaid act were entitled and authorized to call ministers, but likewise has been a great hardship upon the patrons whose predecessors had founded and endowed those churches, and who have not received payment or satisfaction for their right of patronage from the heritors or life-renters, nor have granted renunciation of their rights on that account." For these reasons (and stronger can hardly be conceived), first, because an uncompensated violation of private property had been committed,—an interference with a valuable estate without compensation; secondly, because great inconvenience had been occasioned by causing heats and animosities in the exercise of the new right in the new hands, to which it had been transferred from the lawful owners: for these very sufficient reasons the act proceeds immediately to "repeal and make void" the said act of 1690, c. 23, concerning patronage.

That act is therefore, by the statute of Anne, completely repealed and abrogated, and it from thenceforward ceased to exist, just as much as if it had never [266] been enacted at all. Then, in order that there might be no doubt when that act was repealed, or what the law existing before 1690 was, a declaratory clause follows:—"that in all time coming the right of all and every patron or patrons to the presentation of ministers to churches and benefices, and the disposing of the vacant stipends for pious uses within the parish be restored, settled, and confirmed to them, the aforesaid acts or any custom to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding; and that from and after the first day of May 1712 it shall be lawful for her Majesty, her heirs and successors, and for every other person or persons who have right to any patronage, to present a qualified minister or ministers to any church or churches whereof they are patrons which shall at any time after the said first day of May happen to be vacant; and the presbytery of the respective bounds shall and is hereby obliged to receive and admit in the same manner such qualified person or persons, minister or ministers as shall be presented by the respective patrons, as the persons or ministers presented before the making of this act ought to have been admitted."

Now, if the act had stood without this last proviso as to the manner of inducting, no doubt whatever could have existed in any man's mind upon the state of the law which is to regulate this question; for you would then have had the act of 1690 abrogated altogether; you would have had the right of the heritors and elders to present to the people, and the people to dissent upon reason, and the presbytery to cognosce those reasons, and adjudicate thereupon, entirely repealed, as much as if it had never been bestowed upon the parties. It only existed for twenty-one years, and this act would have [267] repealed it at the end of the twenty-one years. You would then have had a declaration, or a statutory enactment, in 1711, that all patrons had a right to present, and that all qualified persons by them so presented, that is to say, all persons who had the due qualification, without any other condition whatever, should at once be invested with the living. That would have been the clear, undeniable, unquestionable law of the land, had not these words which I have last read been adjoined in the form of a proviso or a regulation. This argument, then, will turn upon the force and effect of those words; and therefore two points are raised upon this act, and upon those two I am now about to give my opinion, with the reasons of that opinion. The first question is, what was meant by "qualified person?" and the other question is, how far this repeal of the former act and the revival of patronage is qualified or restricted, or in any manner of way modified, by the reference therein made to the manner of inducting persons observed before the making of the act. These are the two points material to be considered, which are raised upon the construction of this statute; and I address myself to them in their order.

First, with respect to qualification. I am somewhat surprised to find, in the very able and learned arguments from the bench below, an attempt to show that "qualification" is of such extensive meaning, that within its scope may be brought the whole of the matter at present in dispute, namely, the acceptableness and reception of the party presented by the congregation, as finding favour in their sight. Much ingenuity is displayed by several of those learned judges, for some of whom I have the greatest respect, whose subtlety I know to be unbounded, and the fertility of whose imagination in dealing with questions I know to have no limits. That subtlety, and ingenuity, and fancy I think are shown in endeavouring to give this widely comprehensive sense to the term "qualification." It was said Dr. Parr might have been a very able divine in England, and a most learned man in the church, and yet very unfit to teach the parish of Auchterarder. Such eminent men will do in one place,—in Glasgow or Edinburgh; but they will be thrown away entirely when they are sent to waste their gifts in the desert air of some Scotch mountainous or insular parish. It is justly said, indeed, that a man is not fit to teach them who does not speak their language. But such a man cannot be called a qualified person. Language is one essential part of qualification; it belongs to literature, though it is the simple portion of letters. If a man knew Greek and Hebrew, and did not know the mother tongue he was to preach in, I should say he was minus sufficiens in literatura, and so not a qualified person. But we have here no question of literary qualification; the question alleged to come under the larger sense of the word is that of acceptable or not acceptable to the flock; and to bring this within the meaning of "qualified" is the attempt of these expounders of the act. A man, say they, may be of such rude and stern manners, he may be so disagreeable in his habits of life, or he may be so much above his flock in his manners, and so entirely disqualified for associating with them, that they will receive no edification from his ministration. My Lords, if it amount to anything affecting his morals, his life, and conversation, that comes, no doubt, within the meaning of "qualified;" but if it is merely that they do not like him as well as they might, that they prefer another to him, that they [269] do not fancy him so much as it is to be wished they did, the law has affixed to the word "qualified" no such meaning as that. It is quite clear that it is a violent strain upon the law to impute to it such a meaning.

But I do not rest my position upon argument alone; I am going to show your Lordships that no such meaning can possibly be the law of Scotland be given to the word "qualified." It is a technical word in this question; it is not the word "qualified" used in its general sense, as you talk of a man's qualities, of his capacity, of his abilities, of his merits, which are all general phrases, and none of them technical and defined. The word "qualified" is as much a known word of the law, and has as much a technical sense imposed upon it by the statutes, by the law authorities, by the opinions of commentators, by the dicta of judges, as the word "qualification" has when used to express the right to kill game, or when used to express a right to vote in the election of a member of parliament. It is perfectly technical, and it is an understood technical expression.

I now go to the most venerable of all authorities in the law of Scotland because the most ancient, the Regiam Majestatem; and I am the more induced to resort thereto, that it is brought from a period when the right of patronage was weaker than it has been since, when the rights of advowsons were not understood as thoroughly as they have subsequently been, and before the legislature had ever exercised its discretion upon the subject, or made any enactment touching those rights. I the more go to the Regiam Majestatem for this further reason, that it is of high authority in the English law. At one time it was doubted among legal [270] antiquaries whether it was a Scotch or an English book, and it was said, with the usual national feeling of our Scotch fellow subjects, that it was a Scotch work originally, and had been transferred and adopted by an English lawyer; but I believe all men now admit that it was originally an English book,—that the original work is our Bracton, whose book was adopted in Scotland. This circumstance shows that the law of the two countries was nearly if not precisely the same in those remote ages, how widely soever they may differ now.

The Regiam Majestatem, buke 1, c. 2, s. 3, has these important words:—"Ane laick patron sould be ware that quhen ane kirk or vicarage sall happen to vaik," (that is, to be vacant,) "that he present thereto ane worthie man qualified." How? by being acceptable to the people from his eloquence, or from his manner of demeaning himself in society? No such thing,—“qualified in literature, life, and manners” (that is, morals), “within foure months after that he knows the kirk to be vacant, that be the longer delay of the presentation he prejudice nocht himselfe.” The law is assumed as clear, and the only object of this passage is to prescribe the time beyond which the patron’s right may lapse. To prevent this it says, let him take care to present within four months. Now what does he do? He is to present a qualified person. How is he to be qualified? In literature, life, and manners. All the qualification, then, imposed upon him which there is the necessity of looking to is this, that the party presented has sufficient literature, a pure life, and godly manners.

The same is the doctrine laid down in all the most venerable commentators; and I do not now quote Bankton, for two reasons; first, because he is much [271] more modern; and secondly, because a most learned judge, for whom I have the most constant and inviolable respect, even when I most differ from him, I mean Lord Moncreiff, throws a doubt upon the authority of Bankton, as if his opinion were of no great weight generally, which I own surprised me. It was new to me; I always understood that his authority had risen of late years very much in our courts; such was the language at the bar during the time of Lord Eldon, during the time of my noble and learned friend who succeeded him, and during my own time. But, however, Lord Moncreiff is a very high authority; and what he has said will lead me, as often as Bankton is quoted, to reconsider this matter. But his Lordship also says he is peculiarly of less authority upon a question of this nature, because it is well known that he had taken a strong part upon the church patronage question. Therefore I do not quote Bankton at all. But Balfour (Balfour’s Practicks, p. 501; “Anent advocatioun and patronage of kirkes”) I cite; and in his Practicks he lays it down thus: “Ane laique patron of ony kirk or benefice vaikand sould present thairto ane qualifyit and habil persoune of sufficient literature, honest in life, of gude maneris.” That exactly corresponds with the words in the Regiam Majestatem, which says, “qualified in literature, life, and manners.”

Therefore I take it to be clearly established by these authorities, and I know of nothing which does not confirm it, in any of the dicta of judges, or the decision either of the ecclesiastical or the municipal courts, that “qualification” is a technical word, meaning suffi-[272]-ciency in literature and honest life, as Balfour has it, and of good manners, meaning thereby good morals; and no one is more ready to admit at once than I am, that upon cognoscing this matter, as the statute of 1690 expresses it, if objection to the literature, to the life, to the morals, be made, the presbytery, the Kirk Court, with an appeal to the synod and an ultimate appeal to the assembly, are the judges of his qualifications in those respects. But I also venture to assert it as a thing equally clear, that his being acceptable or not upon other grounds not even stated by the parish,—their saying they do not like him, they have an aversion to him, they prefer any other to him, he is the man in all the world they do not wish to have among them,—may be stating a thing very much to be lamented, may be a thing very fit to be submitted for the consideration of the patron, may prove it to be exceedingly unfortunate that a man the object of such prejudice, however groundless, should be forced upon the people as their pastor; but is nothing like a defect in the person’s qualifications, and is nothing of which the law will take any kind of cognizance. I would, however, add in passing, that I cannot admit at all even the strongest prejudice universally entertained against a presentee to be decisive that the patron was wrong and the people right. I cannot assume that because he is even unanimously rejected by the people at the time of his presentation, he might not afterwards turn out a very fit pastor for them; because we know of instances in which if that had been held a sufficient objection, some of the greatest ornaments of the church of Scotland never would have filled the pulpit for one single hour after their nomination; and if I mention the truly venerable [273] name of Dr. Reid, one of the most eminent philosophers that any country in any age ever produced, I at once recall to the recollection of such of your Lordships as are connected with Scotland, a remarkable instance of what I am now stating. He never would have been minister of the parish of New Machar in the county of Aberdeen, if the strongest and unanimous objection of the people had been reckoned decisive. He was settled there by main force,—I believe by the military, and against the strongly-expressed united will of the people; and yet he became, before many months had passed by, one of the best beloved ministers that ever officiated at the altars of his country. But be that as it may, and suppose we admit it to be undeniable that a harmonious settlement should always take place, this is a totally different consideration from the question of right. The law is not so; the word “qualified” does not mean that,—it does not comprise the qualification of popular favour. The word “qualified” means something else; it means a qualification in literature, life, and morals, to be judged of by the presbytery; and no one talks of interfering with that right of so judging by them.

Now we will just refer for a moment to some stress that has been put by the learned judges, as well as by others, upon the word “qualification,” from a desire to extend its scope over other things as well as learning and life. The two books of discipline are well known to your Lordships,—Knox’s book, first in 1560, and the second book in 1578. Now these authorities, as they have been strangely called, undoubtedly assert an election by the people in so many words; they do not merely touch a right of rejection; they do not confine themselves to veto; they do not mention assent or dissent [274]—sent with or without reason; but they go a great deal further. What does Knox say in his book? Election is here asserted in plain terms:—“It pertaineth to the people to every such congregation to elect their minister.” That is not contended for now; that is claiming for the people a right not merely to reject or to accept, but to choose originally,—to present as patrons to the presbytery. That is the doctrine of this book, but that never was received for law in Scotland; and the first book of discipline is of no legal authority at all. The second book of discipline in like manner says: “The liberty of election of persons called to ecclesiastical functions, and observed without interruption so long as the kirk was not corrupted by antichrist, we desire to be restored, so that men be not intruded upon any congregation, either by the prince or any other inferior person, without lawful election and the assent of the people over whom the parson is placed, as the practice of the apostolic and primitive kirk and good order craves.” Now, if I were called to a conflict with the book of discipline upon any point of church discipline, or upon any article of theology, I should, no doubt, feel great anxiety and much distrust of my own opinion; but I do not feel the same anxiety and the same distrust if I conflict with it upon a matter of historical fact,—if I go to issue with it upon a gross violation of historical truth, which I think I am justified in asserting after what I have already read to your Lordships from the history of the church and from the statutory records themselves. Can any man breathing say that an election by the people of their pastor was the practice in all times until antichrist corrupted the church,—until the [275] time when antichrist entered to despoil the vineyard of the Lord, as this book states? No date is given, no period assigned for this trespass, this breaking and entering the vineyard, so that the statement is much less easily refuted by the generality: Dolus versatur in generalibus. Hence I know not that it is an honest statement of facts; it is probably more zealous than honest, but at all events it is more zealous than true. But can any man point out the time when it ever was the practice to have a free election of the pastor? because this is not merely an assent about which something might be said; it is not a call, whatever that may mean; but it is an assertion that the people had at all times the right of choosing their own minister (and it says nothing whatever of the patron, any more than if there had never been such a thing as a patron in existence) until antichrist entered the vineyard. Now, I aver that this is not true; it is not correct in point of fact; it is the very reverse of the known admitted fact.

I will next advert to the act of 1567 (cap. 7), which throws some light upon the subject. Considerably before the time when the second book of discipline denies that patronage ever existed,—before popery came in, the presentation of lay patrons is expressly reserved to the just and ancient patrons in so many words. Now it must be admitted that this enactment was after the first book of discipline in 1560. But the book of discipline in 1578, twelve years after the act of parliament which I am about to read, mis-states the fact in the face of that act of parliament, as grossly as a fact was ever mis-[276]—represented for any purpose. The act of 1567 says, “the presentation of laic patronages always reserved to the just and auncient patrones.” But the book of discipline in 1578 says that in point of fact the just and ancient patrons had no existence, for that until antichrist took the field it was the people who elected, and not the just and ancient patrons at all. The act proceeds to say:—“And that the patron present ane qualified person, within six months (after it may come to his knowledge of the decease of him who bruiked the benefice of before,) to the superintendent of thay parts where the benefice lies, or others having commission of the kirk to that effect, otherwise the kirk to have power to dispoise the same to ane qualified person for that time; providing that in case the patron present ane person qualified to his understanding, and failing of ane, ane other within the said six months, and the said superintendent or commissioner of the kirk refuses to receive and admit the person presented by the patron as said is, it shall be lesum to the patron to appeal to the superintendent and ministers of that province where the benefice lies, and desire the person presented to be admitted; which if they refuse, to appeal to the general assembly of this haill realm, by whom the cause being decided shall take end as they decern and declare.”

Now it is inferred from this that the matter becomes a question of exclusive ecclesiastical cognizance, and that the decision of the general assembly, the highest church court, is to be final and conclusive upon it by force of the words “take end as they decern.” To be sure the matter is to take end as they decern; but upon what are they to decern, and what is to take end? [277] The question of qualified or not qualified; if the presbytery and assembly refuse to admit a qualified person, not denying his qualification; if there is a competition of two qualified persons; if A., claiming the right of advowson, presents one, and B., claiming also the right of advowson, presents another, and the church courts take the wrong one, nobody can contend that this is a question for the final adjudication of the general assembly, it is for the final adjudication of the civil courts of the realm, according to the uniform and uninterrupted current of all the decisions; for I may observe in passing, that though those decisions are not fruitful of instruction for the present question, though no one of them is to be found which disposes of the arguments, though in no one case to which they relate has the present question ever been raised, yet they are very fruitful with reference to other questions, and are very important as showing the bounds of the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdictions of Scotland. They are numerous and they are clear touching the decision of questions as to who has the right of advowson where there is a competition of presenters; and in that case it is not the church court that decides the right, any more than it is the convocation in England that decides the right; it is the civil or municipal court, not the court christian,—the temporal court here, the court of the King by quare impedit or quare non admisit, or an assize of darrein presentment; not the spiritual court of the Bishop. The statute of 1567 undoubtedly gives an exclusive jurisdiction upon the question of qualification to the presbytery coming in place of the superintendent or bishop, or assembly's commissioner; and it may go by appeal from the presbytery or the [278] superintendent to the general assembly of the whole kirk, whose jurisdiction is exclusive upon the point. That their sentence has this virtue and force on such questions no doubt whatever exists; for I have explicitly stated that no one denies the cognizance of the courts ecclesiastical upon qualification.

Having disposed, therefore, of the first of the two points which arise upon the statute of Anne, the foundation of the whole question before us, and having shown that the term “qualified” used in that statute does not mean general acceptableness to the congregation (which would be vesting the choice in the congregation, and not in the patron), contrary to the express words of the act, I now come to the second point raised, and by which it is attempted to show that the statute leaves the mode of presentment and induction precisely where it stood before, that is to say, in the interval between the year 1690 and the year 1711. If the argument does not confine itself to those twenty-one years it is nought, it proves absolutely nothing; for if it goes back to the period before 1690 it goes to the state of things under the act in 1592, which says that the presbytery are bound and astricted to receive whatever qualified person the patron shall present. Then those of the learned judges who so construe the statute of Anne hold its meaning to be this: that, desiring to repeal the act of 1690 altogether, because it had been found unjust and inconvenient, and intending to set up in its stead the old established patrimonial rights of the lay patrons, the legislature in its wisdom left things precisely as they were, while the act repealed was in existence; for that is the argument. I confess my astonishment at it; I confess my utter inability to [279] comprehend what it can mean, or how to their acute minds it ever could have occurred.

What, I ask, does the statute of Anne effect, according to this argument? It reasons in the preamble against the act of 1690, and it leaves the act in force. It professes to repeal the act of 1690, and the whole tenor of the contents of that statute of Anne does repeal that act; and not satisfied with repealing the act of 1690, it sets up patronage by express declaratory words; and yet by a clause at the end it abrogates its own repeal, and sets up the act which it professes to abrogate: that is the argument. It says there shall be no longer any rights enjoyed such as are given by the act of 1690, and then it sets up those rights in full force. It says that the patron's rights shall be restored, and then it destroys that altogether. It says, revive patronage; and the better to revive patronage, it utterly extinguishes it. It says, we are not satisfied with abrogating the rights of the heritors and kirk session and with restoring the right of the patron, but we tell you in affirmative words as well that he has the full right,—that he has not lost that right by the statute we have repealed; and then, to the astonishment of the reader, and of the patron, I should apprehend, who finds himself so dealt with,—to the astonishment of all, it proceeds to tell the patron, you were just where you were before we began our work; for with one hand we set up your right, and with another we pull it down; with the right hand we made the show of giving you back your right, and with the left we take it away for ever. Now, that is the argument upon which this extraordinary construction of the act of 1711 is based. That your Lordships may see that I am not giving an [280] incorrect description of it, I remind you of these words: "Whereas the presenting of ministers did of right belong to the patrons: and whereas the act of 1690 took it from them and gave it to the heritors and elders: and whereas this act has proved inconvenient: and whereas it is necessary that it should be repealed; it is hereby repealed, and the right of all and every patron is restored, settled, and confirmed; provided nevertheless, that such qualified persons as shall be presented shall be admitted, as the persons or ministers presented before the making of this act ought to have been admitted."

No doubt this proviso has some meaning; every word in every statute must have a meaning given to it; and who can doubt what the meaning is here? All the ordinary forms and modes of proceeding shall be followed, which are understood to be a presentment by the patron to the presbytery moderating in the call of the presentee; the presbytery receiving objections, and considering them as to qualifications, and admitting, modo solito, the person so by them found qualified, who has by the patron been so presented.

That is what the concluding proviso means. Whether it was necessary or not is another question; for though a legislature is never supposed to use words without a meaning, it is always allowed the privilege of using words not absolutely necessary. But to say that it means that the candidate shall be inducted exactly as if this act of 1690 never had been repealed, is to attribute to the legislature not only great infirmity of purpose, but the grossest blundering that can possibly be imagined; for it would leave the law precisely where it stood before the repeal of the act, the abrogation of [281] which is the sole object of the legislature; it would leave in the last section, by way of proviso, that which is repealed in the first section by way of positive enactment. Moreover, to prove that this construction set up for the appellant is wrong, let me observe that unless it has the very effect which I ascribe to it, nothing whatever is gained by it for the argument it is used to aid. The force and effect of those words at the end, "in the same manner," etc., is to revive the former practice under the act of 1690, and undo all the former had done. They had no force or effect at all; they do not help the argument at all; those words either revive or enlarge the act of 1690, or they do not. Therefore I say in the next place, which is decisive of the first question.

suppose you make the appellants a present of their argument; suppose you say that this is the force and effect of these final words; suppose you say that the proviso does not revive the act of 1690, which the enactment had first repealed; suppose you say that it brings back things to the state in which they were during the twenty-one years which elapsed from the year 1690, just see how little way you get in your present contention. This is the reason why I have been entreating your Lordships to attend minutely to what that act of 1690 really did; for, as it was a repealed act, it was not worth commenting upon, or worth noticing at all for its own sake; but it was because the consideration of its substance clenches the argument against the construction put upon the statute of 1711 that I began my argument by fixing that in your Lordships' minds. The argument is, that the last words of the act of 1711 revived the state of things in respect of presentment and induction, and placed the presentment and induction upon precisely the footing upon which [282] they were immediately before the passing of the act, and ever must be so.

Now what is meant by "before the making of this act?" It cannot, according to this argument, be before the year 1690, because every body admits that then the old rights of patronage were in force, and that the former statute expressly orders the presbytery to admit every qualified person presented by the patron. Then the argument I am grappling with must needs refer to the state of things during the twenty-one years that elapsed between 1690 and 1711; it must mean this or nothing; it must mean to set up the presentment of the patron to the presbytery, the sustentation by the presbytery of that presentment, the dissent of the congregation without reasons against the presentee signified to the presbytery, holding themselves bound by that dissent, and therefore, and for no other reason, rejecting the patron's presentee. That is the argument. But is that the state of things during the last twenty-one years by the act of 1690? It is as utterly different as any one thing can be different from any other, for the act of 1690 does not prescribe any presentment by the patron to the presbytery; it prescribes a presentment by the heritors and kirk session to the congregation. The act of 1690 does not prescribe a dissent or an assent by the congregation without reasons; it prescribes a statement by the congregation of reasons for or against the presentee. The act of 1690 does not prescribe an absolute binding of the presbytery by the assent or dissent of the people; it prescribes a cognoscing by the presbytery, and an adjudicating by the presbytery upon cognoscing, that is to say, upon examining, those reasons. Consequently two things more completely different than the state of matters as [283] it existed between 1690 and 1711 and that which is now contended for by the presbytery against Mr. Young as the relative position of the parties under the proviso cannot possibly be imagined. My Lords, I hold this to be quite conclusive, I hold this to be demonstrative, that there is no foundation whatever for the construction sought to be put upon the act of 1711. It is equally clear that this argument might be admitted, without benefit to the appellants or damage to the respondents, to its full force. I think it is very absurd, I think it is grossly indecorous towards the legislature, I think it is mocking the legislature to suppose that they did so great an absurdity as to say that they meant to repeal an act, and yet to keep that act in force. But still I will admit, for argument sake, that the construction is both decorous and well grounded, that the act of 1711 left the matter of presentment and induction precisely upon the footing upon which it stood immediately before 1711. The appellants cannot require a larger concession than this. Then what follows? Not the advancement of their argument by one hair's breadth; for what men did before 1711 and after 1690 is not what the appellants have done, is not what they pretend to do, is not what they contend for the right of doing. Therefore it appears to me perfectly evident that this construction of the act of Anne is wholly groundless; that the act of Queen Anne repealed the act of 1690, restored the right of patronage, and left that right of patronage precisely as it stood before the act of 1690; but that if this construction were ever so well grounded, it is wholly beside the present question.

But it is said to be a very strained and fanciful construction to import into the act of Queen Anne those words, "as matters stood before 1690." My Lords, [284] I am not importing those words or any others; but the meaning of the statute of Anne, so plain that he who runs may read, is to abrogate the act of 1690, and therefore to leave things as they stood before 1690. The act of Anne says, "let the statute of 1690 be entirely out of the field; let it be abolished altogether." Then it equally says (for this is implied), "let matters be as they were before that repealed act passed." When you repeal an act in one year which was passed twenty-one years before, of necessity and by the abrogation you restore things to the state in which they were twenty-one years before. If there comes at the end of an act of parliament a clause about which some doubt is sought to be raised, are not you to adopt one or other construction of that clause, according as it makes out or does not make out,—according as it helps or frustrates, the plain and obvious meaning of the whole statute itself? That is an ordinary and simple principle of construction, not only of all acts of parliament, but of all instruments, all wills, all deeds, and all writings whatever; far from being fanciful, it is the plain rule of common sense; far from being strained, it is the only natural course.

These, therefore, are the grounds upon which I have come to the conclusion that the judgment must be affirmed. I wish I could have stated them more shortly. If I had had time to digest my judgment, and, as I usually do, reduce it into writing, I should have spared your time; but it was a choice of evils; because I must either give my judgment at greater length and with less compression than I could have wished, or I must delay giving it; a thing on all accounts to be avoided if possible.

Now, my Lords, although these views satisfy my own [285] mind, yet, in consideration of the importance of the question, and by way of confirming the view I have taken of the construction of the statute, I think it may be advantageous that we should just look at the subject in different lights, that we see it from various points of view, for the purpose of observing whether this consideration of it in those various lights and seen from different quarters may not aid the decision to which by other means we have arrived. First, it is admitted on all hands that neither the general assembly nor any consistorial court has any vocation to adjudicate on merely civil rights; that is granted on all hands. It is allowed by every reasoner on these subjects that if a question arises, whether a party has the patronage of a certain pariah or church, this is for the courts civil, and not for the courts spiritual. It is admitted fully, without any hesitation whatever, that the ecclesiastical courts are confined to spiritual matters, and that the temporal courts have exclusive jurisdiction over civil matters. Consequently it is certain that if this were a proceeding, or if the grounds whereupon it is sought to be rested were arguments, that affected the rights of the patron, the claim of the presbytery could not be sustained; nor could the general assembly, which passed the act of 1834, deal with those civil rights. Now, let us see whether they have dealt with those rights; let us see whether that is not the effect of the act of 1834 passed by the general assembly, acted upon by the presbytery, maintained in argument as the title of the appellants; for though I have not mentioned that act of assembly, yet I have argued all along with reference to it in considering the argument of the presbytery; and if I have defeated that argument I have defeated the right of the [286] general assembly, subject to an observation as to the question of jurisdiction hereafter to be made. Now it being admitted that the assembly has no jurisdiction to judge of civil rights, I apprehend that we shall have the same admission, that if the church court has no power as a judicature to interfere with the civil rights of patrons in any one case, still less can it have any power as a legislature by one sweeping provision to abrogate all those rights in all cases. But let us see whether the assembly does not interfere directly, and almost avowedly, with the rights of patrons by the act of 1834.

What they say is this: the patron has a right to present; we sustain that right; but the people have a right to dissent, and to reject the presentee. Now, what is the people's dissent? It is saying, without a reason assigned, that they do not like this man; it is saying that they prefer another; it is saying that they prefer any other; it is saying that they will not have him. What does that mean? Under what general expression would you convey the different meanings which all these particular and detailed forms of expression comprehend? I should think choice, election. Refusal to choose—refusal to elect is at least one half of choice and one half of election; because election consists in selection and in choice affirmatively; it consists negatively in rejection of all others, in refusing to choose all others but its elect. If I select A. I reject B., C., D., etc.; if I reject A. I exercise a negative power of choice; I exercise the right of choosing some other person than A., or of saying to the patron, Z., he shall not choose A.: that is quite certain. I may cover it over by whatever circumlocution I please; I may say [287] that he is not acceptable to me. A person being acceptable to me is the reason why I choose him; a person not being acceptable to me is the reason why I reject him. But because I say he is not acceptable I do not deny that I exercise choice; I exercise the negative choice of saying either, I prefer another to him, and that is one reason; or, I prefer every other to him, and that is another reason. Does not this interfere with a man's right of choice? It is taking half of it away from him; it is saying, you, the patron, have the right of choice, but upon one condition, namely, that you choose the person that I, the congregation, wish; it is saying, I admit I have no right whatever of choice, the whole choice is vested in you, the patron, but upon this one condition, that you choose the person that I would have chosen if I had been to begin: that is the meaning of it. You shall choose whomever you please: that is the meaning of choice. Whoever you please to choose is the man: that is the meaning of choosing. Well, say the congregation—the presbytery—the general assembly, whoever you choose shall be the man, upon this only trifling condition, that you must choose no other person except the man we choose. Who is the chooser there? I think the second person is the chooser rather than the first. If I were to choose, if I may so speak, between the position of the patron and the position of the congregation, I would much rather be the congregation than the patron as regards the choice of A. or the choice of B., because the patron may choose A., B., C., and go on to the end of time, and the congregation will always reject him, till he happens to hit upon X., the particular person they choose.

Now, this illustrates the nonsense of saying that the [288] kirk courts seek not to interfere with the rights of the patron. My Lords, I cannot help casting my eye back to the former times of the Scottish church, and endeavouring to figure to myself the contempt, the scorn, the indignation with which such a man as my most venerable relative who once led that general assembly, one of the greatest men that Scotland ever produced, one of the greatest historians, one of the greatest statesmen, one of the most accomplished orators, which any age of this or any other country has ever seen,—what would Dr. Robertson have said to such pretences so couched and so covered, when he led for so many years the general assembly, when he took that well known part on the question of patronage which was supposed to have settled it for ever; that very part which the presbytery and the general assembly of our day have not taken, and in the face of which they have done all these things. It is not difficult to conceive what reception his manly practical understanding would have given to the doctrine of 1834: "We do not interfere with the right of patrons; they may choose whom they please; but we tell both parties, both patrons and people, that if any body is chosen by the former whom the latter dislikes the choice shall go for nothing." His manly and practical understanding, aye, and the honest nature of his venerable colleague Dr. Erskine, who differed from him toto coelo upon the question of church patronage, (though their difference never threw any shade across the intercourse of the two friends in private life,) how would his honest mind have received the subterfuge upon which the distinction of the present change is sought to be raised—the paltry subterfuge, that the rights of the patron are preserved, but the veto of the [289] parish let in? Aye, or another light of the church, a man of as honest a nature, as sound and sagacious an understanding, as ever flourished in any sphere, a great leader of the general assembly, though not of Dr. Robertson's party, I mean my venerable friend the late Sir Harry Moncrieff; what would he have said? I doubt whether any man could have dared to use such arguments as have been invented at the present time if he had been living. I doubt whether such subtleties would ever have been vented in his presence; but I know, if they had, how swiftly they would have been blown away out of the general assembly, and out of whatever kirk court, be it presbytery, or synod, or consistory, or council, that had ever suffered them to flutter about within the dark aisles of its sanctuaries for the fraction of a second of time; for if there was ever a man who despised such subtleties and sophistries it was that man; if ever there was a man who knew and practised the true rule of honest morals as well as sound judgment and good policy, it was that man,—I mean the rule of never trying to do indirectly what you dare not do openly and manfully and avowedly, and never to seek to escape from or to shelter yourself from the natural and just consequences of your own proceedings by mysterious generalities, and vague phrases, and shadowy distinctions, which, as they never for a moment do deceive yourself who practise them, never can much longer deceive any one else.

Then, my Lords, it is said (to make it still more absurd) that the congregation have a right to say, we do not choose this man; we prefer any other to him; we like him less than any other man that can be mentioned, and therefore we will not have him: and this [290] decision of the congregation is to bind the presbytery. But observe all the while, the congregation themselves are not bound by it; for, a few moments after they have said that they prefer any other man to A., you present B. to them, who is another man than A., and they may refuse him as they did A. You may present twenty people after A., but they are not bound to take any one of them. That is exactly the state of the argument. The patron says, I choose A.; he has a right to say so; the presbytery sustains his right; the general assembly sustains his right; he is not called upon to say why he prefers A., if he chooses A. and A. is a qualified person; the choice is in him to select a qualified person. Oh! but, say they, the people shall be called in; and the people say, we do not choose A., and without giving any reason. Now, I say no two things are so impossible to exist together in the same world as the absolute right to choose, on the part of one person, without a reason, and the absolute right to refuse, on the part of another person, without a reason, unless you mean to say that they have a joint choice, and that has been said for the first time in the history of the Scottish church, and in the history of the Scottish courts and the history of Scottish jurisprudence, ecclesiastical and civil, by the act of the assembly of 1834, and by the presbytery acting upon that act of the assembly in this instance.

But then it is said that they would not exercise this veto, as it is called (or right of dissent, as it is translated by way of making it more fatal to the argument which rests upon it,) capriciously; they would do it conscientiously, and they would not refuse a man without reasons. My Lords, I do not much understand, and do not at all ap-[291]-prove of a confidence sought to be reposed in persons whom you vest with the power of acting without a reason, and do not call to give any reason at all, and yet are to confide in their always acting correctly, always exercising it conscientiously; the patron is also to exercise his choice conscientiously; the law does not assume, it does not protect him in the capricious or wanton exercise of what is a kind of public trust. It is a right of private property, but it is to a certain degree a trust for the benefit of the church; and I am sure that if a patron either in England or Scotland were to present a party to the bishop here, or to the presbytery there, whatever his motive might be, if it were a bad one, he would be slow to avow it. He would not say, I presented this man because he is a pot companion, or because he is the nephew or the brother of a mistress or a complying husband. These are all bad motives; he would not avow them if he acted on them; they might influence him, but he would not say so. Now, will the people avow that they refuse a man because he is too strict in his doctrine, which makes him the better pastor; because he is a man of a high moral sense of duty, and will not overlook scandalous crimes in his parishioners; because he is one who will preach the word faithfully and be instant for righteousness in season, and out of season, as his duty to his master prescribes, and as his master and his apostles have enjoined? No congregation will say, because that is a man likely to preach against notorious enormities practised by us the parishioners, and refuse us access to the sacraments of the church if we are of impure life, because he catechises us and insists upon our attention to our spiritual concerns in the performance of his ministry, we do not like [292] him. No congregation will openly avow such motives, but they may be motives which influence them all the while; and the act of the general assembly allows the fullest scope to such motives, because it does not require any reason whatever to be given, and the reason, if it were given, is not required to be cognosed and judged upon by the presbytery; consequently they place things upon a very different footing from the act of 1690. The act of 1690 had some sense, it had some consistency, it made some provision for the right government and right filling of the church; for it said, if any man has any reason to propound against the presentee let him state that reason to the presbytery, and let the presbytery judge of the sufficiency thereof, or of the truth of the facts upon which it is grounded. But not so the act of 1834; it says, whoever is presented shall undergo the ordeal, not of examination by the presbytery, but of gossip among the people; and if the people choose to say they will not have him, though the reasons as the bottom of their refusal may be the very things in all the world which make him the fittest minister for the parish, he shall be rejected simply and finally, and rejected only because the people say, we will not have him. That is the act of 1834, and therein lies its material difference even from the repealed act of 1690, which our ancestors one hundred and twenty years ago thought so urgent, so inconvenient, and so mischievous, that they utterly and absolutely repealed it.

Dolus versatur in generalibus is a maxim of the civil law adopted by all our courts, frequently referred to by the judges, no where more frequently than in the Scotch courts, and one which I have oftentimes heard cited both in the general assembly and in the civil courts. [293] When a quare impedit was once brought in England, where the right of the patron is precisely the same as in Scotland, for he must present a qualified person, and the bishop is to judge of his qualification for the sacred office, that is to say, his literature, his life, and conversation, and his orthodoxy, which comes within literature; nay, according to the calvinistic creed, may come both within literature and life in Scotland,—I am alluding to Specot's case (5 Rep. 57, b, 58, a) in 5 Coke's Reports, a leading authority here as to the limits of the bishop's power. When Specot was presented by the patron and refused by the ordinary, it was held not to be sufficient for the bishop to return generally that he was non idoneus; but if he had answered minus sufficiens in literatura, that, it was held, would be sufficient; and as the court have no organs to say whether he is or not, the bishop shall decide it, because literature is matter of clerical qualification and clerical competence. It is remarkable that the judges assign for a reason why the general return non idoneus wanted validity, "quod dolosus versatur in universalibus." If they will not allow the bishop or the presbytery merely to say non idoneus, without specifying in what, much less will they allow it to be said, "We will not have you;" they must say why; and then the judges add, "for if it were otherwise the patron's rights might be prejudiced." So that holding the patron's rights might be prejudiced by a general answer, they require a specification.

This I throw out in answer to what may seem an objection, though it was not much relied upon at the bar, to the course of my present argument. It may be said, if the presbytery had only said "We refuse him," without saying why, nobody could have touched their [294] decision. In the first place, my Lords, I do not deny that if such had been the return of the presbytery, just as the bishop's return was to the quare impedit in Specot's case, it would have made our proceeding a good deal more difficult. The case of the respondent would then have rested upon different ground; it would not have been the same case, and would not have been tangible by the same arguments by which this case is touched. But I say, in the next place, that a general refusal without assigning any reason would not be legal and valid on the part of the presbytery, any more than the bishop's refusal was valid who in Specot's case merely said "non idoneus." He must point out some non idoneitas, of the relevancy of which we, and not he, are entitled to judge; some qualification or want of qualification of which he has exclusive cognizance. But I am not called upon to dispose of that point, because it is not before us. The presbytery have not sheltered themselves under a general refusal; they have come so far to particulars that they have said, we refuse him though a regularly presented person—though a perfectly qualified person; and we reject him because the majority of heads of families in the parish dissent without giving any reason, and we are bound by their dissent. That is their return, and that is a totally different case from the one now put. I understand the act of the general assembly to specify a majority of male heads of families; is it not so, Mr. Attorney?

Mr. Attorney General.—Yes, my Lord, these are the terms.

Lord Brougham.—I think the Lord President refers to that in his plain, distinct, and highly judicial view of the case. "The male heads of families;"—what is the meaning of that? The men are to decide, it [295] seems. Shall nothing be said of women in the matter of salvation and in the administration of the church to which they belong? We are living under the christian and not under the mahomedan law. But it is "the male heads of families." Now, suppose there are three or four single women—pious women—in communion with the church, and three or four widows, these may even constitute a majority of the whole communicants; are they to have no interference,—never to be consulted at all? Oh! no; the general assembly says they must take whatever the males of the parish choose to impose upon them for their edification. But “heads of families.” Why not lodgers? Why not a respectable and well-informed journeyman? Why not a respectable scholar, more learned than all the parish together? Is he to have no voice quoad sacra, though perhaps a communicant more regular at the altar than any one? No; “the male heads of families,” says the general assembly,—“heads of families.” Now all this exclusion of females and of lodgers may be right or it may be wrong, but it is not self-evident why; it is not of necessity right, it does not follow from the nature of church discipline; it does not follow as a necessary consequence from the nature of the case at all; it is an arbitrary, it is a gratuitous, it may be a capricious selection of a judicature by the general assembly. And that leads me to my next observation.

If the general assembly have a power to impose the will of this kind of majority upon the whole parish, have they not equally the power to make a totally different arrangement altogether? Can any one earthly reason be propounded which justifies the present criterion adopted by the assembly, the majority of heads of families [296]—lies in communion with the church, which would not just as well, and for the exactly same reasons, and precisely on the same grounds, have justified a totally different scheme of induction altogether. Suppose it had been enacted thus:—provided that he shall be acceptable to the majority of the synod?—that is a very important body; or, provided he shall be acceptable to and chosen by, or not rejected by, a commissioner whom the assembly shall appoint for that purpose to superintend, as they have done in former times; because I read to your Lordships out of the Book of Discipline, and I read to you out of an act, that at one time the superintendence and control was given to commissioners appointed by the kirk to regulate the presentment and induction of ministers. They might have done that; or I will tell you what they might have done, and for aught I know it is the next thing they will do, if you allow them to do what is now attempted. They might have said, provided he be agreeable to the presbytery of the bounds; who could object to that? Is it impossible they should do that? My Lords, it is so far from being impossible that they have done it already. There was an act in 1576 made by the general assembly, by which it was provided that none seek preferment without the advice of the presbytery: that was for a season the law of the kirk, and the assembly may now revive it. The legislature may make that law now which out of the kirk courts was the law before; but has the general assembly any right to do so? Has the church judicature and the general assembly, which by the common law of the land and by statutory enactment is limited to ecclesiastical concerns, a right to do that? for the statutory enactment of the year 1592 is revived in all particulars by the act of [297] 1690, c. 5., except as to patronage, and that is disposed of by the subsequent act of 1690, c. 23., which is repealed by the 10th of Queen Anne; but the other is not repealed; the act of 1592 is to all intents and purposes revived, and among other intents and purposes to that of defining, chalking out, and limiting the bounds and the formations of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. By all these rules, by the common law, by the parliamentary constitution of the country, by statute enactment, by the act of 1592, by the act of 1711, it is the province of the general assembly and the inferior church courts to take cognizance of church matters and to make regulations touching ecclesiastical concerns, and ecclesiastical concerns alone; and they are excluded, they are barred and shut out, from any cognizance of civil patrimonial rights, and not only of civil patrimonial rights directly, but of those things which indirectly affect civil patrimonial rights. They cannot do per nefas what they cannot do per fas; they cannot do indirectly what they cannot directly; they have a right to make rules as to qualification, and they have a right to make rules as to who shall judge and how they shall judge upon qualification, because qualification is admitted upon all hands to be a matter of ecclesiastical cognizance. But they have no right to make a rule as to who shall be chosen and how he shall be chosen when the patron presents him; they have no right to transfer from the patron either the whole or the half, and in this case they have transferred by far the larger half of the choice and selection of the presentee. But one thing is perfectly clear, that no grounds in reason which the general assembly can advance for its right to make the act of 1834 giving a veto to the congregation can be conceived [298] to exist which would not give them precisely as complete a power and as undeniable a right to give a veto to the presbytery of the bounds, that is to say, to repeal the act of Anne, and to revive the act, long since repealed, of 1576, which alone and for the first time assumed the choice of the presbytery.

It is now fit that I should advert to one topic which certainly at first did seem to impose some difficulty upon those who maintained the judgment of the Court below. There is a great difference, it was said, between the location or admission of a minister in Scotland and the admission of a clerk by the ordinary in England, inasmuch as in England the person having the advowson presents his clerk, a person already ordained, to the bishop; whereas in Scotland the presentee is ordained and inducted unico contextu by the presbytery, that presbytery being beyond all doubt the only judge of ordination, with which the municipal court has no right whatever to interfere. Ordination, it was said, is thus mixed up with the induction, and cannot be severed from it. But in the first place we must look to the case before us; the severance here at least is complete. The presbytery do not refuse to ordain; nothing of the kind; they do not say he is not qualified; there is no objection whatever to ordaining him; but they say, though we have no objection to ordain him we do not choose to induct him into the parish of Auchterarder, because the people dissent from receiving him; and this is our only reason. I think that is a sufficient answer to this objection, and I believe I threw it out in the course of the argument.

But there is another answer:—If a person being a probationer is brought before the presbytery for induction into a benefice, he is then ordained as well as inducted, that being the first benefice to which he is appointed. But whatever argument and whatever law applies to the case of the first benefice in respect of the present controversy, must be equally applicable to the second benefice, that is, to the case of transportation, as it is called, from one benefice to another. Now, in this case of transportation to a second benefice the argument is sifted entirely from the difficulty with which it is sought to be mixed up as to the first benefice, because the first benefice is accompanied with ordination, and the second benefice is accompanied with no ordination at all. The presentee is already e clero Domini—already ordained, and therefore the only question, in the second instance, that can arise is with respect to inducting him into the parish of A., whereas formerly he was settled in the parish of B. Consequently in this instance the presbytery can never say, we refuse to ordain him (which is matter of ecclesiastical, not of civil, cognizance) because he has already been ordained; and the only question is, shall he be inducted into the parish of B., having been already settled in the parish of A.; and that question is only of civil cognizance. No man is absurd enough to contend that the congregation should be consulted only in cases of transportation, and not of original settlement; nothing so wild has ever been urged as the proposition that the assembly has the power to make this act as to second settlements, though not as to first inductions. The two cases stand upon the selfsame grounds, and the same arguments apply to both. I think those two answers,—either of them, but citing both together, are sufficient to repel the objection which I have now been considering.

[300] Another argument was used, which I cannot altogether pass over, as many of the learned judges go very mainly upon it. It was said, is a call of no avail? does it mean nothing? Have all the people of Scotland,—all the lawyers and all the divines of the church courts, been hallucinating for so many years, when they have held a call to be necessary as part of the induction, and that the moderating in a call is the proper function of the presbytery? I by no means say that a call is nothing; but I only say it is not every thing; I deny that it is decisive; I refuse it the virtue which others ascribe to it. In the first place, it is admitted on all hands that nothing can well be conceived more obscure and involved in more doubt than the whole history of calls in Scotland. At one time there was a call most effectually, namely, during the interval between 1690 and the year 1711, because during that period the kirk session and the heritors presented to the congregation, and if the congregation did not call the presentee no further step could take place; only it is to be observed that was a call of a very peculiar nature, and wholly different from the one now contended for. The power to refuse or give a call was of a very limited kind, for the people could not refuse giving the call unless they assigned reasons, and the presbytery were to judge of those reasons. But was there ever any period in the history of Scotland in which it was held, either practically or by law, that the congregation was by a majority of voices to call a person, and that if they did not by such majority call him, nothing could be done in his favour? I know very well that there are two authorities in favour of it. The first Book of Discipline in 1560, and the second Book of Discipline in 1578; for [301] the first says the people have the power of electing: it says in so many words, "it pertaineth to people to elect their pastors;" and the second says that that "has always been the practice of the kirk till antichrist intruded into it." But that is not the law now; it was not the fact at any time; I have shown your Lordships that it is a very gross mis-statement of the historical fact; and that it never was the law of the church is clearly admitted by the very fact of the general assembly having had to invent this new mode of proceeding, namely, to call upon the majority of the male heads of families in communion with the church to accept or reject him. The majority being substituted for the former practice of any two or three persons is most material, and shows a complete change from a mere formality to a substantial choice.

But whatever was at any one time the force or validity of the call, the statute of Anne does away with it altogether, unless in a modified way and to the very limited extent, that of somewhat more and not much more than a mere ceremony, to which extent only it has been limited ever since that time. The best proof of this is, first of all, this act of 1834, making, for the first time, a majority necessary, and pointing out of whom that majority shall consist; and in the second place, the avowed fact on all hands that the call might have been made by any two or three people in a parish of two thousand, and that if the presbytery chose to moderate in that call, it was just as valid a proceeding as if it had been made by the majority or by the whole parish. Now, does not that give one a very great misgiving as to the substantial meaning of the call,—as to whether it really means anything or nothing? It can be got rid of by almost any form. [302] I suppose that the mere presentment may be a call; there is no law which points out who shall give the call. Why may not the patron, in respect of his advowson, be held to belong to the parish, even if he be not a heritor or an inhabitant? Why may not the patron's connection with the parish in respect of that advowson be held to be sufficient for the purpose of giving a call? I know there is no authority against me; I know there is no answer to these questions by any dicta of judges or any authority of text writers.

But what authority is there in favour of a call? No doubt there is the act of assembly of 1782, to which reference is made by Lord Moncreiff; and there is the decision of that venerable body in 1790, highly disapproving of the settlement of a presentee who had no call. For aught I know it may be a great informality; but observe, they did not rescind the settlement on that account. But if he had got in without a presentation, or if he had got in without the presbytery inducting him, or if he had never been ordained, would they have allowed him to continue? No such thing; they would have ousted him from the church, and they would have had another man appointed, according to the laws and formalities of the church. When it is said that the call is a very substantial ceremony, and that it is proved to exist in right and in law, and to be necessary, by the Stirlingshire case in 1790, I think you only prove the reverse by the quotation of that case, inasmuch as it was one where there had been no call of a presentee in any manner of way, where the presentee never had a call from any single person in the parish, and there was no moderation in the call by the presbytery; nevertheless he was held to be validly inducted, and to have a [303] good right to a settlement, even by those who were censuring the illegality, saying all the while fieri non debuit; factum valet. In other words a form had been omitted which ought to have been observed, but the omission was immaterial. Thus a call is shown to be as immaterial a part of a valid settlement, as it is immaterial to a valid marriage by banns, that the parties shall have resided in the parish before proclamation. That is a directory, not an imperative part, under Lord Hardwicke's marriage act. It is a very material direction; it goes to the main purpose of the statute; here it is not a necessary condition precedent; the marriage is valid without it.

My Lords, this throws great light on the subject, and mainly strengthens instead of negating my argument, for it shows that a call is held by the church court itself to be rather a matter of convenience and a useful form,—if you will an important form, than of the very essence or substance. What then is the call? It is a remnant of the old, obsolete, and repealed right of election. Whether it comes from the period which elapsed from the Revolution to the 10th of Anne, while the act of 1690 was in force, or whether it comes from some mistake of the authority of the two Books of Discipline in the 16th century I need not stop to inquire. The nature of the thing clearly enough appears from the way it has been dealt with. This serves to demonstrate that it has not been held a condition precedent of a valid induction, but that the induction may be valid without that condition being fulfilled; nothing can more clearly indicate its being a mere ceremony or form. I suppose it is convenient and useful that there should be a presentation in form of the person to the congregation as well as to the presbytery. The pres-[304]-bytery are to judge of his qualifications without appeal, except to the church court, but the congregation is to be brought acquainted with their future pastor; and as the presbytery are to judge of his life and conversation, as well as his literature, it is convenient and useful that the people should have an opportunity of coming forward with any objections which they may have to him in these important particulars. But that is wholly different from the right of veto or dissent or refusal without any cause shown.

Now I will take an analogous instance: Mr. Attorney General very properly alluded to the coronation. It is a decent and convenient solemnity to present the sovereign to the people, and the people are supposed to take part in the choice; a part, however, so immaterial that if they were all with one voice to reject, the coronation would be just as good, would go on exactly in the same way, and the rejection or recalcitration of the assembled people would have no more weight than the recalcitration of the champion's horse in Westminster Hall during the festival attending the great solemnity. It is an obsolete right, which has not within the time of known history ever been exercised by any people.

But I will state another instance which is very analogous, the publication of banns. Now both in Scotland and in England a regular marriage requires the publication of banns; in Scotland a marriage may take place by mere words of consent, without any church ceremony whatever, and it is supposed that in England the law was so before the marriage act. But a regular marriage can only be made by publication of banns, and whoever in Scotland does it without is liable to church censure. Now, when the banns are published in England, the object is to ascertain by this publicity that there is no lawful impediment, such as consanguinity within the limited degrees, or prior marriage, or refusal of consent by parents or guardians. I have taken pains to inquire, both from bishops and priests, what would be the consequence in their practice if upon publication a person were to interpose and forbid the banns, or afterwards to forbid the marriage, which may be done at the altar when the marriage is about to be solemnized. The answer they have all given is, I should suspend the solemnity till I made inquiry. But suppose the person forbidding should say, I give no reason, but I only forbid the banns; or suppose he gave another reason, that he was the rival of the husband, or that she was a rival of the lady; a very good reason for the party not wishing the marriage to take place, but no legal objection to the marriage. The answer is, that he would not be attended to at all. The marriage would go on just as well as if the dead silence prevailed through the church which generally attends those interesting solemnities. Thus, then, it is a very convenient thing that banns should be published, because it gives publicity to the intended contract; it gives parties an opportunity of coming forward. If there has been a prior marriage, it gives the public an opportunity of saying, Do not commit bigamy. If there is consanguinity, it gives the party an opportunity of saying, Do not allow incest. If there is an infant about to be married, it gives the parent or guardian an opportunity of saying that his consent has not been given; but though the law requires that the parent's or guardian's consent shall be necessary where the marriage is by licence, there is no such accompanying necessity where it is by banns; and it is [306] a very great inconsistency in the law, for, though the legislature meant, no doubt, to prevent marriage without consent, yet if the banns are published, and the priest chooses to marry in spite of the parents and the guardians, their refusal or opposition signifies nothing, and the marriage is just as valid as if they had consented. Then I am for the publication of banns. It would not be a regular marriage without it. It would not be a valid marriage in England without it, unless by licence, which is accepted by law. It would not in Scotland be a marriage free from the church censure without it; and therefore I am for it, and therefore we are all for it, and therefore we think it is a useful and a convenient part of the ceremony, because it gives opportunities for objections being made by giving publicity to the intended contract. But then the consent or silence is not a necessary part of the marriage; nay, the banns call on persons to object, and if they do object the marriage proceeds just as if they had held their peace. Furthermore the last publication tells all the world that if they do not then object they must for ever after hold their peace, and yet a person present, and saying not a word, may come forward the day after and set aside the marriage by proving a lawful impediment. Precisely so it is with respect to the call. I have attended to its history as well as I could, but I cannot find,—and I see that some of the learned judges who have given great attention to the subject have come to the same conclusion,—I cannot find that either before or after the statute of Anne, unless between 1690 and 1711, the call has been held to be a necessary part of the induction, or a condition precedent to a valid settlement. At all events I am perfectly certain that if such force and [307] effect is given to the call as to make it an essential part of the proceeding, and much more, if the general assembly, acting upon this supposition, can carry into effect any assumed intention of the law so as to make a specific provision against an induction ever taking place without the consent of the majority of the male heads of families, then the statute of Anne is abrogated, and the rights of patrons are utterly extinguished.

It only now remains that I should say something respecting the question of jurisdiction; but I have no doubt whatever upon that. It is asked, “How can the Court of Session interfere in a matter of ecclesiastical cognizance?” Prove to me your position, that this is a matter of ecclesiastical cognizance, by which I mean of exclusive consistorial cognizance; prove to me that this is a question of qualification like the question of sufficiens or minus sufficiens in literatura, and then I say that the Court of Session will be excluded, just as the Court of King’s Bench was in Specot’s case upon a quare impedit, but which Court did not deem itself to be excluded (and the Common Bench agreed with them) where the return to the quare impedit by the bishop was non idoneus. They would not have been excluded even if the bishop had said schismaticus inveteratus, much less if he had said merely nolo inducere, as the presbytery has here done; but we have here no such question as one of qualification. We have a question of election and nothing else, a veto or dissent set up by the ecclesiastical court; and which, if they had done so in England, would have been ground of prohibition, as an interference with the jurisdiction of the municipal courts in matters temporal; and therefore this argument fails altogether.

[308] But it is said, the Court of Session may give the civil rights,—the right of stipend, and can do nothing more; yet, it is admitted all the while that the court has no power to give those civil rights, to bestow the temporalities of the church on the pastor, unless he is inducted, so that the non induction was as complete a bar to the civil court giving him the temporalities as if the civil court had been told, you shall not adjudicate upon the matter at all.

Then it is said, you have no means of carrying into effect the decree of the Court of Session, albeit supported by the authority of the House of Lords, which is a decision of parliament in its judicial character, upon the subject. In other words, although you say the presbytery have acted wrong, although you say that their reason for rejecting is of no avail whatever, although you say that the law is contrary to what they have supposed it to be, and although you say, deciding upon the petitory part as well as the declaratory part of the summons (which, however, you are not called upon to do), let the presbytery induct immediately, for it has no grounds for refusing, still it is affirmed that the presbytery may persist in refusing and must prevail.

My Lords, it is indecent to suppose any such case; you might as well suppose that Doctors Commons would refuse to attend to a prohibition from the Court of King’s Bench; you might as well suppose that the Court of Session when you remit a cause with orders to alter the judgment would refuse to alter it. Conflict of laws and of courts is by no means unknown here. We have, unfortunately, upon the question of marriage had a conflict dividing the courts of the two countries for upwards of twenty-five years, in which the Court of [309] Session have held one law, and in which your Lordships and all our English judges have unanimously held another law. The Court of Session in Scotland has held and still hold two persons to be married whom your Lordships hold not to be married. But has the Court of Session ever yet, when a case, which had been adjudicated by them according to their view of the law, has come up to you, and you reversed according to your opposite view of the law,—has the Court of Session ever then continued the conflict, which would then have become not a conflict of law, but a conflict of persons, a conflict of courts, a conflict in which the weaker would assuredly have gone to the wall? The Court of Session never for one instant thought of refusing to obey your orders upon this matter, whereupon they entertained an opinion conflicting with your own. For this reason alone, and it is enough, I have no doubt whatever, that the presbytery, when your judgment is given declaring their law to be wrong, declaring the patron's right to have been valid, will even upon the declaratory part of the judgment do that which is right.

And then may come this question: what is the Court of Session to do upon the petitory part of the summons, supposing that shall be insisted upon? Enough for me to-day to observe that this is not now before us; but suppose it were I should have no fear whatever in dealing with it. I should at once make an order upon the presbytery to admit A. if duly qualified, and to disregard the dissent of the congregation. And, my Lords, why do I say so, and with such confidence? Because I look to the cases; and as these are all to the same effect, there is only one with which I shall trouble your Lordships. None of them bear upon the main question now before [310] us, but they effectually raise the inquiry, collaterally instituted, How are the court's orders to be enforced? They are all cases of conflicting rights of advowson, they are all cases where there was no question whatever between the presbytery and the courts, and the only question was as to the right of A. to be presented. They are all cases, therefore, which fall without the scope of the main argument here before us, and throw no light upon that. But upon this collateral question they do throw light; and I refer to the case which a most learned judge, Lord Gillies, has justly called a too well known case, for it was attended with unpleasant circumstances,—the case of Lord Dundas v. The Zetland Presbytery, in the year 1795. Now, what was the conclusion of the libel there?—"That it should be found and declared that the pursuer had a right to the patronage, that he exercised his right as patron within the time prescribed by law, and that the presentation to Mr. Nicolson is valid and effectual, and was offered to the moderator of the presbytery in due time." The conflict was this, that the presbytery had chosen one, and they ought to have chosen the other. The Court were called upon to declare "that the presbytery should be decerned and ordained by decree foresaid to give due obedience to the said presentation, and to proceed in the settlement of the said Nicolson," who was the conflicting, or, as they call him, the competing, presentee, "until the final end and conclusion; or, until the said Nicolson shall be settled in the said church and parish of Unst, it ought and should be found and declared by decree foresaid that the pursuer and the other heritors, life renters, and others liable in stipend to the minister [311] serving the cure of the said parish, are entitled to withhold and retain the said stipend," and so forth. They then settled Nicolson, whose name, Lord Gillies says, appears as the minister next year instead of Gray, the competing one, whom they had before erroneously admitted and settled.

Now observe that the cause of this dispute was totally different from the present; it was because Nicolson was the proper man in competition with Gray; but that is perfectly immaterial to the present argument, touching the jurisdiction of the Court of Session. Whatever was the cause of dispute, the presbytery had acted wrong. The presbytery had refused to admit Nicolson; they had admitted Gray. What does the Court of Session say? Admit our man Nicolson, and oust your man Gray. Why was it not said in that case, as has been said here, this is nonsense, this is incompetent; you have mistaken your way; the Court of Session has no power; because, when the Court of Session declares that Nicolson has the right, the presbytery will continue to keep in Gray, and then what can you do? And so would arise in that case of Zetland every one of the arguments with which an attempt has been made to scare your Lordships from putting a proper construction upon the act of parliament, and from doing your duty in this appeal; namely, can you have letters of horning against a whole presbytery? Can you proceed against a whole body of clergymen? Can you bring an action of damages against a whole body of men? That is the argument with which we have been harassed and threatened at the bar if we here affirm the judgment of the court below. Why was not that argument used in the case I have just mentioned to [312] scare the court below? It is good for nothing; but it would have been not more worthless there than it is here. And if the Court of Session had the power of saying there "Take Nicolson and oust Gray," have we not just the same power here of telling the presbytery "You have mistaken the law" (a perfectly innocent mistake, to which all men are liable); retrace your steps, and take the person presented by the patron, if he is qualified according to the ecclesiastical rules? Therefore, I hold that this argument on the jurisdiction is utterly absurd and untenable, and proves no impediment in our course towards a right conclusion.

These are the grounds upon which I hold that it is expedient and just, and therefore necessary, for your Lordships to affirm the judgment of the Court below. I find that I have gone at much greater length in point of time into this case than was at all desirable; but when I consider the great interest which it has excited, and, moreover, when I observe that I look upon it as so much more clear than many have considered it, who have dealt with it below, I do not regret that I have pursued this course.

My Lords, no person would lament more deeply than myself if the judgment which I am now about to move should give offence to that most venerable body, the general assembly, as representing the church of Scotland. I have the most profound veneration for that establishment, and it is hereditary in me as well as personal. I am myself sprung from some of the most venerable and most learned members of that establishment; sprung directly from them, as well as knit to them by collateral connexion. I cannot be indifferent to its welfare or deaf to its claims, or in the slightest degree prepared to [313] treat it with any other than the most affectionate reverence.

My Lords, I am not the only person engaged in this discussion before your Lordships' house who is connected with the church of Scotland, and who is imbued, I know, with those joint feelings towards it. The learned Attorney General is himself descended from a most venerable pastor of that establishment; and I know, because nothing could more clearly indicate it than the whole course of his argument, and all the observations which fell from him, that he is most scrupulously and delicately averse to any thing which could betoken the slightest want of respect for it, as much so as I am myself. I say this the rather because I have been not a little astonished, in my correspondence with Scotland, to find that something which fell from him had been so grossly misrepresented or misunderstood as to make it fit that I should authoritatively, and as a witness present during the whole argument, contradict it, as utterly unfounded in point of fact. Nothing could be more perfectly respectful and affectionate towards that body than the whole of the argument on the Attorney General's part throughout.

My Lords, I join with him in the deepest sorrow, that anything in this House should pass, to which he has contributed by his argument, and to which I am contributing more effectually by my judgment, with the tendency of perpetuating the discord now prevailing in Scotland. That it should ever have begun all must sincerely deplore, but that it should continue is a matter of still greater affliction to every friend of his country. I have declared my inviolable respect for the kirk and general assembly, but any want of respect that I could [314] show towards them, any irreverence—any mockery of them, any slander that I could bring against them, any attempt to revile them, or to hold them up to hatred and to scorn, would be a mere jest compared to the attempts that are made by some who take an opposite view of the case, and who, without meaning, God knows, any more than I do, any the least disrespect, think they are taking the best means for establishing their privileges by holding out indications that the assembly will pursue its own course; that the assembly will disregard the authority of the law; that an assembly of christian ministers will be parties to the fomenting of discords; that the last thing the ministers of peace are minded to promote is the peace of the church of Christ committed to their care; and that the only thing they now think of is the victory of them, the churchmen, the pastors of Christ's flock, over the judges, over the supreme judges of the land, and over the law of the land itself; a victory to be won by setting up acts of their own, which they have no title to pass, against queen, lords, and commons,—the statute law of the realm.

My Lords, I defend the assembly against the arguments and the threats of their advocates. I protest on the part of the assembly as a body of christian men, of whom the bulk are christian ministers, against the imputation thus thrown out against them by this course of defending them, and I say that my hopes of them, my confident expectations of what will be their conduct, are wholly the reverse of those prospects thus held out; that it was an injudicious line of argument on their behalf, an argument which I am morally certain would be repudiated and spurned by the assembly itself. My Lords, that assembly will do its duty, will show its [315] veneration for the established authority of the law, will rest satisfied with having entered its protest and indicated upon its records its own opinions; but will, with its inferior judicature the presbytery, render a willing and respectful obedience to the law of the land as pronounced by the Court of Session and as affirmed by your Lordships. With these views, my Lords, and upon these grounds I am humbly to move your Lordships, that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, it is impossible for me to conclude to-day the observations which I think it my duty to present to your Lordships in this case, and therefore, with your Lordships' concurrence, I shall adjourn the further consideration of this case till half-past two to-morrow.

Lord Brougham.—My Lords, I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend. I know that my noble and learned friend means to enter into this case at large, and therefore I entirely agree with him that it will be most satisfactory to postpone it until to-morrow.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, it was stated to your Lordships yesterday by my noble and learned friend, that the opinion we had formed upon this case had been arrived at by us without any communication with each other. My Lords, that statement required no confirmation from me; I only refer to it for the purpose of explaining the grounds upon which I propose to follow a course in this case which I should be induced [316] to abstain from in any other. When I asked my noble and learned friend within a few days what opinion he had formed upon this case, I certainly was not without a very confident expectation of the answer I should receive, not from any thing which had passed between us, but because in examining the case myself it appeared to me difficult, if not impossible, to suppose that my noble and learned friend could have come to any conclusion other than that at which I had arrived myself.

My Lords, in this case, as in all others of importance, I have thought it the better course to reduce to writing the opinion I have formed, and the reasons upon which it was founded; a course which I am well aware that my noble and learned friend approves, inasmuch as I believe no judge before his time delivered so many written judgments; a course which is productive of the greatest benefit, which the profession have particularly experienced from the judgments of my noble and learned friend; and a practice which I am happy to say has been pretty generally adopted in all the courts of Westminster Hall. My Lords, following this course, I have, after considering all the documents upon the subject, and all the authorities referred to, committed to writing the opinion I have formed, with the reasons upon which it is founded. My Lords, that was accomplished long before I had any communication with my noble and learned friend upon the subject.

Now, in listening to what fell from my noble and learned friend yesterday, I found that very many of the grounds upon which the opinion which I have formed would rest have been anticipated by what was stated yesterday. Under ordinary circumstances I should have [317] thought that a very sufficient reason for abstaining from a repetition of that which had been so much more ably expressed by my noble and learned friend. But in this case I consider it to be rather a ground for exactly the opposite course of proceeding, because it cannot but be satisfactory to those who take an interest in this matter, and who of course will anxiously consider all that falls from your Lordships upon this question, to see what have been the workings of the minds which have been applied to it without any communication with each other; and if there should be found to be a similarity of reasoning and a community of view of particular parts of this case operating upon the mind of my noble and learned friend and of myself, no doubt it will have some effect in leading those who may consider the judgment of your Lordships, to be satisfied at least, that there probably is some foundation for those conclusions to which we have both arrived separately, and apart from each other.

It has seldom happened that your Lordships have been called upon to adjudicate upon a case of more importance than that now under your consideration. It affects the manner in which ministers are to be appointed to a very large proportion of all the parochial benefices in Scotland, and believing, as I do, that the interests and well being of the people now and hereafter depend much upon the due execution of the most important duties of pariah priests, I feel deeply the responsibility which attaches to all those who are called upon to decide upon the manner of their appointment; for although no opinion as to policy ought to influence our judgment, which ought to be founded upon grounds of law only, yet the importance of the judgment to be [318] pronounced, and the evil consequences of any error, impose upon us all the sacred duties of exercising every means within our reach of coming to a safe and satisfactory conclusion.

With these feelings I have addressed myself to the consideration of this case. It naturally divides itself into two questions.

First, whether the proceeding of the presbytery of Auchterarder, founded upon the act of the general assembly of the 31st of May 1834, was legal, or an invasion of the rights of the pursuer. And, secondly, whether the interlocutor of the Court of Session appealed from was within its jurisdiction, and such as, under the circumstances of the case, ought to have been pronounced.

In considering the first of these questions, much of the difficulty which has been felt would, I think, be removed if any precise meaning could be affixed to certain terms which have been necessarily introduced into the argument on either side. Both parties agree that the right of presenting the minister belongs to the lay patron, and that the right of judging and of deciding upon his qualification for his office belongs to the church; for such indeed is the substance of the legislative enactments upon the subject. Both these rights must be exercised in the settlement of the minister, but the boundary between these rights,—what belongs to the one and what to the other, is the real question in dispute.

The pursuers allege that the right of presentation entitles the presentee to be admitted into the benefice, unless the church shall, upon examination and trial of the presentee, find him not qualified.

[319] The defenders, on the other side, contend, that to the church belongs the right of deciding upon the whole matter of admission, including every consideration which may affect the propriety or impropriety of the presentees becoming ministers of the parish.

What is the extent of the patron's right to present, and what the jurisdiction of the church in judging the qualifications of the presentee? That is the real question: if the acts, upon the true construction of which the whole contest ought to rest, reserve the right to the one and the jurisdiction to the other? Which being so, it necessarily follows that that only can be a true construction of the acts and a proper definition of those terms which preserves this right and this jurisdiction. The boundary between the two must be so fixed that the one must not be permitted to encroach upon, still less to destroy, the other.

If it were safe to refer to the law and practice of England in ascertaining the meaning of those terms, whatever doubt may exist would be speedily solved. It is the undoubted right of the patron here to present, and to insist upon the admission to the benefice of any qualified person, and the jurisdiction of the bishop is confined to deciding upon the qualification, or rather disqualification, of the presentee. But I have felt desirous of avoiding as far as possible any reference to the law and practice of this country, and choose to discuss and decide upon the law and practice and authorities of Scotland alone, even as to the meaning of the terms used; and I think there is not only in the statutes themselves, but in authorities of an earlier date, conclusive proof of the sense in which these terms were understood from the earliest periods, and of the meaning [320] which ought to be attributed to them in putting a construction upon the statutes.

That the right of patronage, as it existed before the reformation, though no doubt subject to the jurisdiction of the church as to the qualification of the presentee, was not subject to any limit or restriction from the people or congregation, has not been disputed.

In 1555 the general assembly, in a message to the queen, expressed their opinion as to the meaning of those terms—patronage of the patron, and trial and examination by the church. They say, “Our mind is not that Her Majesty or any other patron should be deprived of their just patronages, but we mean whensoever Her Majesty or any other patron do present any person to a benefice, that the person presented should be tried and examined by the judgment of learned men of the church, such as are the present superintendents; and as the presentation unto the benefice appertains unto the patron, so the collation by law and reason belongs unto the church, and the church should not be defrauded from the collation, no more than the patrons of their presentation; for otherwise, if it be lawful to the patrons to present whom they please without trial or examination, what can abide in the church of God but mere ignorance!”

Balfour (p. 501), who writes in 1566, says, “Ane laique patron of ony kirk or benefice vaikand sould present thairto ane qualifyit and habil persoun of sufficient literature, honest in life, and of gude maneris.” At this time, then, all the church asked as against the patron was a right to judge of the qualification of the presentee; that is, of his literature, good life, and manners.

[321] When, therefore, the act of 1567, c. 7, ordained that the examination and admission of ministers should be in the power of the kirk then publicly professed within the realm, the presentation of lay patrons always reserved to the just and ancient patrons, and directed that the patron should present one qualified person within six months, otherwise that the kirk should have power to dispoise the same to one qualified person for the time, it is clear that the presentation so secured to the lay patron was to be subject only to the trial and examination of the church as to the qualification of the presentee, that is, as to his literature, life, and manners; and that the appeal given by that act to the patron against the refusal of the superintendent to receive and admit the presentee applied only to what had been before the subject of trial and examination, that is, his qualification as to literature, life, and manners.

If such was the extent of the right of patronage, and such the limit of the jurisdiction of the church in the trial and examination of the presentee under the statute of 1567, cap. 7., there will not be much difficulty in tracing those rights and duties through the subsequent statutes.

By the statute 1592, cap. 116., it is ordained “that all presentation to benefices be directed to the particular presbyteries, with full power to give collation thereupon, and to put order to all matters and causes ecclesiastical within their bounds according to the discipline of the kirk; provided the foresaid presbyteries be bound and astricted to receive and admit quhat-somever qualified minister presented be His Majesty or laick patrones.”

By another statute of the same year 1592, cap. 117., it is ordained, that upon deprivation of a minister the [322] patron shall present another qualified to the kirk within six months, and that if he fail so to do, the right of presentation shall devolve to the presbytery, to the effect that they may dispose of the same, and give collation to such qualified person as they shall think expedient. Provided that in case the presbytery refuse to admit any qualified minister presented to them by the patron, it shall be lawful for the patron to retain the whole fruits of the benefice in his own hands.

There is no allusion in any of these statutes to any authority intervening in the settlement of a minister between the presentation by the patron and the admission by the presbytery of a qualified person, which qualifications were clearly personal; and of which, indeed, the church was to judge, but was bound and astricted to receive and admit any person presented who should be qualified.

There is no allusion in any of these statutes to any election by the parishioners, or to any reference to them for approval or disapproval. The early reformers had struggled for some such power, and in the first Book of Discipline, composed in 1560, and therefore before the act of 1567, and the second Book of Discipline, composed in 1578, and therefore before the two last acts, it is expressly claimed; but the legislature decides against it, and secures to the patron the right of presenting the minister, and to the church the power of rejecting him, but only upon the ground of his not being qualified. Such were the terms and conditions upon which the presbyterian church government was established, and received the sanction of the legislature; but it appears that these terms and conditions were unwillingly submitted to, for, so early after these acts as the year 1596, [323] the assembly enacted and attempted to establish that none should seek presentation to benefices without advice of the presbytery, and that if any should do the contrary they should be repelled; and this was approved and re-enacted by the assembly in 1638.

When, therefore, the legislature, notwithstanding this feeling and these attempts on the part of the church, declared that the presbyteries were bound and astricted to receive and admit whatsoever qualified person was presented by the lay patrons, there can be no doubt of the object of the enactment, or of the construction to be put upon the terms used.

The act 1690, cap. 23., which for a time destroyed patronage, recognizes the efficacy with which it had been exercised, and recites that the power of presenting ministers to vacant churches of late exercised by patrons had been greatly abused, and annuls and makes void the said power theretofore exercised by any patron of presenting ministers to any vacant kirk. And to the effect the calling and entering ministers in all time coming may be orderly and regularly performed, it enacts, that the heritors and elders shall propose a person to the congregation, to be approved or disapproved by them. If they disapprove, they are to give their reasons, to the effect the affair may be cognosed by the presbytery, at whose judgment and by whose determination the calling and entry of the minister are to be ordered and concluded. And it enacts, that if application be not made by the elders and heritors to the presbytery, for the call and choice of a minister within six months, the presbytery may proceed to provide the said parish, and plant a minister tanquam jure devoluto; and it provides a certain compensation to [324] the patron for the right of presentation thereby taken away.

The act of Anne, c. 12, 1711, is entitled "An act to restore the patrons to their ancient rights of presenting ministers to the churches vacant." It recites, that by the ancient laws and constitution of Scotland the presenting of ministers to vacant churches did of right belong to the patrons, until by the act of 1690 the presentation was taken from the patrons and given to the heritors and elders; and that that way of calling ministers had proved inconvenient, and had occasioned great heats amongst those who by that act were authorized to call ministers, and had been a great hardship upon the patrons. It then repeals the act of 1690, so far as it relates to the presentation of ministers by heritors and others therein mentioned, and enacts, that in all time coming the right of all and every patron and patrons to the presentation of ministers to churches and benefices be restored and confirmed to them, any act or statute to the contrary notwithstanding; and that it should be lawful for any person who had right of patronage for any church to present a qualified minister, and that the presbytery shall and is hereby obliged to receive and admit such qualified person as the person or minister presented before the making of that act ought to have been admitted.

Such are the legislative provisions upon the subject in contest in this cause,—the right claimed by the pursuers, and the power or duty claimed by the defenders, to belong to them, and to be regulated by the enactments now in force, so far as such enactments support such rights or regulate such powers and duties. Other authorities and other regulations may be resorted to, as [325] operative in matters not included in these enactments, but can be of no effect as to any matter within them. What then is the true construction of such of these enactments as are now in force, resorting to the history of the time only for the purpose of explaining the expressions used in those statutes? In my opinion clearly this: that the patron's right to present was absolute, but to be exercised only in favour of a qualified person, of which the presbytery were to judge. If such was the right of the patrons under their statutable title, and such the power and duty of the presbytery, it is only necessary to inquire whether the act of 1834 has or has not interfered with their right; and whether the presbytery, in the course they have pursued, have or have not assumed a power beyond that which is given to them by the statutes.

In making this inquiry, it must be assumed that the presbytery were armed with all the authority which the general assembly could give to them. But if the general assembly had no power to pass the act of 1834, or to authorize the presbytery to follow its directions, the presbytery can derive no protection from it. The question, therefore, is as to the validity and efficacy of the act of 1834, but which properly arises between the patron and the presbytery. There appears, therefore, to be no ground for the objection raised, that the contest is with the general assembly, who are not represented in this cause.

What, then, was the act of the presbytery of which the patron complains? It appears from their proceedings as printed, that the presentation was duly made, and the form being, as I understand, the usual and old accustomed form, is not immaterial. The patron nominates [326] and presents the minister to be minister of the parish, grants to him the glebe and stipend, requires the presbytery to take trial of his qualification, literature, life, and conversation, and having found him fit and qualified for the functions of the ministry of the said church, to admit and receive him thereto, and give him his act of ordination and admission.

This form of presentation appears to me correctly to describe the rights of the patron and the duties of the presbytery as prescribed by the statutes.

This presentation with all the usual papers being laid before the presbytery, they in so far sustained the presentation as to find themselves prepared to appoint a day for moderating in a call to the presentee, and accordingly they appoint a day for that purpose. On the day appointed a call was produced, and signed in the usual manner. The presbytery then gave opportunity for the male heads of families, whose names stood on the roll, to give special objections, or dissents to the admission of the presentee. No special objections were given in, but it appears that a majority of the heads of families whose names appear on the roll dissented.

It was then moved that the presentee's call, being signed only by three persons, was insufficient; upon which a counter-motion was made, that the presbytery refuse to act in terms of the motion, it being incompetent in that stage of the business. Which last motion was carried; not an unimportant circumstance with reference to the argument, that in rejecting the presentee the presbytery were only adjudicating upon the sufficiency of the call.

At a subsequent meeting of the presbytery it was moved and seconded, that in conformity with the sen-[327]-tence of the general assembly 1835, and the interim act of the general assembly of 1834, the presbytery do now reject the presentee, which the presbytery agreed to be determined in terms thereof.

It appears, therefore, that there never was any adjudication upon the call, but that the presbytery rejected the presentee, because a majority of heads of families whose names appeared upon the roll dissented. It is also clear that such rejection was not in consequence of any adjudication of the presbytery upon the qualification of the presentee; such adjudication can only be made upon the trial; but according to the form adopted the call must be sustained before the trials are proceeded with; and by the article 8 of the act of 1834 the presbytery was to proceed to the trials only in the case of the dissents not being those of a majority of persons on the roll.

Now, if it was the right of the patron under the statutes to present a qualified person, and if the presbytery were obliged to receive and admit such qualified person, which are the words of the statute of Anne, what possible right could the presbytery have to reject a person duly presented without any trial of his qualification, because a majority of the heads of families dissented? There is no such restriction upon the right of patronage and presentation in the statute, but, on the contrary, the right is unfettered and unlimited, except as to the person presented being qualified. Looking, therefore, to the statutes, as giving, or rather as securing and defining, the rights of the patron, it does not appear to me to be a matter of doubt that the presbytery in rejecting the presentee have acted in opposition to the provisions of those statutes, and in violation of the [328] rights of the patron, which those statutes intended to secure. If the question had been as to the construction of those statutes simply, it does not appear to me to be possible that any serious doubt could have been entertained; and it may, therefore, be thought that I have unnecessarily occupied so much time in considering this part of the subject. I have been induced to do so from a conviction that a due understanding of the construction of these statutes must lead to an easy solution of the several collateral questions which have been fully discussed in the several stages of this cause, and which have given rise to the difficulties which have been thought to belong to the question between the parties.

In considering these collateral questions I have therefore assumed that, according to the true construction of the statutes, there is thereby reserved to the patron the right of presenting a qualified person, and to the presbytery the right of trying his qualifications and the power of rejecting him if found not to be qualified.

If such be the construction of the statutes, of what purpose can it be to consider the supposed legislative power of the general assembly? For it cannot be contended that there can exist in the general assembly any legislative power to repeal, control, or interfere with enactments of the legislature. So that, even if the subject matter were found to be within the general legislative power of the general assembly, it would be powerless as to such subject matter so far as it is regulated by statute. It would therefore be beyond the powers of the general assembly to interfere with the right of the patron, as secured by statute, by adding to the powers of the presbytery.

[329] But this legislative power claimed for the general assembly is confined to ecclesiastical matters, and it is insisted that the matter to which the act of 1834 applies is ecclesiastical. Now, although it is clear that if it were so the legislative power of the general assembly would be controlled by the statute, it is worth considering whether the matter in question can be considered as ecclesiastical. It is clear that there is nothing ecclesiastical in the right of presentation; that is a purely civil right; the adjudication upon the qualification of the presentee may be a matter ecclesiastical. But it is the right of presentation, and not the power of adjudication, which is affected by the act of 1834; not the power of adjudication, because that is to be exercised upon the examination and trials which, according to the proceedings of the presbytery in this case, following the directions of the act of 1834, have never been entered upon; but certainly the right of presentation, because, if that right consists in selecting the minister and calling upon the presbytery to admit him if found qualified, and for that purpose to examine and try him, it is a direct interference with that right to say we will not examine the minister presented, and though qualified we will not admit him if any other person or persons, be they who they may, object to him. Is it no infringement of a right to give to others a veto upon the exercise of it? As an argument in favour of the proposition that what the presbytery have done is matter exclusively of ecclesiastical cognizance, it has been contended that the ordination of a minister is part of the proceedings for settling him in the parish, and that the civil courts can, therefore, have no jurisdiction over any part of such proceedings. It is true that the ordi-[330]-nation in general takes place upon the settlement of the minister, but it seems quite clear that the two are altogether distinct. The ordaining may, and often does, take place without any preferment, as when a minister is ordained for the purpose of becoming a missionary; so a minister may be and often is settled in a parish without ordination, as when, having been ordained, and settled in one parish, he is transferred to and settled in another. Indeed the offices of ordaining the minister and of settling him in the parish are performed by different authorities; the first by members of the church only, the latter by the presbytery at large. But how can the interlocutor complained of interfere with the office of ordination, that takes place after the presentee has been put upon his trials, and found qualified, and no valid objection made? The discretion and duty confided to those who are to confer orders remain unaffected by the taking the presentee upon trials; which is all that the interlocutor declares that the presbytery ought to have done.

But this consideration opens another objection to the act of 1834, as it enables the majority dissenting to interfere as well with the province of the church in ordaining the minister as with the right of the patron to present him. That the act of 1834 does in its operation interfere with the right of presentation is obvious; but it is contended that it does so indirectly only, and merely through the exercise of the ecclesiastical power of adjudication upon the qualifications; of which it is said that being acceptable to the parishioners is one, and that being objectionable to a majority of the heads of families is a disqualification.

I have already observed that the presbytery are de-[331]-prived of this argument by the proceedings adopted. They rejected the presentee before the time arrived for adjudication upon his qualifications. But if it be clear, as it certainly is, that the qualifications referred to in the statute are personal qualifications, "literature, life, and manners," there can be no ground for contending that the dissent of the majority of the heads of families is a disqualification within the meaning of the statutes. It cannot be so in substance, and it has not been so treated in form. How can the dissent of any person be a disqualification of the presentee, more than the want of a previous consent of the presbytery as attempted in 1596? If the presbytery have the power of imposing this obstruction to the exercise of the right of presentation, it is clear that there can be no limit but their own will to the obstruction which may be afterwards added; it can exist only at their discretion; they will have the power of appropriating it to themselves, or of giving it to others in defiance of the statutable title of the patron.

Another ground upon which the act of 1834 has been justified, and which is recited in it as the foundation of it, is, that it is a fundamental law of the church of Scotland that no person shall be intruded in any congregation contrary to the will of the people; and that the act is only an arrangement to carry that principle into effect. Whether that is or ever was a law of the church of Scotland is perfectly immaterial, if the statutes contain enactments and confer rights inconsistent with any such principle, or with the execution of any such law. The absolute right of patronage, subject only to the rejection of the presentee by the adjudication of the presbytery for want of qualification, which is secured by [332] the statute, is inconsistent with the exercise of any volition by the inhabitants, however expressed. The second Book of Discipline, cap. 12., p. 9., says, "that the liberty of election, so that none be intruded upon any congregation by the prince or any inferior person without the assent of the people, cannot stand with patronage and presentation." Therefore the reformers of those days sought to destroy patronage, but the legislature rejected the proposition and confirmed the law of patronage; and now it is contended that the power of rejection does not interfere with the civil rights of patronage and presentation. But how stands the evidence as to this being a fundamental law of the church of Scotland? It certainly is unfortunate for the argument in support of this supposed law that the 17th article of the act of 1834 is directly at variance with it, as it gives to the presbytery acting jure devoluto the power of appointing a minister without any reference to the wishes of the congregation. I am now inquiring what evidence there is of the principle of non-intrusion having been the law of the church; that it never was the law of the land sufficiently appears from the statutes I have referred to.

In the message of the general assembly to the Queen, in 1565, there is no allusion to any such principle. The first Book of Discipline proposed that if upon open audience the minister be found unobjectionable in doctrine, life, and utterance, the congregation are unreasonable if they reject him, and that they should be compelled by the censure of the church to receive him; and this is not a violent intrusion.

In 1649, when the church enjoyed the patronage, they did not give the congregation the right of dis[333]-senting, but only of stating objections, of which the presbytery were to judge, which was the principle of the act of 1690, c. 23. No doubt many attempts have been made to destroy patronage and to introduce the principle of election in various forms; the attempts have failed. So far as the principle of non-intrusion is inconsistent with the rights of patronage secured by statute it could not be the law of the church; and in the instances referred to the principle has rather been to admit the congregation to state objections than to give them an arbitrary power of rejection.

Connected with this supposed law of non-intrusion is another of the arguments in favour of the act of 1834; that it is a regulation of the call, and that as the call is a matter ecclesiastical the church had the power to regulate it. To this the first and obvious answer is, that whether the provisions of the act of 1834 be or be not connected with the call, and whether the call be or be not part of the ecclesiastical function of admission, the general assembly had no right to make, and the presbytery, therefore, had no right to follow, any regulation inconsistent with the right of the patron as secured by the statutes. But it appears to me that there is no ground for connecting these regulations with the call; and that the call itself, whatever may be its origin or meaning, cannot be so used as to interfere with the right of patronage. The call is, in form, merely an invitation and request by the inhabitants subscribing it to the presentee to take upon himself the spiritual charge of the parish, promising to him all due respect, encouragement, and obedience. It is a request not to decline the office to which he has been presented; it implies no power or authority on those [334] who subscribe it; it does not profess to be the act of the inhabitants at large, or even a majority. The act of 1834 does not treat the regulation prescribed for enforcing the veto as part of the call, although it directs such regulation to be put in force at the time of moderating in the call. If the majority disapprove, the presentee is to be rejected, but without reference to the call; and so the presbytery have acted, and their acts have been approved by the assembly: for it not only appears that the presentee was rejected without any adjudication upon the call, but after it had been finally ascertained that a majority dissented. Upon a motion being made that the call was not good and sufficient, they refused to act in the terms of the motion, as being incompetent in that stage of the business, and their next act was to reject the presentee upon the ground of the dissents, without any reference to the call. And this is not only admitted to be so by the defenders, but is one of the arguments urged against the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, the call being, as it is said, a matter ecclesiastical, and there having been no adjudication upon the call. Under these circumstances there seems to be no ground for justifying what has taken place under the act of 1834 as a proceeding in moderating in the call. But if this were otherwise, can it be maintained that it can be used in such a manner as to prejudice a right secured by act of parliament; and above all, that it can be altered from a form in that respect innocuous, so as to produce that effect? Whether the call be considered matter ecclesiastical or not, it must be subject to the control of parliament, and must be accommodated to the provisions of its enactments. If it existed before the act of 1711 in a form to interfere with patronage, it was so far restricted by that act. Considering, however, the arguments which have been urged in this case upon the subject of the call, it seems necessary to inquire in some degree as to its apparent origin and nature.

The term seems first to occur at periods when the early reformers were struggling for the election of ministers. The acts of 1567 and 1592 negatived this claim; but the struggle continued, and at different times subsequently it was attended with success; and in the act of 1690, by which patronage was for a time destroyed, the expression "calling and entering" ministers is used, the calling being apparently put in opposition to presenting; and in the act of 1711, by which patronage was restored, there is no longer any mention of "calling;" but the patron's right to present, and the presbytery's duty to receive and admit a qualified person so presented, are the only acts referred to as incident to filling the vacant churches. The act of 1649 uses the term "call" in the same sense as the act of 1690; it declares the title of a minister valid who upon the suit and calling of the congregation, after due examination of his literature and conversation, shall be admitted by the presbytery, though he have no presentation.

If, then, the call was what the reformers were desirous of substituting for patronage when the latter was finally established by the act of 1711, the call could only be continued as a form; and if before that time it was only to be substituted for the civil right of patronage, why was not the substituted right to be of the same character as the original? Why, if the patronage was a civil right, was the call to be a matter ecclesiastical? [336] Both were the exercise of the right of selecting the individual and bringing him to the church for examination and admission. Till the person selected was so presented or called, and brought to the church, the ecclesiastical jurisdiction does not appear to have commenced. It is true that many instances have been produced of questions as to the validity of the call having been brought before the assembly from the decisions of the presbytery; and if in any of those cases the result had been that the patron had been deprived of the benefit of his right of presentation by a final judgment of the assembly that the call was insufficient, it would no doubt operate as a case in which the individual patron had acquiesced in the jurisdiction of the assembly. But if no such case can be produced, and if, on the contrary, the result of the appeal to the assembly has been either a settlement by arrangement, or a decision in favour of the patron against the prior proceedings of the presbytery, of which the case of Dunfermline, in 1752, is a remarkable instance, then the fact of no case upon this point having been brought before the civil tribunal is fully explained.

It appears, indeed, for many years after the act of 1711 the difficulties thrown in the way of the patrons were such that their rights were but sparingly enforced; but it is admitted that in all the latter times the decisions of the assembly have been in favour of the patrons; holding any call to be sufficient, and thereby treating it as a mere form. It is impossible too highly to praise the good sense of those distinguished members of the church, who, seeing that the law was against them, avoided giving offence to their less discreet brethren by preserving the form of the call, but at the [337] same time so dealt with it as not to let it interfere with the right of the patron, and thereby avoided a collision, in which it was certain that the church must have been defeated. I cannot, therefore, consider the proceedings which have been produced from the records of the assembly respecting calls as of any weight upon the present question. They cannot be of any weight except when they show acquiescence in the jurisdiction by the patron; for, as acts ascribing a jurisdiction to the assembly itself, they can only be classed with such proceedings as the assembly adopted in 1596, and 1638, and 1736; they attempted to establish rules as to patronage, in direct opposition to the provisions of existing statutes; and looking to the proceedings of the assembly itself down to the year 1834, they exhibit, indeed, in the earlier times a struggle against the right of the patrons as defined by statute, but afterwards a gradual acquiescence in those rights and submission to the law.

The second Book of Discipline had declared the obvious truth that patronage and election could not stand together. An effectual call is equally inconsistent with patronage; and the church therefore most properly treated any call as sufficient. I do not, however, think it necessary to express my opinion upon the origin or effect of the call, except so far as the use of it may interfere with the rights of the patron as secured by statute. With such rights the call in its original form could not have been permitted to interfere; no new regulations inconsistent with those rights can be legal; they can give no authority, from being clothed with the name of a call, from which in form and substance they entirely differ.

[338] It has been suggested by the highest authority that the act of 1711, in enacting that the presbyteries shall receive and admit the persons presented by the lay patrons, in the same manner as the persons or ministers presented before the making of this act ought to have been admitted, intended to have preserved the form prescribed by the act of 1690, c. 23, for the purpose of enabling the congregation to state objections to the presentee for the consideration of the presbytery, and subject to being overruled by them. If that should be the right construction of the words in the statute of Anne, it would not affect the present question. That part of the provision of the act of 1690 would be consistent with what has been often contended for as a proper course, and what, in form at least, prevails upon ordination in England and in Scotland. It would, in effect, only add to the facilities of the presbytery in judging of the qualifications upon the trials; but it has no resemblance to the provisions of the act of 1834, which, instead of giving an opportunity to the inhabitants to state objections which the presbytery may disregard, enables a majority, by dissenting without any reasons stated, to deprive the presbytery of the power of adjudicating upon the qualifications of the presentee.

It is therefore unnecessary to express any opinion upon this point; but to guard against misapprehension, I will only say that there appear to me to be difficulties to be overcome before this construction of the statute of 1711 can be adopted, of which I have not been able to find any solution. It is sufficient for the present purpose to observe, that if that be the true construction of the act of 1711, the act of 1834 would be equally an invasion of the right of the patron. I cannot, therefore, [339] hesitate to declare my decided opinion that the proceedings of the presbytery founded upon the act of the assembly of 1834 amount to an illegal interference with the right of the patron as secured by statute, and that a wrong has thereby been sustained by the pursuer.

The next subject for consideration is the remedy for this wrong, and before I apply myself to the consideration of the objections which have been made to the proceedings of the Court of Session for this purpose, I must make some observations upon an argument of a more general nature urged on the behalf of the defenders; which, if well founded, would, in effect, give to the general assembly a legislative power uncontrollable even by parliament, and would exhibit a case, I will not say of wrong, as that would be a contradiction in terms, but of a serious deprivation of valuable civil private rights without the possibility of redress.

It is argued, that although the right of presentation belongs to the patron, yet that everything connected with the admission of the minister after the presentation is by law subject to the jurisdiction and direction of the church; that the general assembly has legislative power to make what regulation it thinks fit upon that subject; and that no complaint can be made of any thing done by the presbytery relative to the admission of ministers, but to the superior ecclesiastical courts, that is, ultimately, to the assembly. The result would necessarily be, that the assembly in its legislative capacity might make laws destructive of the right of patronage, and, having sole jurisdiction over the execution of its own laws by the inferior jurisdictions, no means would exist of questioning the legality of its enactments. This is but a mode [340] of describing pure despotism; if any such power had existed in the church, the struggle against patronage continued through so many years could not have been unsuccessful. Whatever parliament might have enacted, the general assembly had only to enact laws of its own inconsistent with the enactments of parliament, and itself to have enforced the execution of them. It could not have failed to have effectuated what it attempted in 1596 and 1638, by accepting the presentation, but enacting that the presbytery should not proceed to admit the presentee unless he had previously received the consent of the assembly. From a rejection by the presbytery upon this ground there would, according to the argument, be no appeal or means of redress but by application to the general assembly, who, supporting the act of the presbytery in the execution of their own enactment, would at once transfer the right of patronage from the lay patron to the presbytery.

However extravagant this proposition may appear to be, it is necessarily included in the argument for the defenders. If the presbytery may agree not to receive or to act upon a presentation, because a majority of heads of families dissent, why may they not do so because a majority do not assent at a meeting held for that purpose, which is election, or because a majority of the presbytery do not assent, which is in effect the usurpation attempted in 1596 and 1638? In all these cases the violation and destruction of private civil rights would be effectual, because the only remedy, according to the argument, would be by application to the authors of the wrong. Nothing can be farther from my wishes than to treat lightly the opinions which have been expressed by any of the very learned and able judges [341] who dissented from the judgment of the Court of Session, but it is impossible to do justice to the case without following out these opinions to what appear to me to be their inevitable results.

Those who contend that there is no remedy for the wrong which has been committed in any existing law, suggest that redress can be obtained only by application to parliament. But if the right be already established by statute, and if the wrong consist in a violation of the right so resting upon the authority of parliament, it is not easy to conceive in what manner parliament may be able hereafter with more success to secure the objects of its enactments; certainly not without a more direct and important interference with the powers legislative and judicial claimed by the assembly than the judgment of the Court of Session can be supposed to effect.

It is said, however, that the legislative power claimed for the assembly has itself the authority of parliament as its foundation, because the statute of 1567, c. 7, after giving, to the patron who presents a person qualified to his understanding to the superintendent of the kirk, an appeal to the superintendent of the province, and from him to the general assembly if the person presented be not received and admitted, declares that the cause, being decided by the court of assembly, shall take end as they decern and declare. That which is the subject matter of appeal is to take end by the decision of the general assembly. What that subject matter is appears from the earlier parts of the statute, namely, the examination of the person presented, qualified according to the understanding of the patron. As to his qualification and his subsequent admission, a duty is to be performed after taking the presentee upon his trials, and which can have [342] no reference to a rejection of him, not for want of any qualifications, but by the dissent of an authority interposed to the prejudice of the patronage, which it was the object of that act to protect. It is not disputed that as to matter of qualification, which is submitted to the decision of the church, the judgment of the assembly upon appeal is final. It has also been suggested that the provisions in the act of 1592, that the presbytery are to "put order to all matters and causes ecclesiastical according to the discipline of the kirk," amounts to a direct committal of all ecclesiastical affairs, and amongst those every thing connected with the admission and collation of ministers, to the exclusive jurisdiction of the church courts. But in this suggestion the proviso which immediately follows is overlooked, which provides that "the aforesaid presbytery be bound and astricted to receive and admit quhat-sumever qualified minister presented by His Majesty or laick patrons;" by which it is clear that the presentation was not a matter ecclesiastical as to which the presbytery were to put order, but that they were to be bound to receive and admit a qualified person presented to them, whatever order they might put to any matters or causes ecclesiastical. This act, so far from authorizing the presbytery to make regulations interfering with the right of patronage, prohibits them from doing so.

It was urged that many acts of the church have been acquiesced in, in regulating the qualifications of ministers as to education, knowledge, and other matters, and this is true; but all these concern the personal qualifications of the presentee, to be judged of by the presbytery upon the trials, leaving the right of presenting a qualified person untouched. The statutes give to the patron the [343] right of presentation, and to the church the power and duty of adjudicating upon the qualification of the presentee. The act of 1834 introduces a new authority, which destroys both; the dissenting majority, defeats the presentation of the patron, and prevents the adjudication of the presbytery. If, then, the civil right of presentation has been invaded by the proceedings of the presbytery founded upon the act of 1834, and if the statutes have not deprived the civil courts of the ordinary power of giving redress for invasion of civil rights, it will require strong authority to show that the Court of Session has not jurisdiction to take cognizance of this complaint, which is this: that the patron having by law and statutes a right to present a qualified person to the presbytery, who are by statute bound to receive and admit him, unless found upon examination by them not to be qualified, the presbytery have refused to receive and admit him without any examination or adjudication as to his qualifications; that is, they have refused without any justifiable reason to give effect to the presentation. Now, I understand it to be admitted, that if the presbytery were simply to refuse to receive or to act upon a presentation, or if they were proceeding to present themselves jure devoluto before the proper time had arrived, the Court of Session would have jurisdiction to interfere. In all these cases there is the same injury inflicted by the same act, namely, the refusal to give effect to the presentation, and as the cases only differ as to the grounds of the refusal, which are in all assumed to be untenable, it seems extraordinary that there should be jurisdiction in some of the cases and not in all. It is extraordinary, certainly, when the long-protracted struggles are considered between the patron and the church, that [344] so few cases are to be found in which the interposition of the Court of Session has been applied for, but such cases as have been produced appear to me to be very decisive upon the question of jurisdiction.

In the Auchtermuchty case (Mor. 9909), in 1733, the presbytery had rejected a person presented by a lawful patron without examination, and were proceeding to admit another; this was affirmed upon appeal to the assembly. The rejected presentee applied to the Court of Session by advocacy, that the settlement should be stopped until the right was decided; the Court sisted the proceedings, but the presbytery having proceeded, a petition and complaint were presented against them, when certain of their number appeared at the bar and apologized. The presbytery admitted the person not presented, and the cause having proceeded, an interlocutor was pronounced, "finding that the presbytery, refusing a presentation duly tendered in favour of a qualified minister, against whom there lies no legal objection, and admitting another person, the patron has a right to retain the stipend, and, therefore, finding the reasons of suspension relevant."

Many of the arguments urged in this case were used in that; but the result was, that before the wrong minister was admitted, the Court of Session acted against the presbytery by sisting their proceedings; but after he was admitted the remedy applied was necessarily confined to the stipend. Under both circumstances the Court exercised its jurisdiction.

In the case of Dunse (Mor. 9911), in 1749, the presbytery, disputing the patron's title, rejected his presentee without [345] any adjudication upon his qualification. The patron insisted in a process of declarator against the presbytery in the Court of Session, which by its interlocutor, declared that the pursuer had a sufficient right to present, and that the right had not fallen to the presbytery tantum jure devoluto. This interlocutor was reversed in this House, but for want of parties only, and in terms, without any judgment upon the merits. It is said, that the court refused to interfere to prevent the presbytery settling any other person, because that was interfering with the power of ordination, and the internal policy of the church, with which the lords thought they had nothing to do. Whether this be correct seems doubtful, but the case is at all events an authority of the Court of Session in a process of declarator establishing the right of the patron to present against the presbytery.

In the case of Culross (Mor. 9951), the presbytery rejected the patron's presentee, disputing his title, and settled another minister. The patron instituted proceedings for the stipend and succeeded, but the church being full the presbytery were not made parties, so that this case does not bear much upon the present.

In the case of Lanark (Mor. 9954), in 1752, the Court of Session, finding that the presbytery had admitted the wrong person, adjudged the stipend to the patron of the rejected presentee. In that case also the presbytery were not parties.

But in both the Kiltarlity cases (1 Sh. and B. 363, or 340, new edit., and 2 S. and D. 384, or 341, new edit.), the presbyteries were parties. The first was a case of suspension and inter-[346]-dict at the instance of certain parishioners to prohibit the settlement of a presentee. Two grounds of defence were pleaded: first, that it was incompetent by suspension and interdict to interfere with the proceedings of the presbytery in the settlement of a minister; and second, that the pursuer had no title to pursue. The court repelled the objection to the competency, as the question regarded the civil right of patronage, but decided in favour of the second defence.

In the second case of Kiltarlity the presbytery, having sustained a presentation, was held to be barred from objecting to it, and refusing to proceed to settle the presentee. This case also affords an answer to an argument much urged on behalf of the presbytery: that, as they had received the presentation, all that remained was purely ecclesiastical, whereas it appears from their proceedings that they avoided sustaining the presentation. They only in so far sustained it as to find themselves competent to appoint a day for moderating in the call; if they had sustained the presentation they would, according to the second Kiltarlity case, have been barred from refusing to proceed to settle the presentee. There has, therefore, been a refusal to sustain the presentation, which brings this case precisely within the others referred to, in which the presbyteries have been parties.

In the case of Lord Dundas (Mor. 9972) v. the Presbytery of Zetland and Gray, the presbytery rejected a presentation of the presentee of the patron, and settled another minister. The court decided in the terms of the declaratory conclusions, which were, that the presbytery [347] which had illegally rejected the presentation should give due obedience to it, according to the rules of the church.

In the cases of the Presbytery of Falkirk v. Lord Callander (Mor. 9961), 8th December 1696, the Presbytery of Ayr v. Lord Dundonald (Mor. 9961), the Presbytery of Paisley v. Erskine (Mor. 9966), and the Presbytery of Strathbogie v. Sir Wm. Forbes (Mor. 9972), those were all actions brought by presbyteries against patrons, to have it declared that the right of presentation had devolved to them jure devoluto. It is admitted that if the presbytery assumes the jus devolutum when the patron thinks it has not fallen, he has a remedy in the civil courts, and that in all cases of disputed patronage and of stipend the court has jurisdiction. From these authorities it is clear that the Court of Session has jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the right of patronage, and to correct any infringement of it as against another claiming adversely, and against the presbytery, whether claiming adversely jure devoluto, or simply rejecting without cause the presentee of the patron, as in the cases of Auchtermuchty, of Dunse, of Kiltarlity and Zetland, and the other cases referred to.

It is admitted that the court has jurisdiction as to the stipend after the admission of a minister by wrong. It would be strange if the jurisdiction could be exercised only after the evil had been completed, when the Court has jurisdiction to prevent it;—that it has jurisdiction when a wrong minister is admitted, but not when the right minister is rejected.

It appears to me for these reasons, that in this case a civil right has been violated by the presbytery, and that [348] the court has jurisdiction to take cognizance of the injury committed. It remains to be considered, whether there be any thing objectionable in the form of the proceedings, or in the interlocutor appealed from.

It was much relied upon in the court below, but not so much insisted upon here, that the act of 1834 had not been properly put in issue by the pursuer; the summons states and complains of that which is the real grievance to the pursuer, that which constitutes the injury to his right of patronage, namely, that the presbytery rejected his presentee without trial or taking cognizance of his qualifications, and expressly on the ground of the veto of the parishioners.

The act of 1834 constitutes no part of the pursuers case, and cannot justify the proceedings of the presbytery according to the case made in the summons; and if by law it does justify their proceedings, it is properly left to be brought forward by the defenders who rely upon it as consequential upon the case so stated. The summons prays a declaration of the plaintiff's right, and of the wrong which he alleges has been done to it, and certain specific relief as a remedy or compensation for such alleged wrong. It is not disputed that it is competent for the court upon a summons having petitory conclusions to confine its interlocutor to a declaration of right. That is what the interlocutor appealed from has done. The cases prove that when the presbytery has illegally rejected a presentee, the Court of Session exercises jurisdiction against the presbytery. What relief may ultimately be administered to the patron in that or in any other suit is not now the subject for consideration. If the court has jurisdiction over the subject matter, and over the parties defenders, it is clearly [349] according to its practice to declare by its interlocutor the right of the pursuers without proceeding to administer any remedy for the wrong it has sustained.

The result of the anxious consideration I have given to this case is the conviction, that the presbytery in the course they have pursued have violated and done wrong and injury to the patron's right of presentation, that the Court of Session have jurisdiction to take cognizance of that wrong, and that in the interlocutor they have pronounced there is no departure from the ordinary mode of exercising their jurisdiction, of which the defenders are entitled to complain.

In forming the opinions I have now expressed, I have confined myself to the questions of law which arise upon the pleadings between the parties. Such is the duty which I felt I had to perform as one of the judges of this the highest tribunal in the country. I have in doing this had no regard to the feelings which this controversy has excited in Scotland, and I have not permitted myself to consider the consequences which may follow from the judgment of this House, on whichever side it may be given. But having now discharged the duty of delivering my opinion upon the matter in contest, I may, before I conclude, be permitted to express the high respect I have always felt for the clergy of Scotland. Much as has been said in their praise, I am satisfied that they deserve it all; and that the parochial duties are in general performed in a manner the most exemplary and beneficial for the inhabitants.

If there be any feeling in the church still remaining that the exercise of private patronage is detrimental to the well-being of the establishment, and that it tends [350] to diminish its usefulness to the people, let it be remembered that the high character the clergy have attained, and the beneficial influence the church has exercised, have arisen, or at least been matured, under a system of lay patronage.

If your Lordships shall concur in the opinions I have expressed, and by your decision inform the clergy of Scotland what the law really is, I cannot doubt but that they will by their conduct and example inculcate the sacred principle of obedience to the law, of respect for the rights and interests of others, and of the sacrifice of private feelings to the performance of a public duty.

I again move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed. Lord Brougham.—In again calling your Lordships' attention to this case, I have only to state the great satisfaction which I feel, in finding that my noble and learned friend's view of the subject, and the grounds of his opinion,—an opinion which we have separately come to together,—are precisely the same which had presented themselves to my mind after the anxious attention that I bestowed upon this case. But I should not have troubled your Lordships with one word at present, except from the circumstance of my not having taken the precaution, which my learned friend has most properly done, of committing to writing my argument in giving judgment. The reason is not that I have at all altered my opinion of the great expediency, and in important cases almost the necessity, of pursuing this course which my learned friend observes I always did when I filled the situation, which he now much more worthily fills, in [351] the Court of Chancery, and which I have done also here and at the Privy Council. My opinion is precisely the same as it always was, of the expediency of pursuing that course. My only reason for deviating from it in the present case is, that I had not time, and, therefore, in the choice of difficulties, I thought it better to state my opinion without writing, than to delay the judgment so long as would have been necessary to enable me to commit it to writing. My Lords, had I done so, I undoubtedly should not have omitted a part of the subject to which my noble and learned friend has very properly directed your attention in the close of his judgment, that is, to the question of pleading. It is fit that I should now say that that had not escaped me, though it did escape me yesterday. I quite agree with my noble and learned friend that the pleading is correct in this case, and that it was not at all necessary to plead the act of 1834 of the general assembly. The argument which would maintain the necessity of pleading the act of the general assembly, at least if there is any similarity in the rules of pleading in Scotland to our rules, would be a complete abandonment of the legislative power of the general assembly; for if they had any power to make laws, nothing like good pleading would require the pleading of those upon the record. But, however, upon another ground, I agree, that it is not at all necessary. I equally agree that the judgment of the Court below upon the declaratory part of the summons is right.

Judgment affirmed.

[353] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

RICHARD ALEXANDER and Others, Appellants.*—Sir F. Pollock—Tinney; Colonel C. S. MACALISTER and Others (Caledonian Dairy Company Directors), Respondents.—Knight Bruce—Pemberton [7th May 1839].

Partnership—Joint Stock Company—Contract.—In an action by directors of a joint stock company against the other solvent partners, for relief of advances and obligations by the directors personally in the management of the affairs of the copartnery, Held, upon construing the contract of copartnership, (affirming the interlocutors of the Court of Session,) that the following defences ought to be repelled; (1.) that the partners were only liable, inter se, to the amount of the sums severally subscribed by them for and as their shares in the said copartnership; (2.) that the directors had no right to begin business, and no power to bind the partners for any debts or obligations on behalf of the said company, till the whole stipulated capital had been subscribed for and secured; and (3.) that the powers of the directors to borrow money on the responsibility of the company and the partners were restrained.

Practice.—Held that the Court may, before exhausting the whole pleas of the parties, lay down certain principles, by declaratory findings, which shall regulate the future proceedings in a cause, and be the foundation of ulterior findings, the consideration of which may be reserved.

[354] In the year 1824 the respondents were among the original projectors of a scheme, and issued a prospectus, for the establishment of a joint stock company for supplying the inhabitants of Edinburgh with milk and other dairy produce; the capital stock of the company was to be £50,000, to be raised by subscription, and divided into shares of £25 each. The committee of management purchased the lands of Wheatfield near Edinburgh for £12,000. "A meeting of subscribers" was held on the 2d February 1825, at which directors were named, and resolutions passed, so as to constitute the company, the capital of which it was resolved should be £50,000, divided into 2000 shares of £25 each. The directors were authorized to complete the purchase of the land requisite for the undertaking, and to erect suitable accommodations. A report read by the committee set forth, that the whole capital had been subscribed for; and the thanks of the meeting were voted to the committee for the purchase of Wheatfield. The secretary was directed to prepare a deed of copartnery. The lands of Meadowbank and an adjoining piece of land were soon afterwards purchased for £9700.

Thereafter a contract of copartnery was settled and approved of by the directors. By the first article it was declared, that the copartnership should be held to have commenced from and after the 28th January 1825; and it was further declared, that the subscribers should "have right to the profits, and be liable for the losses, arising from or upon the said business, and should be bound to relieve each other of all the debts and engagements of the company, but that only to the extent of and in proportion to their respective shares therein."

[355] By the second article it was provided, that the subscribers should have "right to the profits and be liable for the losses of said business, and should be bound to relieve each other of all the debts and engagements of the company, in the proportion of their respective interests or shares in the capital stock."

By the fifth article it was declared, that nine ordinary directors should be chosen; and that as certain gentlemen named formed the interim committee of management, and as it would require some time to arrange completely the details of the management, and agreeably to the resolution and minute of the general meeting of shareholders, of date the second day of February last, it was thereby declared, that William Trotter, Esquire, etc. should be nominated and appointed directors of the concern, and should continue in that office from the date of the contract, and for two years from and after the last Monday of May thereafter.

It was provided by the eighth article, "that the whole account books, papers, letters of correspondence, and other writings relative to the business of the company shall at all times be open to the directors and superintending committee and members thereof respectively, but to no other members of the company, unless ordered by the annual general meeting; and also that the directors shall have full power to make the purchase of land, ground, or other premises which they shall deem necessary for the concern, and are hereby authorized to complete and carry into effect the purchases made of the lands of Wheatfield and Meadowbank, and to take all requisite measures for the erection of suitable accom-[356]modations for the dairy establishment, and to enter into all contracts or deeds necessary in the concerns of the company, and otherwise to carry into effect and execution the objects of the company, and to take all such steps as to them may seem expedient and beneficial in forwarding the prosperity of the establishment; and according to their sound discretion, to dispose of the lands of Wheatfield, or feu them; and also to feu such parts of Meadowbank, from time to time, as they think proper;" and further, "that the power of the directors, in the above mentioned and all other particulars, shall be subject to such limitation, extension, or alteration as a general meeting shall think fit; all which acts of administration shall be effectually binding and obligatory upon the company, and whole individual partners thereof; that it shall be in the power of the directors to borrow money, on the credit and security of the company, to the extent of three thousand pounds sterling, which they are hereby empowered to do, by way of cash account with some bank or banking company, provided there is stock of the company subscribed for and unpaid to that amount."

It was provided by the ninth article, "that the sums effeiring to the number of shares subscribed by the members of the said company respectively shall be advanced and paid in such instalments as the directors shall see proper to call for, and that in such mode, and at such times, and to such amount as they shall think proper, upon premonition of one month before the term of payment being given to the subscribers respectively, by letter addressed to each [357] of them, signed by the secretary and put into the general post office of Edinburgh, with legal interest of such part of said share so called for from the date fixed for payment, and until payment thereof is made; and in no event shall it be in the power of the directors to call upon the partners for a sum beyond that subscribed for by them respectively."

By the eighteenth article it was provided, "that a stated account, made out from the books of the company, and subscribed by the accountant and secretary, shall in all cases be sufficient to ascertain and constitute a balance and charge against a partner of the company, and no suspension shall pass of a charge so constituted, but upon consignment only."

The twentieth article declared, "that the directors shall not be liable for omissions, nor for the sufficiency or responsibility of securities or property on which they may lend out or otherwise invest the funds of the company, nor for the actions or intromissions of the manager, banker, clerks, or accountant, or any other officers or agents of the company, or any other persons intrusted with the business of the company, nor shall they be liable in solidum nor pro rata for one another, but each only for his own actual intromissions."

And the twenty-first article requires, "that each of the partners shall assign to the company, and the directors thereof for the time being, his own particular share and profits of the concern, in security of the debts and engagements of the company."

It is provided by the twenty-third article, "that previous to the last Monday of May eighteen hundred and twenty-six, on which day the general annual [358] meeting of the stockholders is to be held, and in every year thereafter, the books of the company shall be balanced, and a statement or abstract of the company's affairs shall, under the inspection of the directors and auditors, be made up and signed by the accountant of the company and secretary; and no transfer of the stock shall be admitted or entered in the books of the company for three weeks previous to the said last Monday in May, nor till eight days thereafter, yearly; and the directors, or their accountant or secretary, shall be obliged to lay upon the table, at the said general meeting to be held upon the said last Monday of May yearly, the said statement or abstract, for the inspection of the partners present, the substance whereof shall be stated at the said court by the chairman or preses; and the said statement or abstract shall lie at the office of the secretary, open for the inspection of any of the partners, for the space of one calendar month subsequent to the said last Monday of May."

Thereafter the contract was subscribed by shareholders, to the extent of £20,000. The directors, while it was in the course of subscription, took measures for the erection of the necessary buildings, the contract price being about £5400, though they ultimately cost about £9000.

There having been a previous call of five per cent., a call of ten per cent. was made upon the shareholders in June 1825, and another call to the like extent in July following, but the calls were only partially paid; the sum thereby realized was inadequate to meet the engagements of the directors, and they borrowed money to pay the price of the lands purchased and for the [359] current expenses, partly on their own individual security and partly by heritable bond over Meadowbank, by some of their number as trustees for the company.

The first general annual meeting of the proprietors of the company took place on the 29th of May 1826, and was attended by the principal shareholders, including the directors. A report was submitted by the directors, and approved of, containing a full statement of the affairs of the company up to that date, and of the various arrangements which had been made for the completion of the purchases of the several heritable properties, the nature and terms of the building contracts into which they had entered for the erection of the premises at Meadowbank, and the state of progress of these buildings, which were then almost completed. The directors also explained, that "although names were put down for 2032 shares, amounting in sterling money to £50,800, of which the directors allocated 2000 shares, yet the contract was only signed by proprietors to the amount of 806 shares, being £20,150." The report set forth the difficulties which the directors had experienced in carrying through the different pecuniary and other arrangements, from the delay on the part of many of the subscribers in paying up their instalments.

The meeting authorized these directors "to adopt such farther measures, from time to time, as they may consider necessary for promoting the prosperity of the concern."

The affairs of the company became more involved, and the management more difficult, the subscribing partners declining to pay their different calls on the subscribed capital. The directors had to raise money [360] and make advances on their personal security. Annual general meetings were held in 1827, 1828, and 1829, at which the partners present (consisting always of the quorum required by the deed of copartnery) approved of reports on the state of the affairs.

At a general meeting in 1830 it was resolved to wind up the affairs of the company. It appeared from the reports on the affairs of the company, prepared by a juridical accountant, that "a total loss has arisen on the concern, as at 31st May 1834, of £36,685 19s. 2½d., and after deduction of the amount of calls on the partners received and applied (extending to £15,068 2s. 10½d.), there remains a deficiency beyond the recovered capital, and the estimated property and funds of the company, of £21,617 16s. 3½d.;" that almost the whole of the above-mentioned loss had arisen from the fall in value of the heritable properties and buildings below their original cost, joined to the loss of interest on the prices, and the expense of titles and securities arising out of the purchase of those properties. The directors, or those in whose right they now stand, had made large advances from their own private funds, for the purpose of liquidating the debts and obligations of the company. The total amount of the outstanding debts of the company, in so far as the same had been ascertained, including the advances made by the directors, and advances by certain other of the partners, for the company's behoof, and in extinction of its obligations, was then £24,504 10s. 3½d.

The defenders (appellants) who, besides the respondents, were the remaining solvent partners of the copartnery, having refused to contribute, with a view to make up this deficiency, an action was raised against [361] them in the Court of Session.

It proceeded in the name of the pursuers (respondents), "all directors and individual partners of the Caledonian Dairy Company," some of whom were also designed "as trustees nominated by the directors of the said company, and vested with the heritable property thereof, with consent and concurrence of Carlyle Bell and Alexander Cuninghame, Esquires, writers to the signet, as vested, in manner after mentioned, with the right to the debts and obligations after referred to." The summons then recited the establishment of the company,—the provisions of the contract,—the nature and extent of the business carried on,—the mode of management,—the final winding up, and the ultimate loss and bankruptcy of the concern; and after setting forth that some of the bonds have been assigned to Messrs. Bell and Cuninghame, though paid from the funds belonging to the respondents, and that the greater portion of the remainder consists of advances made by them on behalf of the company, it concluded, that the appellants should be "decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuers, conformable to the amount of their advances respectively, of the rateable proportions, corresponding to the respective shares of stock held by the said defenders, of the sum of £15,000, or of such other sum as shall be ascertained; in the course of the process to follow hereon, to be the amount of the advances by the pursuers respectively, on behalf of the said company, towards extinction of its debts and obligations, according as the rateable proportions thereof, falling on the defenders, shall be ascertained in the course of [362] the said process, together with the legal interest of said proportions from the respective dates of advance, and in time coming, during the not-payment: Further, the said defenders ought and should be severally decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuers of the rateable proportions effeiring to the defenders, according to their said respective shares of stock, of the sum of £20,000, or of such other sum as shall be ascertained, in the course of the process to follow hereon, to be the amount of the outstanding debts and obligations still due by the said company, as well as of any further claims that may yet emerge, and of all costs and expenses which may hereafter be incurred in finally winding up the said concern, as the same shall be severally ascertained in the course of the said process, in order that the pursuers may operate their relief from the said debts, obligations, and expenses, by applying the said rateable proportions thereof due by the defenders, along with their own proportion, in extinction of the same."

There were also conclusions for having it found that the appellants, in the event of any of their number becoming insolvent, should be liable rateably for any deficiency thereby occasioned; and there were also additional subsidiary conclusions with reference to the ultimate winding up of the concern.

In defence it was pleaded, 1st, that the liability of each partner was limited to the amount of the shares subscribed for; 2d, that the debts concluded for were contracted by means of loans and obligations entered into in violation of the contract, particularly the eighth article, and on the personal responsibility of the respon-[363]-dents individually; 3d, that the claim of the respondents was barred, in respect that they proceeded to carry on the business after they knew that the capital was not half filled up, without communicating that fact to the partners; and 4th, that it was barred, in respect that the whole losses had arisen from their own violation of the contract, their concealment and misrepresentation, and from their gross negligence and misconduct in the management of the company's affairs.

A record having been prepared, parties were heard before Lord Jeffrey, as Ordinary, who (6th December 1836) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties very fully, on the closed record and whole process, and made avizandum, repels the defence founded on the clause (or clauses) in the contract of copartnership, alleged by the defenders to import an absolute limitation of the liabilities of the partners inter se to the amount of the sums severally subscribed by them for and as their shares in the said copartnership; repels also the defence founded on the allegation that the pursuers or directors of the said company had no right to begin business, and no power to bind the partners for any debts or obligations on behalf of the said company, till the whole capital of £50,000 had been subscribed for and secured; and farther, repels the defence founded on the clause or provisions of the contract by which the defenders allege that the powers of the directors to borrow money on the responsibility of the company and the partners thereof were restrained; and, before farther answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may [364] explain in what way the cases of the several defenders are or may be affected by this deliverance, what findings or decernitures may be required to apply it to their several cases, and what farther determinations may be necessary to exhaust the cause as to the said several defenders, or any of them."

To this interlocutor his Lordship added the subjoined note, explanatory of the grounds of his opinion.*

* "The first of the above-mentioned defences appeared to be that chiefly relied on. It was rested mainly on the provision in the close of the first article of the contract, 'that the partners should be bound to relieve each other of the debts and engagements of the company only to the extent of and in proportion to their respective shares therein,' and partly upon passages in the 8th, 9th, and 13th articles, which were said to confirm the construction put by the defenders on this first provision. According to that construction, this provision was specially intended to protect the body of partners from the consequences of overtrading, or rash and imprudent dealings, on the part of the directors, and was equivalent to an injunction that they should at no time put more than the subscribed capital at hazard, under pain of being made personally answerable, and without relief, for the consequences of any more extensive speculations. Now, if any thing be clear in this case, the Lord Ordinary takes it to be, that this limitation of the provision to the case of directors having occasion for relief is totally inadmissible. It is in express terms a provision limiting the right of relief of all the partners, as against each other. The case of directors is not once named or alluded to in any part of the article; and it is not less, but more, extravagant to say that it applies exclusively to them, than it would be to say that they alone were exempted from its operations. If it had really been intended to impose such a restriction upon the powers of the directors to bind the company, it is inconceivable that the parties should have introduced it into this first article, which merely sets forth the universal and common-law rights and liabilities of the partners, instead of bringing it in as a limitation of the great general powers given to those directors by article 8, which does contain a special limitation as to borrowing, or as a qualification of the great immunities conferred on them by article 21.

"If the true meaning and effect of the restraining words now cited be therefore as the defenders contend, it necessarily follows that no one partner of the company who has been obliged by a creditor to pay any of its debts or engagements, or who is distressed by such a creditor, will be entitled to any relief from the other partners, beyond the amount which may remain unpaid upon the subscribed capital of each, and if all have paid up their whole subscriptions he will be entitled to no relief at all. Now the first question is, whether it is conceivable that so monstrous and unjust a provision could be intended, or could by possibility be admitted to have effect? The Lord Ordinary has never been able to get over this, and thinks that any construction of which the words are at all susceptible must be preferred to one which would lead to such a consequence.

"The defenders, indeed, endeavour to show that the consequences would all fall back upon the directors; and that if it was right that they should not trade beyond their capital, except at their own peril, there would be no harm in denying, even to an innocent partner, who might be subjected in the consequences of their so overtrading, all relief as against the other innocent partners, seeing, they said, that he might still have relief against the rash directors themselves; but this is evidently altogether fallacious. Take, first, the most favourable case for the defenders; assume, contrary to the fact, that the directors would do wrong in trading beyond the capital, and suppose that a private partner, having no concern with the management, is obliged to pay a debt so contracted, is there any justice or common sense in saying that he shall not be relieved by the other partners, who were equally liable to such distress? or, under the words relied on, would be enabled to claim relief from the directors who overtraded? Those directors are not liable for each other. The individuals who subjected the concern to the debt may be all insolvent, and the whole subscribed capital may have been long ago paid up. Then the directors are all necessarily partners; and it is not easy to see how they should not have the benefit of the provision in question as well as the others. There is confessedly no provision, nor any thing like a provision, in the contract, that the individual directors who overtrade shall be bound to relieve the partners who may be consequently distressed by the company creditors; and what the defenders seem to go on, in this attempt to escape from the result of their construction, is really nothing more than some vague notion of equity, and an assumed common-law liability of the directors, to an award of damages and reparation as the penalty of their so overtrading. In any ordinary case, however, there would plainly be no such liability; and in the cases most likely to occur there would be no shadow even of equity in seeking to subject them to such a penalty. There is, in point of fact, it must always be remembered, no declaration in the contract that no engagement shall ever be entered into beyond the subscribed capital. Now, suppose the whole of that capital paid up, and yielding great profits, under an admirable system of management, and that the directors, in order to increase those profits, contract for 100 more cows, and a corresponding range of new cow-houses, could it ever be said that this was a malversation, for which, in the event of any ultimate miscarriage, they could be made liable at common law in their own persons, and without relief from their partners? And if there would plainly be no such liability at common law, how is it possible to construe or spell it out of a provision in the contract which makes no distinction between directors and other partners; and instead of imposing any extraordinary liability on its members, consists wholly in a declaration (as the defenders at least allege) that they shall all be freed from the common and natural liability of partners.

"But the radical fallacy of the defenders' attempt to palliate the revolting consequences of their doctrine is that it is not true, in point of fact, that engagements which cannot be answered by the subscribed capital of the company must necessarily have been contracted by overtrading on the part of the directors; and that it is, on the contrary, undeniable, that cases must continually occur in which the natural right of partners to be rateably relieved of company debts by each other would be most unjustly cut off by that interpretation, while there was not the least pretext for recurring on the directors, or any one else, for reparation. Suppose the whole capital paid up and yielding a large profit, and the directors resolved, notwithstanding, to incur no new expense beyond the amount of the said capital actually in their hands. Suppose that the final call on the partners had recently yielded £10,000, and that this sum was deposited in a bank, and that on the faith of this they had contracted for £2000 worth of cows, and £5000 worth of new buildings, these undoubtedly would be engagements within their powers, and the line of their duty, even according to the rigid and imaginary restriction of the defenders. But suppose the bank to fail, the cows to die of distemper, the houses to be destroyed by fire, and the whole concern to be broken up before the prices of these articles were paid, and then suppose that the sellers and contractors should sue an individual partner for those company debts, and obtain decreet against him, could it be seriously maintained that he should have no relief whatever against his partners, but be obliged to pay £7000 of company debts out of his own pocket, from the mere accident of his having been selected by a company creditor in preference to all or any of those who were equally liable to their diligence? Yet, if the defenders' reading of the provision in question is the right one, this would be the inevitable consequence. The partners are only to relieve each other to the extent of their subscribed capital still unpaid; but in the supposed case it is all paid, and the debts having been contracted when there was abundant capital in the hands of the directors to answer them, even the shallow pretext of handing him over to them for indemnity would be excluded. It is needless, indeed, to go to such an extreme case as has now been supposed, for the purpose of testing the doctrine of the defenders, since, unless it be held that no company is to contract any debts or engagements after its subscribed capital is paid up, however ample the stock in which that capital has been invested may be to answer them at the time, it is obvious that

Alexander and others appealed.

[369] Appellants.—1. The action was ill-founded, because in a question inter socios the appellants could only be [370] made liable to the extent of the shares for which they originally subscribed, in respect of the express stipulations to that effect in the written contract.

unavoidable misfortunes may reduce the creditors to the necessity of coming on individual partners for satisfaction, and that the most unheard-of injustice must be done, if they were to be excluded from all claim of relief on their associates.

“The Lord Ordinary is satisfied, therefore, that this cannot be the meaning and effect of the provision relied on by the defenders; and the next question therefore is, what then is its meaning, and how are the words of it to be satisfied? These words, no doubt are awkward and ill assorted, but to him he will confess that they seem of very little importance; the whole passage from the word ‘declaring,’ in the first line of the page, to the end of the article, being, in his opinion, little more than an idle amplification of the elementary principle of all copartnerships, and which would be implied, though not once mentioned in the contract, viz., that the partners should share profit and loss according to their interest in the concern, the words, ‘but only to the extent of and in proportion to their shares therein,’ being merely a clumsy and tautological way of expressing a proportional liability, and which, with a slight variance, might have been more clearly worded as follows:—‘but each only to an extent proportional to his share in the stock of the said company.’

“But though the Lord Ordinary inclines strongly to think this, and no more, the true meaning of the words in question, he conceives that the peculiar form of expression may be explained by one or two suppositions equally inconsistent with the views of the defenders, and either of them far preferable to their interpretation. The clause, it will be observed, sets out with declaring generally, and without qualification, that the partners ‘shall have right to the profits, and be liable to the losses, arising upon the said business;’ and it is only after having made this separate and absolute provision that it proceeds to say, ‘and shall be bound to relieve each other of the debts and engagements of the company, but only to the extent of and in proportion to their shares.’ Now, the Lord Ordinary would suggest, that the debts and engagements of the company, thus contradistinguished from its losses, may have been meant of such debts and engagements only as might be satisfied without loss to the company, as being within the amount of the unpaid-up shares of the several partners; and that the limitation meant no more than this, that when any individual partner was distressed for debts of this description, he was to be entitled to proportional and total relief from the rest, but to the extent only of those unpaid shares, by means of which the matter might, in such a case, be settled without any sacrifice of the funds actually in the hands of the company, and vested in its business, and consequently without giving occasion to any thing that could be entered as loss in the books of the concern. When the debts and engagements, however, exceeded the amount of unpaid shares, they necessarily fell upon the input or vested stock (or its profits), and thus passed into the separate head of losses, for which, by the preceding part of the clause, the whole partners are made liable absolutely, and without any limitation.

“If this, however, be the just view of the provision, it is certain that the pursuers are entitled to judgment, the whole sums for which they now call on the defenders being either truly and literally losses, or debts and engagements, which remain after all the subscribed stock has been applied towards their liquidation.

“The second supposition (which is not inconsistent with the preceding), by which a just and reasonable meaning may be given to the words in dispute, is, that they were intended not to cut off the inherent right of a distressed partner to equal relief from the others, but only to oblige him to seek it simultaneously and proportionally from them all; to deprive him, in short, of the power competent to an extraneous creditor of the company, of selecting one or a few to bear the common burden, and to make it necessary at once to convene the whole, and to come against each only to the extent of the proportion indicated by the amount of his share in the concern. This, it is conceived, was a proper and laudable object, and will fully explain and satisfy the words of the provision in question.

“Understood in this sense, too, it has been carefully attended to by the pursuers in framing their summons, the conclusions being directed against the whole solvent

[371] The contract was framed on the basis that the partners were not to be liable under any circumstances [372] beyond the amount of the capital stock subscribed for by them respectively. Whether reference be had to [373] the provision which expressly declares, that their liability shall be limited "to the extent of and in pro-partners of the company, and only for their rateable and proportional shares of the sums demanded.

"If the case had admitted of no other solution the Lord Ordinary would have adopted either of these constructions in preference to that of the defenders, and indeed he is strongly inclined to the views on which the last of them is founded; but he has already stated that he considers both as unnecessary, and is satisfied on 'the whole that the words so much relied on are mere surplusage, and mean nothing more than what was already expressed, and would indeed have been implied if the whole clause had been omitted. One main reason for this opinion is derived from the tenor of that part of the second head or article of the contract, in which the whole of the passage already referred to in the first article is carefully repeated, with one or two slight verbal changes, and the remarkable omission of the words 'but only to the extent of,' on which the whole case of the defenders depends. From the words 'bind and oblige,' in the fourth line of this second article, to 'shares of the capital stock,' in the ninth line, the whole is a literal transcript of the passage in the first article, including the obligation of relief, of which so much has been said, and the material thing is, that this obligation of relief is expressed in the second edition, without any limitation, except that of being proportional to the interest in the stock. It now runs thus,— 'and shall be bound to relieve each other of all the debts and engagements of the company in the proportion of their respective interests or shares in the capital stock.' What was the object of this anxious iteration of a very unnecessary clause the parties have been unable to explain, and the Lord Ordinary does not pretend to understand. But as it is undeniable, that all the other slight variances of expression in the six lines so repeated do not make the least change in the sense or substance of the provision, so the utter omission of the words on which the defenders exclusively rely, affords a strong and almost conclusive reason for holding that this also was a variance by which the sense was not thought to be affected, and that the clear and indisputable meaning of the last edition of the words must also have been that of the first. If it was not, there is a palpable contradiction in these two consecutive clauses; and a contradiction which cannot be extricated or reconciled. By the one clause, the partners are bound to relieve each other only to the extent of and in proportion to their subscribed capital unpaid, and by the other they are bound to relieve each other in proportion to their interests in that subscribed capital. As to the meaning of the last there can be no doubt, and that meaning is entirely conformable to justice and common law. The former is in some measure ambiguous, and admits, as has been seen, of various interpretations; and, according to the defenders' construction, it is utterly repugnant to justice, and without example in practice. If it admitted of no other construction but this, one of the contradictory provisions must give way, and the Lord Ordinary conceives that it cannot be that which stands last in the deed, and is alone conformable to equity and general law. If it does admit of construction, however, there can be no better guide to the true meaning than the immediate subsequent clause, in which the whole matter is resumed, with direct reference to the specific capital, which had not been previously defined.

"If this leading defence is not maintainable on the first article of the contract taken by itself, it is plainly in vain to hope that it may be aided by any of the rest. The special restriction upon borrowing in the close of the eighth article will be noticed in reference to the last defence. But as to any bearing it may be supposed to have on the first, it is enough to observe,—1st, that it relates expressly to the directors, and not to partners generally; and 2d, that it would obviously have been unnecessary if the first article had imported what the defenders now allege.

"The ninth article again plainly relates exclusively to calls on the partners for the instalments of their subscribed capital, and to nothing else. It regulates in great detail the forms of such calls, and the subsequent proviso that the directors shall have no power thus to call for any sum beyond that subscribed, manifestly relates to such calls only, and not to actions of relief by partners distressed for company debts, or [374]-portion to " the shares subscribed for, or to those other clauses which no less unequivocally declare, that " in no event " shall calls be made upon the partners for sums beyond their subscribed capital, or which expressly debar the directors from borrowing money beyond the amount of subscribed capital, it appears very plain that seeking to equalize the burden of its losses, after its business is at an end. The proviso was probably unnecessary ; but it was apparently suggested by the loose wording of an earlier part of the same article, in which the directors are empowered to make their calls ' at such times and to such amount as they shall think proper.' In fact, it is precisely equivalent to a parenthesis like this after the word amount, ' (but never exceeding the sum subscribed by each such partner,)' which would have been a better way of expressing what might very well have been left to implication, and would obviously have afforded no room for the strained inference of the defenders.

" The only other article referred to in relation to this first defence was the 13th, and when fully considered, it appears to make strongly against the views of the defenders. It relates to the right of a partner allowed to retire, or to sell his shares, to be relieved of all antecedent debts, etc., of the company. It first provides, that ' he shall be entitled to relief of the whole of such debts,' and then the other partners ' bind and oblige themselves severally to relieve him in proportion to their shares, and to the extent of their liability herein-before expressed.' Now, at the very most, this merely falls back on the original definition or measure of liability, and tends in no way to limit or define it. But looking to the clear and unqualified right of the retiring partner to be at all events relieved of the whole debts and obligations, and considering that on the defender's view of this original liability, he could have no relief at all, in the very probable case of the whole subscribed capital being paid up, when the creditors came to him for payment, it seems obvious that this liability could not be so limited as they allege, without imputing to this provision the most manifest inconsistency, as well as the grossest injustice.

" With regard to the defence rested on the allegation that the directors had no right to begin business, or undertake engagements for the company, till the whole capital of £50,000 was subscribed, it is not necessary to consider, whether there might not be cases where such a ground of pleading might be admitted. It is enough, that it is clearly excluded by the circumstances of the present. In the first place, the contract, though only begun to be signed in April 1825, expressly provides, that the copartnership shall be held to have commenced in January preceding, and refers to and recognizes in various places (and particularly in articles 5 and 8), the proceedings of various meetings of directors in February and March preceding. In particular it declares (article 5), that the directors appointed by a meeting of the 2d February shall be continued in office for two full years, so as that no interruption should be given to the operations in which they were engaged. To the Lord Ordinary it appears that no party signing this contract can be allowed to pretend ignorance of what had been done or sanctioned at these previous meetings. But the matter is not left to implication, for, in the 8th article of the contract, deliberately subscribed by the defenders, the directors are in express terms empowered ' to complete and carry into effect the purchases made of the lands of Wheatfield and Meadowbank, and to take measures for the erection of suitable accommodation for the establishment, and to enter into all contracts and deeds necessary,' etc. Now, the lands of Wheatfield had been already bought for a price of £12,000, and the lands of Meadowbank for £9750 ; and yet the defenders, who all sign before any thing like the amount of these sums was subscribed, do instruct the directors, on their responsibility, to carry into effect those purchases, and to grant all necessary deeds for that purpose. It is quite in vain to say that partners who thus expressly recognized and adopted as acts of the company purchases made four months before, and when there was not one farthing of actual subscription, must be held (upon mere implication) to have meant that nothing further should be done till £50,000 had been actually collected ; and that when they directed buildings to be erected on the lands so purchased they had no notion of authorizing any contract being entered into for that purpose till this whole capital was secured. If they declared it right and laudable to lay out £20,000 when they had no capital at all, it is extravagant to say that they would have reprobated the idea of contracting for necessary buildings to the extent of £9000, when they had a sub-it was the meaning of all the subscribers to the contract, that their liability should be of this limited description. It might be very true, indeed, that a restricted liability of this nature could not be secured to the partners by means of the contract in any question with the public. A total immunity from loss could only be obtained by scribed capital of only £20,150. The directors accordingly entered immediately into such a contract, and the buildings were actually in progress before most of the defenders subscribed. The Lord Ordinary cannot think it doubtful that they were fully warranted in so doing, by the express terms of the contract already in part recited. But in this way the company was bound, by the express authority of the defenders and the other subscribers, and before a single subscription was realized, to the extent of more than £30,000, which was the true origin of the debts still owing, and in fact, with the other unavoidable expenses of the experiment thus authorized, the source of the whole losses which have been sustained.

"This alone might dispose of the defence, that the directors had no right to expose the partners to hazard, or to bind them in any obligation till the whole capital was subscribed. But there is another provision in the contract which is separately conclusive upon this head. This is the latter part of the second article, which expressly declares, that it 'shall be in the power of the directors to retain, for behoof of the company, such number of shares as they may think proper of the said capital stock, to be disposed of by them in such way as they may think best for the company.' Now, under this provision, it is plain that the directors might have retained, and for as long as they thought fit, any proportion of the 2000 shares into which the £50,000 of proposed capital was to be divided; and it would be palpably absurd to say, that they were not to begin business so long as any part of these was so retained. How, then, can it be pretended that, under this contract, they were not entitled to begin business till the whole 2000 shares were appropriated? And what practical difference would it have made, if they had, by an express minute, declared the 1300 shares which were actually undisposed of, had been retained in terms of this provision, for behoof of the concern? In point of substance and effect they were so retained, and as completely at the disposal of the company and its managers as if a minute to this effect had been formally engrossed in the books. That it was not so engrossed may be an impeachment of their book-keeping or accuracy in entering their transactions, but can never deprive them of the substantial power, under which they have really acted, or subject them to forfeitures as for breach of an imaginary interdict against entering on business till all the shares are actually taken by individual partners, in the very face of this express licence and permission to the contrary.

"The last defence disposed of by the preceding interlocutor, is that founded on the concluding part of the 8th article of the contract, by which the directors are empowered to borrow 'on the credit and security of the company,' to the extent of £3000, provided there is subscribed capital unpaid up to that amount at the time. This, though properly an empowering clause, is contended to import a prohibition to borrow, except on those conditions, and this prohibition, the defenders say, the directors have violated, by borrowing to a much larger extent, and when there was no such unpaid capital; and they maintain they cannot be called on to relieve them of the consequence of such borrowings.

"Now, the short answer to this is, that there have been no borrowings 'on the credit and security of the company,' to a greater extent than is permitted by the contract; that the greater part of the transactions complained of under that name consisted merely in granting new securities for debts previously existing, and recognized in the contract itself, and the remainder in raising money on the personal credit of individual partners or directors, and afterwards advancing it to pay off the most pressing of the existing debts of the company. According to the Lord Ordinary's impression, there is no one case in which money has been raised, directly or indirectly, on the company's account, in order to extend its business (the case evidently contemplated in the provision referred to), or for any other purpose than to satisfy the claims to which the company was liable from the very beginning, or which ought to have been defrayed by the withheld instalments on the subscribed capital. It is needless to go here into the details of those proceedings; but with the exception of the sums actually advanced for those purposes out of the private funds of individual charter or act of parliament. But it may be observed in passing, that the directors were authorized by the 37th section of the contract, "to apply for a royal charter of incorporation or for an act of parliament in favour of the company at any period they shall think proper." Hence, it appears that it had been contemplated by all parties that application should be made for a charter of incorporation, by which the plan of a limited responsibility might have been carried more fully into effect.

The first clause contained the important qualification as to this limitation of liability. It expressly declares, that the partners "shall have right to the profits and be liable for the losses arising from or upon the said business, and shall be bound to relieve each other of all the debts and engagements of the company, but that only to the extent of and in proportion to their respective shares therein." This qualification is set forth as a substantive provision in the very outset of the contract. It occurs in the very first clause. And it is quite clear that this is the operating clause. [375] It provides for the constitution of the partnership; the partners "bind and oblige themselves, their heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever," to contribute and pay the full amount of the shares respectively subscribed for; and the right to the profits, and the liability for loss is regulated by it.

The ninth clause also expressly bears, "and in no event shall it be in the power of the directors to call upon the partners for a sum beyond that subscribed for by them respectively." These words not only proceed on the notion of, but expressly provide for a restricted liability. The directors were empowered to direct the shares subscribed for to be paid by instalments. So long as any portion of these instalments was not paid they had a certain security for any engagements which they might undertake. But in so far as related to indemnification from the partners their claim ceased with the amount of the shares. Whatever engagements they might enter into beyond this sum they could not look to the partners for indemnity. The partners were entitled to stand on the stipulation, "that in no event shall it be in the power of the directors to call upon them for any sum beyond that subscribed for by them respectively." If it had been the intention of the partners to undertake a general liability for each other, for all the obligations of the company, whether they exceeded the amount of the subscribed capital or otherwise, this clause would never have been introduced into the contract. It indicated, as plainly as words could do, that if the directors, by overtrading or mismanagement, exceeded the amount of capital, all obli-directors, the Lord Ordinary is not of opinion that any farther investigation is necessary. With regard to these, a question may no doubt be raised, whether the condition of the company was not such as to have made it the duty of the directors rather to have allowed the creditors, whom they thus pacified with their own money, to have proceeded with diligence against its property, than to have delayed an inevitable catastrophe by such interference. If the defenders can make out any case of gross and pernicious imprudence of this kind, it will be open to them to do so under the preceding interlocutor, which merely finds that these were not acts of borrowing on the credit and security of the company, in contravention of the contract. To him it certainly occurs, that it would be next to impossible to make out such a case. By paying the most urgent debts of the company with their own money, they may have done no real service to the concern. But they would seem entitled, at all events, to come in the place of the stranger creditors, whose proceedings they thus arrested, and against whose claims it is admitted that the defenders would have had no protection.

"In these circumstances, it is needless to inquire into the justness of the legal assumption, that the grant of a limited power in a contract of this description implies such a penal prohibition against exceeding the limit, as in every case to infer the forfeiture of equitable rights, otherwise competent at common law, to persons in the situation of the pursuers; and it is equally unnecessary to consider the effect of the declaration, which immediately precedes this implied prohibition, viz. 'that the powers of the directors shall, in all particulars, be subject to such limitations, extensions, and alterations as a general meeting shall think fit,' taken in connexion with the fact, that the whole proceedings of the directors, with their books and documents, were submitted to several general meetings, subsequent to the public conclusion of all the transactions now complained of, and deliberately sanctioned by a general vote of approbation."

gations beyond it must be [376] held to have been undertaken on their own personal responsibility, and not on the responsibility of the partners.

The other clauses in the contract aided the same construction, in which there is nothing unreasonable, as it only imports a salutary limitation of the common law liabilities, which it was expedient in this instance to restrain.

2. As the greater portion of the debt concluded for in the present summons was contracted by means of advances made by the individual directors, or of obligations entered into by them on their personal responsibility, and ultimately paid by them out of their own funds, the appellants were not bound to relieve the respondents of any such advances or obligations.

This proposition had been met in the note of the Lord Ordinary by the inconclusive remarks, that there had been truly no borrowings, "that the greater part of the transactions complained of under that name consisted merely in granting new securities for debts previously existing, and recognized in the contract itself, and the remainder in raising money on the personal credit of individual partners or directors, and afterwards advancing it to pay off the most pressing of the existing debts of the company." All this, however, proceeds on a very obvious fallacy, in point of argument, and on a mistake in regard to the fact. The Lord Ordinary manifestly assumes, that the raising of money fell within the ordinary powers of administration of the directors, and that, provided they could raise it, without borrowing it, in the strict sense [377] of that word, their actings would be binding on the whole partners. It has been already shown, however, that this is a very erroneous view of the matter. According to the whole conception of the contract it was the manifest understanding of all parties that the administration of the directors was not to extend beyond the capital subscribed for, and that no debt was to be contracted beyond that capital. The raising of money beyond that sum implied an excess of power, whatever might be the form in which the transaction was carried through. The point to be looked to is not whether actual loans were made beyond the sum of £3000, but whether the credit and security of the company could be pledged to a greater extent. It was not the form of the transaction but the substance of it which must be regarded. Hence it followed, that in so far as the respondents have endeavoured to pledge the credit and security of the company beyond the capital actually subscribed for, the appellants are freed from all liability. Generally, if one partner draws a bill for a partnership debt, it becomes a debt by the copartnership, but not so in a company like this.

3. The appellants were not liable for the sums concluded for in this action, in respect that the respondents, contrary to the fair meaning of the contract, proceeded in the business of the partnership before the contract was subscribed for the whole stipulated capital, and that they afterwards persevered, when, in the knowledge that it was not then subscribed to the extent of one half of this capital, concealing from their copartners the important alteration which had occurred in the defalcation of the capital.

The appellants knew nothing of the relative number [378] of subscribers who had subscribed, and refused to subscribe the contract. It was the province of the directors exclusively to look to this; but when a change of so vital a character had occurred they were not entitled to proceed in the business without obtaining fresh instructions from the whole partners referably to the altered situation of the affairs of the company. That it was the deficiency of the capital which led to the action could not be disputed. Had the whole capital of £50,000 been subscribed the present question could not have been raised. The loss would have been distributed over an increased number of partners, and would have been less than the number of shares for which they had respectively subscribed. But further, it was the commencement of the business with an inadequate capital which has caused much of the loss. It was this which led to the whole system of borrowing, and caused to be included, as constituting part of the loss of the company, a sum of no less than £8107 16s. 6d. for interest on loans and debts; and by deranging the whole system of management from the beginning, diminished even the chance of success which the concern might have had under more favourable circumstances. It was impossible to doubt that the alteration that had taken place between February, when the respondents reported that the whole capital had been subscribed, and April thereafter, when they knew that not more than about £20,000 was to be looked to, was material; and could it be disputed that the managing partners of a concern are bound to communicate all material facts to their copartners? The meeting of February authorized purchases to the amount of upwards of £20,000, believing that the capital was £50,000; but, if they had been [379] told that it was not to be the half of that sum they most assuredly would have altered their course. They would either have closed the concern, which might have been done at a small loss, or have reduced the scale of the establishment.

The Lord Ordinary notices the appellants "pretending ignorance" of what had been done. His Lordship says, that if they thought it right to lay out £20,000 "when they had no capital at all," it is extravagant to say that they would have reprobated buildings at a cost of £9000, "when they had a subscribed capital of only £20,150." But this is absolute perversion of the fact. In place of having no capital at all, when they authorized an outlay of £20,000, they believed, upon the written report of the respondents, that they had a capital of £50,000.

Independently of the interlocutors being erroneous on their merits there would be manifest injustice in repelling these defences, which extend so deeply into the merits of the action, before the appellants have had an opportunity of bringing forward their whole case upon the alleged acts of mismanagement, which they were confident would work their exemption from the present claim. No judgment ought therefore to be pronounced which would conclude them, by a decision in one branch of the cause.

Respondents.—1. The respondents, as directors and partners, or in right of directors and partners, of the Caledonian Dairy Company, were by law liable only rateably, according to the respective shares held by them of its stock, for the losses sustained and debts and obligations incurred by that company; and they were [380] entitled to be relieved of all farther proportions of said losses, debts, and obligations by the remaining solvent partners rateably, according to the interest which such partners respectively had in the concern.

In the first place, what each of the appellants was called upon to contribute towards the relief of the respondents was a sum proportioned to his own share of the stock. Had these claims been made by creditors who were not partners of the company the solvent partners would have been liable, conjunctly and severally, and each partner might have been sued in solidum. But as this is an accounting inter socios, the claim is framed upon a different footing, each of the appellants being sued only for his rateable proportion of the sums of which the respondents are entitled to be relieved.

In the next place, this was not an action for payment of calls to contribute to the stock of the company. The company has been dissolved, and the object of the action is merely to adjust and allocate among the different partners, according to their respective interests in the concern, the losses which have been incurred, and the debts which remain unpaid.

The appellants, accordingly, had not disputed that the respondents have a legal right to such relief as is thus claimed by them, unless that right is excluded by the conditions of the contract of copartnership; but they said that that contract contains stipulations which exempt them from their legal obligation so to contribute towards the relief of their copartners. The Court of Session had found that pretence to be altogether untenable, on the grounds so unanswerably stated in the note of the Lord Ordinary.

[381] 2. The contract of copartnership contained no condition importing a limitation of the liabilities of the partners, inter se, to the amount of the sums severally subscribed by them for and as their shares in the copartnership; but, on the contrary, it imposed upon them an express obligation to relieve each other rateably, according to their respective interests in the concern.

In no part of the first clause is the amount of the sums subscribed by the partners said to be the measure of their liability. From beginning to end of that clause the amount of the sums subscribed by them not only is not referred to for that purpose, but is never once mentioned for any purpose whatever. What the contract refers to as the measure of the liability of partners inter se, is just the equitable one established by the law of Scotland itself, viz. "proportions corresponding to their respective shares" in the company; and, in the next place, even had there been any doubt otherwise as to the meaning of the rule thus stated for regulating the liability of partners inter se, certain it is, that at all events it could not mean that the sums subscribed by the respective partners should be the limit of their liability. That meaning at all events must be excluded; for, it will be observed, that the right of the partners to profits, as well as their liability for losses, and for relief of debts, was to be measured by the same rule. The words "only to the extent of, and in proportion to, their respective shares therein," apply to the one as well as to the other. The amount of the subscribed capital of each partner, therefore, cannot be the rule which is here prescribed for measuring the extent of his right [382] to the profits; and neither can it be the rule which is here prescribed for measuring the extent of his liability for losses and debts, because that liability is to be regulated by precisely the same rule as the right of profits. Whatever therefore may be the meaning of the rule thus prescribed for regulating the liability of partners in relief to each other, it cannot have that meaning which the appellants wish to engraft upon the words.

The appellants were not entitled to resist the claim of the respondents on the pretence that the directors of the company had not power to bind the partners for debts and obligations on its behalf till the whole capital of £50,000 has been subscribed for and secured; and they were not freed from their legal obligation of rateable relief to the respondents by the clause in the contract relating to the borrowing of money.

These positions were amply supported by the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary, and the opinion of the Court as expressed by Lord Medwyn (Report in Fac. Coll.). And there could be no danger to the ultimate and satisfactory adjustment of the rights of the parties in the further progress of the action by affirming these interlocutors, as every thing else was clearly reserved by the Lord Ordinary in disposing of three of the defences founded on.

The Lord Chancellor, throughout the hearing of the cause, intimated his concurrence in the views of the Lord Ordinary upon the merits of the defences, and moved that the consideration of the cause be adjourned, that their lordships might consider of the propriety in point of practice of affirming these declaratory findings at that stage of the proceedings.

[383] Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in the appeal which was before your lordships yesterday, in consequence of what was pressed by the learned counsel for the appellants in his reply, I was desirous to take an opportunity of examining the proceedings, in order to satisfy myself, and to be able to state to your Lordships, whether there really was any danger, such as seemed to be anticipated by the learned counsel, namely, that by affirming the interlocutor of the Court of Session your lordships might be giving more effect to that decision than appears to have been intended by the learned judges who pronounced it. I find that the appellant himself, in stating his case, on the fourth page, states the grounds of his defence in these terms:—The action was resisted on the ground, 1, that the liability of each partner was limited to the amount of the shares subscribed for; 2, that the debts concluded for were contracted by means of loans and obligations entered into in violation of the contract, and on the personal responsibility of the respondents individually; 3, that the claim of the respondents was barred in respect that they proceeded to carry on the business after they knew that the capital was not half filled up, without communicating that fact to the partners; and, 4, that it was barred in respect that the whole of the losses had arisen from their own violation of the contract, their concealment and misrepresentation, and from their gross negligence and misconduct in the management of the company's affairs." Now, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, affirmed by the Inner House, disposes of three of these grounds in the very same terms in which they are put forward by the defenders themselves. It repels [384] the defence founded on the clause or clauses in the contract of copartnership, alleged by the defenders to import an absolute limitation of the liabilities of the partners inter se, to the amount of the sums severally subscribed by them for and as their shares in the said copartnership." It repels also "the defence founded on the allegation, that the pursuers or directors of the said company had no right to begin business, and no power to bind the partners for any debts or obligations on behalf of the said company, till the whole capital of £50,000 had been subscribed for and secured;" and further repels "the defence founded on the clause or provisions of the contract, by which the defenders allege that the powers of the directors to borrow money on the responsibility of the company and the partners thereof were restrained; and before further answer appoints the clause to be enrolled, that parties may explain in what way the cases of the several defenders are or may be affected by this deliverance, what findings or decernitures may be required to apply to their several cases, and what further determinations may be necessary to exhaust the cause as to the said several defenders, or any of them." Therefore, my Lords, according to a very usual course of proceeding in the Court of Session, it disposes of parts of the case, lays down the general principles by which the future proceedings are to be regulated, but it does not exhaust the case, but reserves the consideration of other matters, merely declaring certain points to be adjudged as the foundation of what the Court may hereafter think it right to do.

My Lords, it is consistent with the practice of the [385] Court of Session, much more than it is consistent with the practice of any court in this country, so to deal with the case. In a late case of great importance (Auchterarder Case, see antea, p. 220) your Lordships had an instance, where the summons containing declaratory and petitory conclusions, the court confined itself to the declaratory conclusions, leaving the petitory conclusions for further consideration. It declared the right, but it did not administer the relief, but left the question of what relief was to be administered for the further consideration of the court. So in this case the court says that the points set up in behalf of the defenders are not capable of being maintained, and it is not inconsistent with the practice of the Court of Session to repel those defences, but if the court think that there are other points which require further inquiry and further consideration, it does not exhaust the subject, but merely declares that in so far as the defence rests upon certain points the court is of opinion that the defence cannot be maintained. My Lords, the court has in this instance done no more than that. It has taken up the defences brought forward by the parties themselves, and it has adjudged that those defences do not meet the case made by the pursuers. It leaves the rest of the subject entirely untouched; and therefore I do not see the least danger to be apprehended from its being supposed that the interlocutor which has been pronounced can have any more effect than that which your Lordships yesterday were of opinion ought in substance to be pronounced, namely, that the defence relied on in these three grounds which constitute the substance of the interlocutor, are not defences which can protect the case of the defenders. Any other defence is open to them; it only declares [386] that these three grounds are not positions upon which the defence can stand.

Now, my Lords, that being very plain upon the interlocutor,—such being the understanding of the Lord Ordinary, and the clear opinion of the judges of the Second Division of the Court, and I may say the clear opinion of your Lordships upon the discussion of the merits of the case, in the way almost conceded by the learned counsel for the appellants, for no resistance could be made to the conclusion to which the Court of Session had come, the difficulty, if any, was supposed to arise upon this point of form. If your Lordships are of opinion, as I certainly am, that the point of form is not open to the observations which have been made upon it, your Lordships cannot hesitate, upon a matter which appears upon investigation to be extremely plain, to affirm the interlocutor of the Court below, with costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutors therein complained of be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellants do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is also further ordered, That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

[387] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, Appellant.*—Attorney General (Sir John Campbell)—Bagley; DUNCAN CAMPBELL, Respondent.—Dr. Lushington [3d June 1839].

[Mews' Dig. i. 333, 364; S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 166; 12 Shaw 870.]

Appeal—Practice—Stat. 55 Geo. 3, c. 42, s. 4, 6, and 8—Stat. 59 Geo. 3, c. 35, s. 16.—The partners of a distillery were convicted in penalties, which were levied from the appellant and respondent respectively: the appellant sued the respondent for his share of certain cash advances made by him for behoof of the company; the respondent brought an action against the partners for indemnity from the said penalties, on the ground of nonparticipation in the offence: the appellant, among other defences to such action, pleaded, that, the partners having been all involved in the same delict, there was no ground for contribution or indemnity by one against the other. The judgment of the Lord Ordinary or of the Court was not taken on that defence; and the Lord Ordinary sent the cause for trial by a jury. The judge at the trial gave no direction as to said defence, and no exception was tendered: and a verdict was returned for the respondent. The Court, upon motion with notice by appellant for a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial granted, refused to grant a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside; thereafter the Court applied the verdict, and decerned for the sum found due, with costs, which were also subsequently decerned for: Held, that an appeal against such judgment, applying the verdict and decerning, was competent.

In 1820 the appellant and the respondent, and two individuals of the name of Macandrew, became partners [388] of the Easdale Distillery Company. This company carried on business from February 1820 till August 1822, and was dissolved in December thereafter.

In consequence of alleged misconduct by those in charge of the operative department of the concern, illicit spirits had been mixed up with the produce of the distillery, and a prosecution for penalties to the amount of £10,500 was instituted at the suit of the Crown in the Scotch Court of Exchequer, where the practice of the English Courts prevails.

The defendants (the present appellant, the respondent, and the Macandrews,) put in a joint plea of not guilty, and tendered evidence at the trial in Exchequer, which took place on the 17th of December 1823, and ended in a verdict of conviction against all of them, and in a judgment for the full amount of penalties. The defendants thereafter got the penalties modified to £3000. A writ of extent was issued, and their several proportions of the above mitigated penalties were levied from the appellant and respondent respectively.

In 1824 the appellant, who had made considerable advances in purchasing grain and other materials for the company's use, to the extent of upwards of £1500, raised an action in the Court of Session against the respondent, concluding for payment of £559 1s. 10d., being his share of this debt of £1500, and for any deficiency that might arise from the insolvency of the other partners.

In 1827 the respondent instituted an action in the Court of Session against the appellant and the two Macandrews, and one Hunter, a servant in the establishment, averring his own ignorance, and their knowledge, of the illicit practices carried on at the distillery, [389] and concluding for a total indemnity, at the hands of the appellant and of the other defenders, of the whole modified penalties in which they had been condemned. To this action the appellant pleaded in defence,—1. that the action was irrelevant; that the respondent being involved in the same delict with the appellant, by the verdict and judgment following thereon, could not legally sue to have the whole consequences of that delict thrown on the appellant, and himself relieved of them; and that no action lay at his instance against the appellant. 2. He denied, in point of fact, that he ever knew, or was in the slightest degree accessory to, the improper practices alluded to.

Upon this state of the pleadings, the Lord Ordinary gave no judgment upon the objection to the relevancy of the action; but the cause being a proper one for trial by jury his Lordship remitted the case to the jury roll, and the parties went to trial on the following issues as settled by the Lord Ordinary:—

"It being admitted that the pursuer and defenders, Alexander Campbell and Donald Macandrew, and the late John Macandrew, were partners of a company for the purpose of distilling spirits at Easdale, and that the defender, Robert Hunter, was brewer or distiller to the said company; and that on the 17th day of December 1823 the said company were found liable in a penalty of £3000, as being guilty of contravening the revenue laws:—

"Whether the defenders, or any of them, were guilty of the said contravention of the said laws, whereby the said company were subjected in the said penalty, and obliged to pay certain expenses? And whether the defenders, or any of them, are indebted and rest-[390]-ing owing to the pursuer in the sum of £1171 5s. 1d., or any part thereof, with interest thereon, as the balance of the said penalty and expenses? Or whether the said contravention of the said laws was with the knowledge of the pursuer?"

The Judge who presided at the trial left the case to the jury, upon the evidence.

The jury returned a verdict in the following terms:—"At Edinburgh, the 22d, 24th, and 25th days of March 1834. Before the Right Honourable David Boyle, Lord President of the Second Division of the Court of Session, compeared the said pursuer and the said defenders by their respective counsel and agents, and a jury having been impanelled and sworn to try the said issues between the said parties, say upon their oath, that in respect of the matters proven before them, they find for the pursuer on both issues; and that the defenders are indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in the sum of £1059 5s. 1d., with interest, as libelled."

The appellant gave "notice of a motion for a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial granted."

In discussing the motion "to set aside the verdict," the appellant insisted on his preliminary defence, and on the judgment and verdict in Exchequer, produced in evidence on the trial, as sufficient to quash the verdict as contrary to evidence; but he was met with the objection in point of form, that in hoc statu, on a motion arising out of the trial, the Court could only judge of the law so far as it applied to the direction given at the trial, and that no direction was given or required at the trial, nor exception taken upon this preliminary matter; and [391] that the ground on which the motion was made resolved into a plea which should have been taken at the trial, and stated by way of exception, and not by a motion for a new trial; and that as the verdict must stand, a motion for a new trial was incompetent. The Court thereupon made the following order (1st July 1834):—"The Lords refuse to grant a rule to show cause why the verdict in this case should not be set aside."

Thereafter the verdict, and the Judges' report of what had passed at the trial, were laid before the Court of Session; and the respondent gave the following notice of motion to enter up judgment:—"Take notice, that on the 4th current, Duncan Campbell, esq., the pursuer, will move the Honourable Court to apply the verdict of the jury in this case, to decern in terms thereof, and to find the defenders liable in the expenses incurred by the pursuer, and to remit the account thereof to the auditor to tax and to report. Dated at Edinburgh this 2d day of July 1834." The appellant opposed this motion, but the Court ordered the whole cause to the roll, when their Lordships pronounced the following judgment (4th July 1834):—"In respect of the verdict found by the jury on the issues in this cause, the Lords decern against the defenders, conjunctly and severally, for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £1059 5s. 1d., with interest as libelled; find the defenders liable to the pursuer in the expenses incurred by him in this action; appoint an account thereof to be lodged, and remit to the auditor to tax the same, and to report."

Thereafter their Lordships pronounced the following interlocutor (11th July 1834):—"The Lords allow the decree pro-[392]-nounced in this case for the principal sum of £1059 5s. 1d., and interest thereon as libelled, to be extracted ad interim."

Against these several interlocutors Alexander Campbell appealed.

The respondent having objected to the competency of this appeal before the appeal committee, their Lordships reported to the House that, on account of its importance in practice, the question of competency should be argued at the bar of the House by one counsel of a side; and on the 12th August 1834, the cause having been called on, the competency of the appeal (which then embraced the previous interlocutor of the Court on a motion for a new trial) was discussed.

Appellant.—The pleas on the merits which bore materially on the competency were shortly these:—1st, The action by the respondent is incompetent, in respect that he himself, as well as his copartners, being by the verdict in Exchequer found guilty of the offences charged, and condemned by the Court in the statutory penalties, no action can lie at the suit of either against his associates for relief or indemnity of these penalties; and no one of the co-partners can be permitted to recover in an action founding on the above-mentioned verdict and judgment, and at the same time asserting his own innocence of the charge of which, by these very proceedings, he stands legally convicted; and, 2d, he had urged the Lord Ordinary to dispose of the preliminary defences before trial, at every step of the cause.

Some smuggled spirits had been received upon the premises of this company, and certain violations [393] of the excise laws were committed by the company, in respect of which His Majesty's Advocate commenced a criminal prosecution for penalties, to the amount of £10,000, in the Scotch Court of Exchequer. Instead of resisting this prosecution, it was resolved to effect an arrangement with a view to mitigation of penalties. By a practice which occurs in Scotland, and which was also of frequent occurrence in England, the verdict in Exchequer was taken by consent, against all the parties, for penalties afterwards restricted to £3000. The present respondent, Duncan Campbell, was afterwards advised to raise an action, in the Court of Session, against his copartners, concluding to be relieved from the consequences of the verdict in Exchequer. Now, no such thing was known in the law of England, nor in the law of any other country, as an action for contribution among wrongdoers. That had been clearly settled in the well known case of Merewether and Nixon (4 Term Rep. 180), and also in the more recent case of Colburn and Patmore (1 Cro. Mee. and Ros. 72; S.C. 4 Tyrw. 677) in the Court of Exchequer. [Lord Chancellor Brougham stated, that it appeared to his Lordship that this was an action brought at the instance of one accomplice against his co-associates in crime. Such a thing was perfectly wild.] Such is precisely the case here; nevertheless, it would appear that a different view of this matter had been taken by the Court of Session, for instead of giving the defenders the benefit of the pleas which they had taken, an issue was prepared and ordered to be tried by a jury. Now the defenders had no alternative but to go to trial upon this issue, for the act of the 55 Geo. 3, c. 42, s. 4, enacts, "that it shall [394] not be competent, either by reclaiming petition or appeal to the House of Lords, to question any interlocutor granting or refusing such trial by jury." [Lord Brougham, C.:—Is the plea set forth in the record?] The conviction in Exchequer was set forth on the record, and formed the subject of substantive pleas in law. [Lord Brougham, C.:—Did you take a defence upon the conviction in Exchequer? I want to see the summons and defences.] There was no doubt of the fact that the plea in question had been brought out distinctly and broadly on the record in the Court below. In this state of matters, being, as their Lordships would perceive from the section of the act to which they were referred, compelled to go to trial, the case came before a jury, and a verdict was returned in favour of the pursuer (respondent). The defender (appellant) thereafter moved the Court to have the verdict set aside, in respect of the conviction in Exchequer. A motion was made in arrest of judgment. The Court below refused the rule, and they afterwards pronounced judgment, proceeding upon the verdict, ordaining the defenders to pay the pursuer the amount prayed for in the summons, viz. £1059 5s. 1d., with interest and costs. Against this latter judgment the present appeal was entered. The respondent has presented his petition, praying that the appeal may be dismissed as incompetent. The appeal is said to be incompetent under the act 55 Geo. 3, c. 42, ss. 6 and 8, and also by the 59 Geo. 3, c. 35, s. 16. Now the argument of the appellant was, that by interlocutors appealed from no point of law is decided; the interlocutor of the 1st of July being merely a refusal to set aside the verdict, and the interlocutors of the 4th and 11th July being merely to apply and give effect to the verdict. [395] [Lord Brougham, C.; —Had you a demurrer in the Court below upon the plea?] My Lord, I am not aware that they have in Scotland any form of plea in the nature of a demurrer. [Lord Brougham, C.:—Was the plea made a preliminary defence? I am anxious to have a copy of the defence; and the better way perhaps is to allow this action to stand over-until I shall have had an opportunity of perusing the summons and defence.]

Lord Brougham, C., addressing Dr. Lushington:—Pray is this not a motion for an arrest of judgment, non obstante veredicto. There can be no objection to that; it is matter of familiar practice. But at any rate, do you mean to say that there is any clause in these statutes which shuts out the party from an appeal to this House? You cannot cut off the right of appeal by implication. The right of appeal does not stand upon any act of parliament. There is no act of parliament giving a right of appeal. That right is the constitutional privilege of all the King's subjects.

Dr. Lushington:—My argument is, that trial by jury in Scotland being entirely a matter of statutory introduction and regulation, there is no appeal, except where the statutes allow it.

Here the Lord Chancellor rose, and stated that he had now no difficulty whatever in recommending to their Lordships to sustain the competency of this appeal. Let the respondent's petition, therefore, be dismissed. Ordered accordingly.

On the following day (13th Aug. 1834) the cause was again brought under the notice of their Lordships by the respondent's counsel, ex parte, who stated, that since the matter was last before the House there had been furnished a copy of the notice of motion for a rule to show cause.

[396] Lord Brougham, C.:—I am not certain that there cannot be an appeal from the judgment, because they have entered up judgment.

The appeal subsequently dropped from the cause list, by default of the appellant in lodging prints of his case; but he having afterwards presented a new appeal, differing from the former in so far as he did not appeal against the order refusing the rule to show cause, etc., the respondent petitioned against this second appeal, on the ground of incompetency; and the matter having been referred to the Appeal Committee, their Lordships reported that the point should be argued, by one counsel of a side, at their Lordships' bar; which argument accordingly took place in session 1837.

The cause having stood over, was this day (3d June 1839) called on.

Lord Chancellor:—My Lords, this is a case which was heard at your Lordships' bar some time ago, and which had, in fact, escaped my recollection. The suit was for the purpose of recovering a contribution from one of several partners, towards the payment of the amount of a verdict which had been found at the suit of the Crown against all the partners for a breach of the excise laws. The jury having found in favour of the pursuer, an application was made to the Court of Session for a new trial, which was refused; upon which the judgment of the Court was pronounced in these terms:—"In respect of the verdict found by the jury on the issues in this cause, the Lords decern against the defenders, conjointly and severally, for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £1059 5s. 1d., with interest as libelled."

An appeal was presented to your Lordships' house against that decree of the Court of Session, and against [397] the order refusing a new trial; that took place in the year 1834. That appeal was met by a petition for dismissal upon the ground of incompetency; and to the extent of the order of the Court of Session refusing a new trial, there can be no doubt the appeal was incompetent, inasmuch as the act (55 Geo. 3, c. 42, sec. 4) prohibits parties from coming to this House, upon orders of the Court below upon applications for new trials. The present petition of appeal was then presented, which left out the order refusing a new trial, and appealed against the order I have just read, and another order of subsequent date consequential upon it.

The question now is, whether that can be dealt with as an incompetent appeal, being against the final interlocutor of the Court of Session. The order is for the payment of the money. There is nothing, undoubtedly, in the act which prohibits such an appeal. Your Lordships will not fail to observe under what difficult circumstances the appellant comes here. His real and substantial defence is this; that the penalties under the excise laws being, by the verdict of a jury, on behalf of the Crown, found against all the partners, that one partner cannot recover, in a civil action against the others, a contribution for that which is a liability incurred by a wrong.

There was a plea on record, which set forth, to a certain extent, what was sufficient to raise the matter in issue coupled with something else. There was a plea raising that defence, but upon that plea no judgment of the Court was asked before it was sent to a jury; and the issues referring the matter to a jury were in these words:—“It being admitted that the pursuer [398] and defenders were partners of a company for the purpose of distilling spirits, and that the defender, Robert Hunter, was brewer or distiller to the said company; and that, on the 17th of December 1823, the said company were found liable in a penalty of £3000, as being guilty of contravening the revenue laws; whether the defenders, or any of them, were guilty of the said contravention of the said laws, whereby the said company were subjected in the said penalty, and obliged to pay certain expenses? and whether the defenders, or any of them, are indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in the sum of £1171 5s. 1d., or any part thereof, with interest thereon, as the balance of the said penalty and expenses? or whether the said contravention of the said laws was with the knowledge of the pursuer?”

Now the jury found this verdict. They say, “That in respect of the matters proven before them, they find for the pursuer on both issues, and that the defenders are indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in the sum of £1059 5s. 1d., with interest as libelled.” Now that finding involves a question of law as well as a question of fact, because, if there was no illegality in the original transaction which prevented one party recovering a contribution against the other, the defenders could not be indebted and resting owing to the pursuer. It was a point of law, therefore, arising at the trial, which must either have been assumed or decided before the jury could come to their conclusions.

Now it is said that the Learned Judge who presided at the trial did not explain to the jury what the law was. If he had been applied to at the trial to do so, [399] he would undoubtedly have given an opinion to the jury, as to whether the pursuer could recover with reference to that question. But it does not appear that any such application was made (see 12 S., D., and B., 573); so that neither in the first instance upon the interlocutor directing the issue, nor in the second instance when the issue was at trial, did the defender take the course which was clearly open to him, of asking the opinion of the Court, or the opinion of the Judge, as to the illegality of the transaction being an answer to the demand against him.

Under these circumstances the finding of the jury is one that cannot now be disturbed, inasmuch as an application was made to the Court of Session for a new trial, and the Court of Session refused a new trial, and against that interlocutor refusing a new trial no appeal can be presented to your Lordships' house. The present appeal is against the interlocutor giving effect to the verdict of the jury; that is to say, the jury having found that the defenders are indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in a certain sum. The interlocutor decreed that payment should be made. It is for the appellant to consider how far, in prosecuting this appeal, he is likely to succeed. But that is not now the question before your Lordships for decision. The question for your Lordships' decision now is, whether this appeal be incompetent. I find that it is an appeal against a final order of the Court of Session for payment, and I do not find any thing in the statute which raises any doubt as to its being competent to a party to come here for the purpose of asking your Lordships whether that interlocutor can be supported or not.

[400] Now the ground of the appeal is, that the verdict does not exhaust the whole merits of the question. Whether it does or does not exhaust the whole merits of the question is a matter about which your Lordships may be very well able to form your opinion on looking at the pleadings, but it is not a matter before your Lordships for decision. The question is, as to whether the appellant shall be sent away from your Lordships' bar upon the ground of having brought an appeal which it is incompetent to him to bring. It appears to me that there is no incompetency; whatever may be the result of the appeal itself is matter for the consideration of the appellant; but I think that the petition, praying that the appeal may be dismissed as incompetent, must be refused.

Die Lunae, 3 Junii 1839.—Respondent's petition to dismiss appeal as incompetent considered, and dismissed; and the appeal sustained.

[401]    APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

Mrs. MARIA CAMPBELL STEWART,* Appellant.—Pemberton—Sir William Follett; FERDINAND S. C. STEWART, and Attorney and Mandatory, Respondents.—Dr. Lushington—James Russell [3d June 1839].

[Mews' Dig. iii. 2031. S.C. 6 Cl. and F. 911. See Cooper v. Phibbs, 1867, L.R. 1 H.L. 149, and notes to Stapilton v. Stapilton, 1 Wh. and T.L.C., 7th ed. 223.

Agent and Client—Transaction.—Where a deed of agreement of compromise of their respective claims to the succession of a deceased relation had been settled and executed by three parties, one of whom afterwards brought an action of reduction of the agreement on the ground of lesion, through erroneous advice of her law agent, who was agent also of the two other parties, as to her legal rights, of which she was ignorant:—Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Session) that, upon the facts and written evidence of the transaction, the party had failed to establish relevant grounds for disturbing the agreement.

Frederick Campbell Stewart, a native of America, now deceased, succeeded in 1815 as heir of entail to the estates of Ascog and Whitebarony. Having been advised to sell the lands, Mr. Stewart instituted proceedings in the Court of Session to ascertain his powers under the entail; and the Court found, that although he was not effectually prohibited from selling the lands, he was bound, if he did sell, to reinvest the price in the purchase of other lands to be settled on the same series of heirs (F. C., and 5 S. and D. 418). Mr. Stewart appealed to the House of Lords against the finding as to reinvesting the price of the lands; and while the fate of that appeal was still uncertain Mr. Stewart, in 1826 and 1827, executed various deeds, providing for the event either of a reversal or affirmance, in favour of Mrs. Stewart his wife, of his two daughters, of his brother Professor Ferdinand Stewart, and of his sister Mrs. Anna Stewart. Mr. Stewart and his daughters soon afterwards died in France. In 1830 the House of Lords, reversing the decision in the Ascog Cause (4 W. and S. 196), found that Mr. Stewart was under no obligation to reinvest the price in the purchase of other lands. Mr. Wardlaw, the law agent in Edinburgh of Mr. Stewart's widow and nearest of kin, entertaining doubts as to their respective rights, obtained the opinion of counsel † upon a memorial for the trust disponees of Mr. Stewart.

* Rep. 15 D., B., and M., 112.

† "Opinion by Francis Jeffrey, Esq. and Andrew Rutherford, Esq., upon Memorial and Queries for the Trust Disponees of Frederick Campbell Stewart, Esq., of Ascog.

"1, 2, 3, 4. In the event of its being decided in the House of Lords, reversing the judgment of the Court of Session, that the price drawn by Mr. Campbell Stewart is not subject to reinvestment as a surrogatum for the entailed estate, there can be no doubt that the price, along with the other moveable funds vested in the memorialists, must be held to have been the personal property of their constituent, and must be dealt with accordingly.

"The domicile of Mr. Stewart is of importance chiefly, it appears to us, as regulating the domicile of his daughters, who died before they had obtained any domicile of their own independently of his. The only question here is between the American and the Scotch domicile; for we see no ground whatever upon which it can plausibly be argued that he obtained any domicile on the continent of Europe. The claims of the Scotch domicile, and of the Scotch law in virtue of it, to regulate [403] The parties having been advised by counsel to settle by compromise questions which appeared to be of a [404] difficult nature, a deed of agreement was entered into between Mrs. Stewart the widow, and Ferdinand Stewart and his sister Anna Stewart, which, after setting forth the particulars as to the succession and the uncertainty of the rights of parties connected therewith, contained a stipulation that the three parties, "with a view to avoid litigation, and being mutually disposed to an amicable arrangement," consented and agreed that the free proceeds of the whole estate and effects other than the entailed estate should be divided equally among them.

Mrs. Stewart subsequently brought an action of reduction for the purpose of setting aside this agree-[405]-ment, and in support of her action pleaded:—1. That the agreement had been brought about by undue concealment and misrepresentation of her rights, and her apparent consent obtained to a deed, the real meaning and import of which, as affecting her legal rights, she did not understand. 2. The agreement had been entered into when she and the other parties thereto were ignorant of the rights conferred upon her by the last will and testament of Mr. Stewart, and when they had in view only the deeds referred to and specified in the said agreement; she also pleaded that upon the said agreement being reduced she would be entitled, independently of the said will or testament, to claim as at the death of her husband, both by the law of Scotland and by the law of Virginia, which was that of his domicile, the full third share of all his personal estate and effects; and also to claim during her life, by the law of Scotland, the third part of the rents of any heritable property in Scotland in which her husband was infeft at the time of his death, as well as certain other benefits from which she had been excluded by the agreement.

It was pleaded in defence,—1. The grounds of reduction were not relevant, or sufficient in law to support the conclusions of the action. 2. The pursuer was not ignorant, but cognizant of her rights, and of the deeds by which the same were the moveable succession of Mr. Stewart and his children, is certainly attended with a great deal of difficulty, principally because of the fact, that he had unquestionably an American domicile before he came to this country; that it is a rule very general, in reference to intestate succession, though not, perhaps, without exception, that there can be only one domicile, and that a domicile once established cannot be lost, except by actual acquisition of another domicile; and that there is an absence of any proper residence or abode in Scotland. At the same time, there are many strong circumstances on the other side; and we are certainly not prepared to say that this is a case in which the Scotch law, which must be appealed to in the first instance, will feel itself to be controlled by the American domicile, and constrained to surrender the property within its jurisdiction to the distribution of a foreign law. We may add, too, that considering the property as in bonis of the children, the difficulty of the case appears to be somewhat increased, in consequence of the father's deed vesting the funds in the hands of Scotch trustees, and appointing them, at the same time, to be tutors and curators to his children.

"With respect to Mr. Campbell Stewart himself, we are of opinion that he must be held to have died testate, although, at the same time, it is not quite free of question, whether, under the particular provisions of this deed, the shares which are declared to be payable to the children or survivors on majority or marriage, vested in the children by the mere survivance of the father, or lapsed in consequence of their pre-decease before marriage or majority; and on the supposition of their lapsing, the whole funds must be held to be still in bonis of Mr. Campbell Stewart, and to be distributable as his intestate succession, seeing the trust deed makes no destination of his property, beyond his children and their issue. If, however, as we rather hold, the shares vested in each child upon survivance, then the funds must be distributed as the intestate succession of the children; and we are inclined to think that, in their case, there are some circumstances which strengthen the right of those whose interest it is to claim under the Scotch law.

"We have chosen rather to state where we conceive the difficulties to lie, than give any direct opinion upon the questions which suggest themselves; because, before forming a satisfactory opinion, some farther information may be necessary as to the facts; and because, in so far as regards the memorialists, or any practical regulated, when she executed the agreement sought to be reduced. 3. That she had homologated the agreement and transaction.

After closing the record and hearing parties Lord Cockburn, Ordinary, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the closed records and productions, and heard parties, [406] both of whom have renounced farther probation, finds, that the pursuer has not established any sufficient ground for setting aside the agreement brought under reduction; sustains this defence, assoilzies the defender, and decerns: finds the pursuer liable in expenses, appoints an account thereof to be given in, and, when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and report. (Signed) H. COCKBURN."

"Note.—The pursuer wishes to reduce a contract by which a portion of her deceased husband's property was divided into three parts, of which she got one, and his brother and sister two, on the ground that she was thereby materially injured, and was led into the bargain from ignorance of her legal rights.

"The fact of her being materially injured, if the whole risks be taken into view, is not proved. The subject of the arrangement was complicated and difficult, as the consultations with counsel shew; and the doubtful and expensive disputes which might possibly have arisen, would have been among persons closely united by relationship and friendship. Contingencies had therefore to be considered, and peace to be obtained by concession, as is declared in the agreement, and transpires through all the correspondence. If the possible consequences of litigation and dissension are brought into the calculation, the reality of her lesion is at the least doubtful.

"The exact nature and extent of her ignorance is equally uncertain. That she did not know the whole law of her case, or cases, is probably true; as it is of most parties. But the certainty and the degree of her ignorance is by no means clear. Her evidence [407] of it consists entirely of letters which passed between her and her agent; but it is proved that she had personal interviews with him; and the advice they may require, we can have no doubt, in the first place, that the rights of the competing parties must be determined in the Scotch courts, leaving each party to make effectual his claim as he can, under the law of which he founds; and, in the second place, that nothing but a judgment of the court will effectually exonerate the trustees, except, indeed, a compromise between all the parties, who, in any view of the case, can make a plausible claim under either the American or the Scotch law. We think such a mode of settlement would be very advisable in a case presenting so many difficulties, and threatening a very tedious and expensive litigation; but even if a compromise were gone into, it ought to be done judicially, and the trustees, at all events, should bring an action of multiplepinding, in which the several parties interested may lodge claims, and afterwards assent to judgment, in terms of any compromise they may agree to.

"5. Assuming that the succession is distributable by the law of Scotland, on which supposition it would have been vested, under the deed or otherwise, in the child last deceasing, we are of opinion that Mr. Stewart, and his sister Mrs. Tennent, must succeed equally as next of kin; that his act of naturalization gives him no exclusive right, and that she, as an alien, is not prevented from taking moveable succession.

"6. On the supposition of the law of Scotland regulating the succession of Mr. Stewart and his children, in which view only this question is of importance, we are of opinion that the widow has no right whatever to any part of the funds, except in so far as she claims her share of the goods in communion, or under Mr. Stewart's trust deed.

"7. In the event that the House of Lords shall affirm the judgment of the Court of Session, and that the price must be reinvested, we are of opinion that the bonds of provision executed under Lord Aberdeen's Act, in favour of the daughters, must be considered as moveable, and must, along with the residue of the trust funds, be distributable according to the law which shall be held to regulate the daughters moveable succession. These bonds are in no respect different from other personal bonds, except in this, that they are effectual against the heirs of entail, and that the rents of the entailed estate may be attached in payment of them.

points on which she now says that she was in the dark were ones on which it is very improbable that no communication then passed between them. Accordingly, she herself acknowledges in several letters that she always meant to make a sacrifice, and on grounds which shew that she knew more of her true legal position than is now admitted. For example, one of the principal averments on which this action rests is, that, in sharing the property with her brother and sister-in-law, she was not aware that the law of Scotland gave her more than a third, or rather than a life-rent of the third. Yet in her important letter of the 29th December 1831 to her sister-in-law, in which she explains what her inducements to enter into the contract had been, she says, 'I was quite aware that if I had recourse to a lawsuit the whole would probably be mine.' There are other letters with similar avowals.

"But assuming both injury and ignorance; she was confessedly misled solely by her own professional adviser;—a gentleman against whose intelligence or character nothing is said. It is alleged that he was also the agent of the opposite parties. But this was known to her, and it is not averred on the record that he betrayed the one client to the other; nor is there in any other respect the slightest fraud imputed to him. He honestly thought it best for her that she should enter into this arrangement, and she took his advice. She wrote to him, saying she thought the bargain better for her brother and sister-in-law [408] than for her, 'but I submit all these matters to your better judgment.' (Letter, 26th April 1830). Eight months after this, she repeats the objection in very explicit terms. 'I do not think the chances equal.' (Letter, 2d December 1830.) Nevertheless, after another pause of above two months, and more explanation from her agent, she signs the contract, which sets forth various deeds, judicial proceedings, professional consultations, and 'conflicting opinions, by different eminent counsel at the Scottish bar,' and declares, that the compromise is gone into 'with a view to avoid litigation, and being mutually disposed to an amicable arrangement.'

"It was found in the case of M'Allister (26th June 1827), that the circumstance of a party losing a judgment by being kept in ignorance by his agent, formed no ground for disturbing the party who had obtained it. On the same principle, whatever claim the pursuer may have against her agent, it does not appear to the Lord Ordinary that the ignorance or inadvertence of the legal adviser, by whom she chose to be guided, can, in a case free from all fraud, be made to affect third parties, who are not said to have been accessory to her being misled.

"The Lord Ordinary has not decided upon homologation as a separate defence, because he conceives it to be superseded hoc statu, by the failure of the pursuer to establish her own case. But undoubtedly, the acts from which homologation is inferred do throw a strong light on the real state of her mind and views, in reference to her own grounds of action. For they amount to this: that, at a period when it is nearly impossible to believe that she was in any [409] ignorance of her rights, she deliberately enforced what she held to be the meaning of this very contract, and gained materially, at the expense of the defender, by doing so. H. C."

Mrs. Stewart reclaimed, but the Court (22d Nov. 1836) adhered, and of new found expenses due by the pursuer.

Mrs. Stewart appealed.

Appellant.—The real question at issue is, whether a deed or contract can be supported against a party who has subscribed it, though it should turn out that the party never truly consented to any such deed? In cases of fraud or deception, a deed is set aside solely because it is not the deed of the party, and because the apparent consent given by the act of subscription infers no true consent by the party so subscribing. And this principle, it will be found, applies as strongly to the present case as it can to any case where a deed has been executed under the influence of fraud or deception.

Upon the circumstances admitted or proved it was clear, that, by some unaccountable mistake, which has never been explained, the appellant, a stranger to the law of Scotland, was entirely misled and deceived as to her rights, even under that law. By the law of Scotland, a widow is entitled, on the death of her husband, leaving children, to claim, as her right, the third part of his personal estate, not the life-rent of this third, as erroneously held out by Mr. Wardlaw, and also the terce, or third part of the rents, of any heritable property in which her husband has died infeft.

[410] It is not necessary to prove actual fraud, if it be an act which no person of sound mind, and not under delusion, could either have proposed or consented to under the agreement in question; she got nothing whatever for compromising her rights; the compromise gave her nothing to which she was not otherwise legally entitled. Relief is granted in such cases solely because the confidence of the party having been taken in by the fraud, her consent was never truly given to the transaction, notwithstanding any subscription, or other act, by which she might appear to have consented. In order to form a contract or transaction (Dig. lib. 2 tit. 14), there must, as the civilians define it, be "duorum pluriumve consensus, in idem placitum;" that is to say, there must be a true and genuine consent to the contract or transaction. The appellant is far from maintaining that where the nature of the contract has been correctly explained, it is necessary that the parties should be fully aware of all its consequences, or even of all its legal effects. It is quite conceivable that two parties may enter into a transaction or agreement in utter ignorance of their rights, and upon this very footing; and in that case the transaction or agreement may be binding upon both, whatever knowledge they may afterwards come to acquire. But suppose the one party, while he affected ignorance of the facts, was perfectly aware how they stood, will it be maintained that the other party, upon discovering this, and ascertaining how much he had been imposed upon, would be bound by the agreement? The concealment in this case might be held equivalent to fraud; but, in truth, the only [411] legal ground for setting aside such an agreement is, that both parties did not stand upon an equal footing. The principle is the same, if, by any misrepresentation or concealment, the consent of the party is obtained to an agreement to which he would not otherwise have assented. In such cases, it is immaterial whether the misrepresentation has originated from fraud or from gross error. It is, in this sense, that the maxim of the civil law, "culpa lata dolo equiparatur," is to be understood (respecting the maxim "Culpa lata," etc. see Bell's Digest, voce Culpa lata, and authorities there cited). It is the same in its consequences or effects. It equally takes in the confidence of the party who is imposed upon, and produces an apparent consent to an act to which no true consent is given.

It was not because the appellant did not foresee all the consequences and results of this agreement that she now sought to set it aside, but it was because it is altogether a different agreement from what it was represented to be; and an agreement of course to which she never gave her consent. She consented to enter into this agreement upon receiving what was represented to be at least the double of what she could have claimed by the law of Scotland, as the widow of her late husband, but it now appears that this was a gross misrepresentation, and that she gets less by the agreement than she was entitled to claim by the law of Scotland in her own right as the widow of Mr. Stewart.

The Court treated the agreement in question as a transaction which, however unfair or unreasonable, could not be opened up, entirely overlooking that it was a transaction to which the appellant had never truly given her consent. In England relief has been given [412] in circumstances which seemed far less to require it. Thus, in Gordon v. Gordon (3 Swanston, 400), it was held by Lord Eldon (Ibid. 467) that a party was entitled to relief against an agreement, "on the principle that, though family agreements are to be supported where there is no fraud or mistake on either side, or none to which the other party is accessory, yet where there is mistake, though innocent, and the other party is accessory to it, this Court will interpose." And in the case of Murray v. Palmer (2 Schoale and Lefroy, 474), Lord Redesdale set aside a "conveyance obtained from a woman in ignorance of her rights, and upon misrepresentation of the circumstances of the property, although she was of full age, and acquiesced in the sale, and received the interest of the purchase money for twelve years, and although she consulted with her friends and had their assent, they being in equal ignorance with herself." It had been said, that in the present case there is no actual fraud alleged, however gross and inexcusable the misrepresentation might be, under which the appellant was made to act. This perhaps might admit of doubt, if fraud, as Lord Hardwicke (Earl of Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Vesey sen. 155) has said, may not only "be actual, arising from facts and circumstances of imposition, which is the plainest case," but also may be "apparent from the intrinsic nature and subject of the bargain itself, such as no man in his senses and not under delusion would make, on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other." Besides, upon the face of the agreement in question, and independently of all the written evidence by which the misrepresentation and [413] concealment practised upon the appellant are established, the deed bears such plain and intrinsic proofs of imposition, as to shew that it could not have been entered into, except under the influence of delusion, or by a person not capable of understanding her rights.

Respondents.—The averment of the appellant, that she entered into the agreement in question in ignorance of the fact now averred for setting it aside is not supported, but is, on the contrary, refuted by the evidence, while the error alleged to have been committed in point of law in arranging the terms of the agreement, is neither manifest, nor, although it were, is it a reason for disturbing the agreement, without evidence that it was caused by the fraud or fault of the respondent. Dixon (5 W. and S. App. 445) v. Monkland Canal Company, 17 Sept. 1831. The evidence in the cause establishes her knowledge of her husband's will.

If the contract or agreement be viewed as a "transaction," by which each gave up to the other part of what the law might have given them had they resorted to it, the appellant's grounds of reduction are still more untenable. The deed of argument set forth the doubts and conflicting opinions entertained "by different eminent counsel at the Scottish bar"—that "a trial at law of the very intricate questions arising thereon must be attended with very great delay, expense, and uncertainty. Therefore (it proceeds), and with a view to avoid litigation, and being mutually disposed to an amicable arrangement, we, the parties above named, the widow and next kin of the said [414] F. C. Stewart, have mutually consented, resolved, and agreed," etc. It might be proper to state the general result of the agreement as it affected the rights of parties involved in the different questions which it compromised and set at rest. On the one hand, the respondent gave up, 1st, his claim under the original agreement made with his brother, the appellant's husband, in July 1815, whereby the respondent was entitled to one fourth part of the rents or profits of the whole estates during his brother's possession; 2dly, his claim under the bond of provision made in his favour by his brother in May 1827; 3dly, his right to challenge, on the head of deathbed, the sale to Mr. Malcolm of the entailed lands of Kilmichael, at the price of £36,365, which had been sold by his brother's commissioners within sixty days of his death; and 4thly, any right which he might have had to challenge the previous sale, which had been made while his brother was an alien, before he obtained his act of naturalization. On the other hand, the appellant gave up the provisions in her favour, contained in the bonds or trust-deed of settlement executed by her husband; as also all claim to dower, jointure, annuity, terce of lands, third or half of moveables, through the decease of her husband, or his daughters, or either of them; but she did not give up her right to the estate of her husband, situated in America, under his will in her favour.

The principles of law applicable to such a transaction are very clearly laid down in Stair's Institute (b. i. tit. 7. sec. 9; and b. i. tit. 17. s. 2).

It was held in the case of M'Allister (M'Allister v. M'Allister, June 23, 1830; 4 Wilson and Shaw, 142), by the House of Lords (affirming the judgment of the Court of Ses-[415]-sion), "that a decree pronounced in reference to a question of English law, on the motion of the party challenging it, constituted res judicata; although he alleged he had acted under erroneous information as to the law of England." In that case there was what there is wanting here, clear and indisputable evidence that the party was misinformed as to the law, and did, upon the information thus given him, and upon it alone, give up a valuable succession. Still he was held bound by the contraction or transaction he had made. The Lord Chancellor observed, "If you choose to act upon the opinion of your agent, and not to examine evidence, you cannot say, after the judgment is pronounced, that you have now got evidence which you did not formerly produce." The mere circumstance in this case that the party who was her confidential agent and friend, and upon whose information the appellant says she relied, had acted as agent for the respondent in making up his titles, etc., does not appear at all to affect the decision in the above case as applicable to the present. The appellant knew that Mr. Wardlaw had so acted, and if she had had any suspicion that he would from that cause betray her interest, she might, if she did not actually do so, have taken other advice, as Mr. Wardlaw recommended. But she had no reason to distrust him. He had ever manifested a very strong and sincere regard for the interest of the appellant and her family. The respondent might, under the circumstances, have been excused had he entertained some suspicion that Mr. Wardlaw might incline to favour, if he could, the appellant in the transaction, considering that he had, in maintaining Mr. Stewart's rights to sell the [416] estates, acted in direct hostility to the interests of the respondent; and that the respondent was, in truth, confiding in the appellant's agent as his adviser, when, on being invited to join in the agreement, as proposed by him, and as its terms were arranged by him, he consented to do so.

The case of Hope v. Dickson, (17th December 1833, 12 S., D., and B., 222) founded on by the appellant, does not apply, as there were special circumstances which do not exist here.

There is evidence that the appellant, before concluding the agreement in question, was aware of all the facts now averred by her for setting it aside, and therefore there is no ground for questioning it, so far as depending on ignorance of fact; and in so far as it is attempted to disturb the agreement, on the ground of ignorantia juris, while it is by no means obvious that she ever had the rights which she says were unduly compromised by the agreement, it is submitted that the ground is insufficient, without evidence that the respondent misinformed her of her rights, or, by other unfair means, induced her to enter into the agreement, of which there is no evidence, or even an averment.

Lord Chancellor.—The object of this suit was to reduce and set aside a deed or agreement signed by the pursuer on the 12th February 1831 by which she and the defender, the brother, and Mrs. Tennent, the sister of the pursuer's late husband, entered into an arrangement as to various matters of dispute which had arisen between them respecting the property of the pursuer's late husband.

[417] A new arrangement having been made between the pursuer and Mrs. Tennent, the present contest is only with Ferdinand, her late husband's brother.

The summons states three grounds for the relief prayed; first, an objection in form, which has not been relied upon; secondly, that she was induced to sign the agreement in ignorance of her rights, being misled by the person who acted at the same time as her agent and as agent for the other parties; thirdly, that she was at the time ignorant of the existence of a will executed by the husband by which he gave to her all his personal property, or at least that the effect of the will was overlooked by her, and that the deed or agreement proceeded upon the footing that no such will existed.

It is important to examine the facts recited in the deed in question, and then, by comparing them with the facts proved, to consider how far they were, by misrepresentation or omission, inconsistent with the truth. The deed states the succession in 1815 of Frederick, the appellant's husband, to certain entailed estates in Scotland, and that it being uncertain whether he (then residing in and a native of the United States) or his uncle or the defender were entitled, they had agreed that the party in possession should pay to each of the others one fourth of the income during his own life, and during such time as his widow might receive dower: that Frederick, who possessed the estates, had not paid any thing to the defender under their agreement: that Frederick, being advised that the entail was not effectual, instituted a suit in the Court of Session against the heirs of entail, and in 1827 obtained an interlocutor declaring that he might sell the estates, but that he was bound to reinvest the purchase money: that he appealed to the House of Lords, but died [418] before the appeal was determined: that Frederick in 1824 sold part of the estates, and in 1827 the other part, and died on the 26th May 1827, and that an action had been brought by the purchaser of part of the estate to have his title confirmed or for repayment of the purchase money, which was still depending, and that it had been determined by the House of Lords that there was no obligation to reinvest the purchase money of the estates, and consequently that the price must be considered as falling under a certain trust deed of settlement before recited; namely, the deeds recited being first a mortis causa deed by Frederick, securing under the powers of the entail £1000 to Mary, his only child by his first marriage; secondly, heritable bonds securing to the appellant £100 per annum, but which are stated to have been renounced by her; thirdly, a bond of provision securing to his children with the former provision all he could by law charge upon the estate,—that is, for one child, one year's rent, to three or more, three years' rent; fourthly, a bond of annuity and provision securing to his wife £800 per annum; fifthly, making certain provisions for his mother and sister in the event of his being found to have dominion over the purchase money; and lastly, a trust deed of settlement, whereby he gave and disposed his whole heritable estate and effects in Great Britain to trustees, of whom Mr. Wardlaw was one, and whom he appointed his executor upon trust to pay his debts and legacies, and then one third of the income to his wife for life, the other annuity to be taken in part, and to pay over and divide the residue amongst his children, to be paid at twenty-one or on marriage; that he left only two children, Mary by his first marriage, who died in 1827, and Letitia by the appellant, who died 6th August [419] 1829; and that it was uncertain, owing to various circumstances, upon whom had devolved the right of succession to the prices of the said lands so far as unconsumed, and to the other personal estate left by him and his daughters; and that conflicting opinions were entertained on the point by different eminent counsel at the Scottish bar; and that a trial at law of the very intricate questions arising thereon must be attended with very great delay, expense, and uncertainty.

Therefore, the parties agree that the free proceeds of the whole estate and effects left by Frederick and his daughters in Great Britain or elsewhere in Europe, other than the entailed estates, should be equally divided between the appellant the widow, the respondent the brother, and Mrs. Tennent the sister; but it was agreed that this arrangement should not extend to any part of the entailed estates unsold or ineffectually disposed of at the time of Frederick's death, nor to any estate, property, or effects of him or of his daughters in America, the appellant taking such one third in full of all other demands in right of her husband or of his daughters, and the respondent taking his one third in full of his claim under the agreement with Frederick in America, and all declaring that any testament which Frederick had executed, if any such there be, in reference to his property in America, should take effect without being affected by the agreement.

It is to be observed that there is no inaccuracy, in point of fact, in the statement in this deed which could have misled the pursuer, of the two points relied upon by the pursuer, namely, the will of Frederick disposing of his personal estate, and the widow's title to the jus relictæ. The existence of a will is referred to as affecting property in America, and the share of the widow [420] under the agreement is expressed to be in full of dower, jointure, annuity, terce of lands, third of half or moveables, and every thing else which she could ask or claim through the decease of her husband or his said daughters, or either of them, in any manner of way.

It is, however, contended that the pursuer entered into this arrangement in ignorance of her rights upon both these grounds, which rights, it is said, were such that if they had been understood by her would have prevented her from acceding to the terms, as she only had secured to her what she was at all events entitled to, and that she thereby simply renounced all chance of a favourable decision in her favour upon the points really in doubt.

It is necessary to examine accurately the evidence in the cause as to these two points before the application of the principles of law to the case can be usefully considered.

In the first place it is to be observed, that there is not the slightest ground for imputing any fraud, procurement, or misrepresentation on the part of Professor Stewart, the other party to the negotiation. Indeed no attempt was made to rest the pursuer's case upon any conduct of his. Mr. Wardlaw must, I think, be considered as acting for both parties as he corresponded with both upon the proposed compromise, and before it was concluded, was in fact agent for both, and it is upon his conduct that the pursuer principally relies. After carefully examining all the documents in evidence I have no difficulty in concurring in the opinion expressed by all the Judges below that there is no ground for imputing any improper motive to Mr. Wardlaw, or of any intention to favour the respondent at the expense of the appellant. There are indeed but two circum-[421]-stances upon which any argument in support of such a supposition can be founded. The first is his letter of 2d October 1830 observed upon by Lord Medwyn (see Appendix to appellant's case, p. 63), and the other is the fact that Professor Stewart consulted other counsel before he signed the agreement by which it is inferred that he had obtained information upon the rights of the parties which the appellants had not. As to the latter, I do not find it in evidence what this advice was; and as the appellant had seen the opinion of Mr. (now Lord) Jeffrey and of Mr. Rutherford, now Lord Advocate, upon the whole case, in which the will is brought under notice, I cannot think the fact of another opinion having been taken by Professor Stewart of any importance. As to the expression in the letter of 2d October 1830, "Mrs C. Stewart has never written to me withdrawing her consent, although the decision in the House of Peers has given the case a better aspect in her favour;" it does not appear why that decision should have induced her to withdraw her consent. If indeed the decision had been the other way, there would not have been any thing upon which the agreement could operate; but as the proposition was made in contemplation of such a decision, there seems no reason why either party should upon its taking place wish to withdraw from it.

I must therefore assume, because such I think to be the result of the evidence, that Mr. Wardlaw acted fairly, honestly, and to the best of his judgment in concluding the arrangement complained of, and that the pursuer's case must stand upon an imputed error in law of the common agent of all parties.*

[422] Of the principal question which existed between the parties it is not necessary to say much; I mean that of the domicile of Frederick, the appellant's husband. The circumstances created a serious difficulty. The facts were honestly and I think fairly stated for the opinion of two very eminent lawyers in Scotland. They thought the case doubtful, and recommended a compromise (see opinion of counsel, antea, p. 402); and if the division of the property had taken place upon the principle of the chances of success being equal to both parties, upon that question there could have been no pretence for impeaching the arrangement.

Upon the question of the will I have felt no difficulty. No doubt the terms used are general enough taken by themselves to pass personal property of every description, but it is equally clear that such was not the testator's intention. By his bonds of provision in favour of his wife and children, and by the trust disposition, he had disposed of all he could dispose of in Great Britain. He then made the will, giving his personal estate to his wife, but referring to no subject matter except what was American; and next executed bonds in favour of his brother and sister burdening his Scotch estates, and by a holograph writ found by his widow with the trust disposition and will, he directs the will to be sent to America, and mentions the trust disposition as disposing of the property in Scotland. This will the appellant had during the whole negotiation in her possession, and it does not appear that Mr. Wardlaw had any knowledge of it; indeed the appellant's [423] letter of 17th March 1832 admits that he had not, but the agreement of compromise refers to it as applying to American property only. On 24th December the appellant having objected to the division of the funds under the agreement, demanded £1000 more from the respondent, stating that she was desirous of completing the agreement, but that she would not complete it on any other terms; and on 21st January 1832 she gave a receipt for £1000 to the respondent, which stated that it was paid in terms of the proposal contained in her letter of 24th December, and agreed to by his letter of 20th April, although she had before that time made a claim to all the property upon the expression used in the will, as appears by her letter of 17th March 1832.

Under these circumstances, it is not matter of surprise that the appellant did not in the first instance claim the property in Scotland under this will, or that having at last set up such claim, she abandoned it, and agreed to confirm the agreement without reference to it. Clearly, after this, there can be no question of impeaching the compromise upon any supposed title of the appellant to the property in Scotland under the will.

The only question of any difficulty remains to be considered, namely, the right of the appellant upon her husband's death to repudiate the provisions he had made * Lord Glenlee.—"It was a very poor compliment to the agent to say he had acted blamelessly. I have read the papers with a desire, if possible, to discover a fault, but so far have I been from doing so that I think it right to say that he acted a most friendly and judicious part throughout."—Rep. in F. C.

for her, and to claim her jus relictae. As to this the facts, as I collect them from the very numerous documents in the case, are as follow.

At the time of the death of the appellant's husband he had sold most, but not all, his entailed estates. The Court of Session had declared that he had a right so to do, but that he was bound to reinvest the purchase monies; against which latter declaration he had ap-[424]-pealed to the House of Lords, which appeal was then pending. In the disposition of his property he had provided for either event. If the judgment was to be affirmed, and the property therefore was to pass to the heirs of entail, he had, to the extent of his powers, charged upon the estate provision for his wife and daughters, and by the trust disposition he had, in the event of that judgment being reversed, given to his wife a life income in one third, and the residus equally between his daughters. In the one case it is stated that the widow's income would be £600 per annum, and in the other £800; but in neither, according to his disposition, would she have any power over any part of the capital.

It is quite clear that pending the appeal to the House of Lords she could not repudiate the provisions and claim the jus relictae, because in the event of the judgment being affirmed there would be no fund upon which it could operate; and if she had been apprised of her right to elect, it is hardly to be supposed that she would have exercised it as against her own daughter, and her daughter-in-law; it appears in fact that she did take the benefit of the provisions; indeed the receipt she gave to the respondent on the 21st January 1832 was expressed to be on account of the annuity payable to her from the estate of her husband to February 1831, the date of the agreement by which she in terms renounced all the provisions made for her by her husband, the jointure, dower, terce of lands, half or third of moveables, and every thing else which she could ask or claim through the decease of her husband or his daughters, or either of them, any manner of way. But this acceptance of his provision, and this renunciation of her rights as widow, ought not, it is said, to prejudice her; but that the compromise ought to be [425] set aside because she was ignorant of her right to repudiate the provisions and to claim the jus relictae; and notwithstanding some passages in her letters which were relied upon to prove the contrary, I think that the fair result of the evidence, unless she had for some reason abandoned it, is, that she was not aware of her having any such right, and that the agreement was concluded upon the supposition that her only title against her husband's property was to the provisions he had made for her. I think it equally clear that such was the impression upon Mr. Wardlaw's mind, for such were his representations both to the appellant and to the respondent. But whether this arose from any misapprehension of the rule of law, or from his knowledge of any act of hers amounting to or regulating her election, does not appear.

It is to be observed that in the memorial or case submitted to Mr. Jeffrey and Mr. Rutherford the facts material to raise this question are fully and fairly stated; and the sixth question put is, Whether Mr. Stewart's widow was entitled to any share of the succession? to which the answer was, "On the supposition of the laws of Scotland regulating the succession of Mrs. Stewart and her children, in which view alone this question is of importance, we are of opinion that the widow has no right whatever to any part of the funds, except in so far as she claims her share of the goods in communion or under Mr. Stewart's trust deed."

The opinion was sent to the appellant in a letter from Mr. Wardlaw, dated 6th April 1830, in which he tells her, that from the opinion she will find that if the law of Scotland is to be the rule she would get none of the money except the annuity for life; whereas, by the pro-[426]-posed division into three parts, she would have £20,000, which would leave an income of about £800 per annum, and the capital at her disposal.

This certainly does not accurately represent the opinion it purports to explain, unless he knew of facts excluding her election; and if he did not it is to me evident that this inaccuracy was unintentional. Indeed it appears that Mr. Wardlaw submitted a draft of the agreement to the same counsel, in which Mr. Stewart, in consideration of the one third of the proceeds of the sales, renounces all other claims; and in the letter to Mr. Rutherford which accompanied it represents it as in conformity to the advice they had given, and desires him to approve the draft if thought applicable to the circumstances. The draft was approved, and this reference being had to this letter was not incorrectly represented in Mr. Wardlaw's letter of 3d December as a recommendation of the measure, which was much observed upon as giving a character to the approval of the draft which did not belong to it.

Now this draft stated all the facts upon which the appellant's right to claim the jus relictæ depends. The inadequacy of the consideration now relied upon, regard being had to such right was as much submitted to the consideration of those very eminent counsel as it could have been to Mr. Wardlaw; but they approved of the draft, which they were only to do if they thought it applicable to the circumstances, and thereby may be supposed to have approved of the proposed terms of compromise without again raising or suggesting the point upon which it is now sought to be set aside. In fact, beyond what is suggested in the opinion of 3d April 1830, the point does not appear to have occurred to any of the parties; and the question is, [427] whether a compromise and arrangement fairly and honestly entered into, in which the party now complaining acted under the advice of a professional adviser, who called to his assistance two of the most distinguished counsel of the Scotch bar, is to be set aside, because a point was overlooked in that party's case, which, if thought of at the time, might have prevented her from agreeing to the terms proposed, as it might have made a very material difference in the relative situation of the parties.

It must not, however, be assumed she only got what she must at all events have been entitled to, because had she at that time repudiated the provision made for her by her husband, and claimed the jus relictæ, the benefit she would have taken would have been subject to reduction from some of the circumstances alluded to by the respondent's counsel; but to those I think it unnecessary to advert, because the difference between what she was supposed to be entitled to, and what she might have derived, was, even after such deductions, considerable. The principle how far such an oversight will entitle a party to have the whole arrangement rescinded, may be considered without ascertaining the precise extent of the loss it may be supposed to have occasioned. If, indeed, it had appeared that the respondent had, upon the faith of this compromise, abandoned a case which otherwise he might have prosecuted against a purchaser, of setting aside the sale upon the ground of deathbed, an answer would at once have been given to the pursuer's case, as it would be impossible to restore the respondent to his original situation. The estate in question is not indeed enumerated in the exception in the agreement; but the exception applies to all other parts of the estate ineffectually disposed of, [428] which it would seem must include a sale reducible upon the ground of deathbed. I do not therefore rely upon that as a material circumstance, but proceed to consider the rule of law in this country and in Scotland, with reference to the alleged error or omission in the legal advice under which the appellant was acting, when she executed the deed of compromise and arrangement; and in doing this it must be kept in mind, that the mistake is upon a point of law only, and that not of foreign but of Scotch law. All the facts raising the point of law were fully known to all the parties; and the point of law, mistaken or not, attended to was, that the pursuer was entitled to repudiate the provisions made for her by her deceased husband, and to claim the jus relictæ; whereas the negotiation and the compromise proceeded upon the supposition, that if the law of Scotland was to prevail, she could only claim the benefit of those provisions.

The English authorities (though in the result altogether they appear to me to establish a sufficiently clear principle,) are not all consistent. One of the earliest is Frank v. Frank in 1 Chancery Cases, 84. It must be assumed that the fraud there alleged was not proved; but there being no proof of the recovery, the eldest brother had given up the freehold lands to the younger without consideration, upon a misapprehension of fact. But yet the Court denied him any relief, upon the ground that modus et conventio vincunt legem. Cann v. Cann, in 1 Peere Williams, 723, though often quoted upon this subject, and though valuable as recognizing the doctrine, is not for the fact of it of much importance, because the party seeking to be relieved from the agreement of compromise failed to prove that he had been injured by it.

[429] Lansdown v. Lansdown, in Mosely (case 190), p. 364, and also referred to in a note in 2 Jacob and Walker, 205, from the register's book, is a very strong case of setting aside a compromise, and a conveyance in pursuance of it; but it is impossible to ascertain the facts. It appears that fraud was alleged against the younger brother, and Hughes, who had advised upon the rights of the two, was made a defendant, which could only have been upon an imputation of fraud; and in Mosely it is said, that the Lord Chancellor's decree proceeded upon the ground of the deeds "being obtained by mistake and misrepresentation;" but Mr. Jacob's extract from the register's book, no doubt correct, states the ground to be the deeds being "obtained by a mistake and misrepresentation of the law." It is, however, to be observed, that in Mosely the eldest son is reported to have said, that he would rather divide the estate than go to law, though he had the right; and that the Court is represented to have said, that the maxim that ignorantia juris non excusat did not hold in civil cases, which it will be seen has not been a doctrine recognized in modern cases. In Stapilton v. Stapilton, 1 Atkyns, p. 2, Henry, the eldest son, being illegitimate, Philip, the second son, received no consideration for the arrangement by which the estates, of which Philip was tenant in tail, subject to his father's life, were divided between them; but Lord Hardwicke (1 Atky. 10) approving the doctrine of Lord Macclesfield (1 P. Wms. 727) in Cann v. Cann, that "an agreement, entered into upon a supposition of a right or of a doubtful right, though it after comes out that the right was on the other side, shall be binding; and the right shall not prevail against the agreement [430] of the parties, for the right must always be on one side or the other; and therefore the compromise of a doubtful right is a sufficient foundation for an agreement," and he therefore maintained the arrangement, and decreed a performance of what remained to be done to carry it into effect.

In Pullen v. Ready, 2 Atkyns, p. 587, there was an agreement to divide property between brothers and sisters, upon the assumption that all were entitled under a will; and the fact that one of them had married without consent, which was by the will made a ground of forfeiture, did not appear to have been adverted to. Lord Hardwicke enforced the agreement, and, with reference to the argument, that although the marriage having been without consent must have been known to all the parties, yet that the consequences in law might not, observed (2 Atky. 591), "If parties are entering into an agreement, and the very will out of which the forfeiture arose is lying before them and their counsel, while the drafts are preparing, the parties shall be supposed to be acquainted with the consequences of law as to this point, and not be relieved under a pretence of being surprised with such strong circumstances attending it."

Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. sen., 126, was not a case of compromise, but of a sale by the defendant to the plaintiff of an estate which was already his, and a return of the purchase money was decreed at the rolls, upon the ground of mistake. This case does not bear, therefore, directly upon the present. If it were necessary to consider the principle of that decree, it might not be easy to distinguish that case from any other purchase in which the vendor turns out to have had no title. In both there is a mistake, and the effect of it in both is, that the vendor receives, and purchaser pays money, without the intended equivalent. In Gibbons v. Caunt, 4 Vesey, 839, Lord Alvanley, speaking of agreements of compromise, says (4 Ves. p. 848), "If parties will, with full knowledge" "of the doubts and difficulties" "as to their rights," act upon them, though it turns out that one gains a great advantage, if the agreement was fair and reasonable at the time, it shall be binding. There was a case before the Lord Chancellor, who spoke to me upon it, in which it was held that the Court will enforce such an agreement, though it turns out that the parties were mistaken in point of law, even supposing counsel's opinion was wrong."

Bilbie v. Lumley, 2 East, p. 469, is directly opposed to the doctrine upon which Lansdowne v. Lansdowne is stated in Mosely to have been decided, for it was held that money paid by one, with full knowledge or the means of knowledge in his hands of all the circumstances, cannot be recovered back again on account of such payment having been made under an ignorance of the law.

In Leonard v. Leonard, 2 Ball and Beattie, p. 171, Lord Mannors, and, in Stockley v. Stockley (1 Ves. and Bea. 23), Lord Eldon, recognized the rule of equity as to agreements by way of compromise, particularly in family arrangements. In Dunmage v. White, 1 Swanston, p. 137, Sir Thomas Plumer refused to carry into effect an arrangement by way of compromise, but the circumstances were very peculiar. The parties had dealt with property which had belonged to the children, and over [432] which they had no power, and the state of mind of one of the parties was relied upon in the judgment.

Gordon v. Gordon, in 3 Swanston, p. 477, proceeded upon a fraudulent suppression; but Lord Eldon fully recognized the rule, holding, that where there is good faith, honest intention, and full disclosure, if the members of a family will arrange their rights amongst themselves, their agreement will not be disturbed; because it is founded upon a supposition which imputes the character of legitimacy to the illegitimate, or illegitimacy to the legitimate.

In the third volume of Mr. Burge's excellent work (Commentaries on Colonial and Foreign Laws generally, and in their Conflict with each other, and with the Law of England, by W. Burge, Esq., Q.C., 4 vols. Lond. 1838), Commentaries on Colonial and Foreign Laws, p. 742, the authorities quoted from the civil law prove the recognition by that law of a similar principle. He draws this conclusion from them. Hence it is no ground for recalling the payment made under the compromise, that there was no cause for the compromise, and that nothing was owing. And again, the inadequacy of the benefit which the party may receive from the compromise, even though it should amount to laesio enormis, would not afford a ground for setting it aside, unless there had been fraud. It has indeed been said in some of the English cases, and particularly by Lord Alvanley, in Gibbons v. Caunt, 4 Vesey, 849, that the parties must be aware of the claims which are to be the subject of the compromise, and that they must act with full knowledge of all the doubts and difficulties that arise.

It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to inquire how far that exception to the general rule can [433] be supported, or how it is reconcilable with the principle, that mistake as to the law will not invalidate a compromise, because the claim of the widow to her share of the goods in communion is expressly pointed out to her, in the opinion of Mr. Jeffrey and Mr. Rutherford; and although it may well be supposed that she had not herself sufficient knowledge of the law of Scotland to understand the meaning of the terms used, they must be supposed to have been fully understood by her legal adviser, Mr. Wardlaw. It is true that he does not in his correspondence call her attention to this claim; and, he being dead, it is now impossible to ascertain from what cause this proceeded, whether because she had before elected not to make such claim, or from inattention on his part; nor is it material, because, in the absence of all evidence of fraud on the part of the agent, the client must be bound by his acts, and affected by the information he received. If it were necessary to show knowledge in the principal, and a distinct understanding of all the rights and interests affected by the complicated arrangements which are constantly taking place in families, very few, if any, could be supported.

That the laws of Scotland adopt the same principle as the laws of England upon this subject is proved by the passages quoted from Lord Stair's Institutes, b. 1. tit. 7. s. 9., and tit. 17. s. 2., and from the cases of Macalister v. Macalister, in 1830, 4 Wilson and Shaw, 142, and Dixon v. Monkland Canal Company, 5 Wilson and Shaw, 445, to which is opposed the single case of Hope v. Dickson, 1833, in 12 Shaw and Dunlop, 222, which was a case of homologation, and not of compromise.

[434] These authorities, indeed, prove that the principle is the same in the law of Scotland as in the law of England, and in the civil law; but as the instances in which it has been the subject of decision are comparatively few in Scotland, and as it has so frequently been the subject of adjudication by judges of the highest authority in this country, I have thought that it might be useful to bring together the principal cases in which it has been recognized and enforced in this country. The result is, that, in my opinion, the appellant has failed to establish any case of fraud or improper conduct in her agent, and that the points of law relied upon do not entitle her to be relieved from the arrangement she has entered into.

The interlocutor appealed from must therefore be affirmed, with costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutors therein complained of be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellant do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is also further ordered, That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

[435] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

JAMES EWING,* WILLIAM DUNN, and the MAGISTRATES and TOWN COUNCIL of GLASGOW, Appellants.—Attorney General (Sir John Campbell)—Knight Bruce; Rev. JOHN BURNS, D.D., and others.—Lord Advocate (Rutherford)—Pemberton.—A. M'Neill [6th June 1839].

Poor.—Parish.—Stat. 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 88.—Where lands had been disjoined and separated by act of parliament from a parish in which the same had been previously assessed for poor rates, and annexed to and made part of the extended royalty of a burgh;—In an action by the kirk session of the original parish against the owners and occupiers of houses on the disjoined lands for payment of the proportion of poor rates leviable on said lands, as if still liable to the original parish, and against the magistrates and council of the burgh, as liable in relief to the other private defenders:—Held upon construction of the act of parliament (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), 1, That the owners and occupiers of houses on the lands so disjoined were not subject to their former liability for poor rates to the original parish, and also that the magistrates and council were not liable directly to the original parish, or in relief to the other defenders for such poor rates; 2, (also reversing as aforesaid) That an action directed not only against the alleged primary obligants but also against other parties as liable in relief to them, and a decree following thereon by which the parties as liable in relief [436] were ordained to make payment of sums decerned for against the primary obligants, in the event of such primary obligants failing to pay, were incompetent.

Consuetude:—Held that usage, or acquiescence in a particular construction of a statute, founded upon alleged circumstances and practice, to which the individual defenders were not parties, could not relevantly be admitted as evidence of such construction to be binding on those defenders.

In 1772 the property of the lands of Ramshorn and Meadowflat, part of and situated in the barony parish, was acquired by the magistrates of Glasgow. These lands continued to be liable for and to pay the assessments for the poor and other burdens to the barony parish, thus yielding a considerable sum in consequence of the increased value of the property and buildings thereon.

The magistrates of Glasgow having about the end of the last century contemplated an extension of the royalty by act of parliament, various communings took place betwixt the heritors of the barony parish and the magistrates with reference to the introduction of a clause into the proposed bill providing against the lands intended to be annexed to the royalty being relieved from supporting the poor of the barony parish. In the beginning of 1800 the trades house, who held part of these lands, passed the following resolution:—"That the said provost, magistrates, and council would not only free and relieve the inhabitants of the barony parish whose property is to be annexed to the royalty, of the statute labour, but also of the poor's rates in the said parish."

* Rep. 15 D., B., and M., 936.

In the year 1800 a statute was passed (39 and 40 Geo. 3. c. 88,) intituled "An act for extending the royalty of [437] the city of Glasgow over certain adjacent lands, for paving, lighting," etc., "and for raising funds and giving certain powers to the magistrates and council, and town and dean of guild courts for the above and other purposes."

In the preamble it was set forth that "it is just and reasonable that the royalty of the said city should be extended over those lands, in consideration of the expense incurred in purchasing the same, and of the further sums of money which must be expended in paving therein, etc.; and also for the equal apportioning of the public burdens and benefits among all the inhabitants of the place."

By the second section the magistrates and council were "empowered to levy the same malls, duties, customs, conversion of statute labour, and other taxes within the said annexed grounds, as they are entitled to levy within the present royalty."

By the third section it was provided, "that the magistrates and town council shall hereafter pay, from the money raised for the conversion of the statute labour within the said city, to the heritors legally appointed to repair and maintain the public roads in the western district of the barony parish of Glasgow, £5 sterling yearly, as a conversion for the statute labour of the said annexed lands, and shall also, from the funds of the community of the said city, relieve the holders and occupiers of houses or lands in the said extended royalty of the poor's rates payable by them to the said barony parish as having been a part thereof before passing this act."

By the sixth section it was provided, "that it shall be competent to the sheriff and justices of the peace [438] for the county of Lanark to exercise the same powers and jurisdictions within the said lands hereby annexed to and comprehended within the said royalty, as are competent to the said sheriff and justices of the peace within the ancient royalty."

The tenure of the lands continued in virtue of the seventh section unchanged.

By the eight section it was enacted, "that the said magistrates and town council shall have full power to appoint stent masters, assessors, and collectors to assess and to levy from the proprietors and occupiers or possessors of the said annexed grounds, and of all such houses as are built or hereafter shall be built upon the foresaid grounds hereby annexed to and comprehended within the said royalty, an equal and rateable portion of the cess, trades stent, poor's rates, conversion of statute labour, and other taxes payable by the inhabitants of the city of Glasgow, in the same manner as they are now levied within the present royalty."

The tenth section provided, "that the several lands hereby annexed to the royalty of the city of Glasgow, besides the cess to be levied by the collectors of the town for and in respect of the houses and buildings erected thereon, shall remain liable and be subjected to the payment of a rateable proportion of the cess or land tax, and other public burdens imposed or to be imposed on the shire of Lanark for and in respect of the ground, which cess shall be paid by the magistrates and town council of the said city from the funds of the community, and shall be levied in the usual manner."

The eleventh section enacted as follows:—"And be [439] it enacted, that the said grounds hereby annexed to and comprehended within the royalty of the city of Glasgow, shall be and the same is hereby for ever separated from the barony parish, and are hereby annexed to the parishes within the said city to which they lie most contiguous, or to which the magistrates and town council shall by any act or acts of council hereafter direct and appoint."

The twelfth section provided, "that the tithes payable out of the lands hereby annexed shall be saved and reserved to the true owners thereof in the same manner as if this act had never passed."

The thirteenth section enacted, "that the right of patronage of such church and churches as shall be built and endowed by the community of the city of Glasgow upon any of the said lands hereby annexed to and within the said royalty, shall and the same is hereby declared to belong to the magistrates and town council of the said city, in the same manner as they hold and enjoy the patronage of the churches within the ancient royalty."

The fourteenth section was in these terms:—"Saving always, and reserving to His Majesty, and all other person or persons concerned, all rights and interest, other than the present extension of the said royalty, which they had, have, or may have in the lands hereby annexed."

The act also contained provisions relative to paving, lighting, and cleansing the streets of the city, regulating the police, and appointing officers and watchmen, dividing the city into wards, appointing commissioners, raising funds, regulating markets, recovering penalties, and the limitation of actions, etc., which [440] are followed by this proviso in section ninety-ninth:—"And be it enacted, that all regulations, provisions, and other things whatsoever herein-before enacted, shall be equally applicable and shall extend and be construed to extend to the lands hereby annexed to and comprehended within the royalty of the said city, as to those comprehended in the ancient royalty of the said city in so far as is consistent with the former parts of this act, and excepting as hereinbefore expressly excepted."

After this act of annexation took effect, and down to the year 1810, the heritors and kirk session of the barony parish raised the sums required for the support of the poor by assessing the heritors of the annexed lands according to the valued rent, the magistrates actually paying the sums so assessed. In the year 1811 it became necessary to increase the amount of the assessment for the poor, and to lay the valuation upon the real rent instead of the valued rent, thus making householders as well as heritors liable. The magistrates and council remitted to a select committee to inquire into the question of liability, who in a report expressed their conviction that looking to the statute the increased demand would not be resisted. The report was approved and acted on. It did not appear that the householders on the annexed lands were parties to this report.

The magistrates continued, down to 1831, to pay the share of the poor rates apportioned on the inhabitants of the extended royalty; the largest sum levied in any one year in respect of the property within the royalty being £1795.

In 1831 the barony parish having demanded from [441] the magistrates and council a larger sum than had been collected, the magistrates and council, in December of that year, intimated their intention to resist farther payments until their liabilities were judicially determined.

Two of the wealthy inhabitants of the extended royalty, Mr. Ewing and Mr. Dunn, were in arrear in the payment of poor rates for the respective sums of £27 and £26 for the years 1830, 1831, and 1832.

In June 1833, in order to try the question and to recover the large arrears of poor rates then due, Dr. Burns, and Dr. Black his assistant and successor, ministers of the barony parish, for themselves and the other members of the kirk session, and William Robertson, the collector appointed by the heritors and kirk session, brought an action against Ewing and Dunn as individual heritors and householders, and against the magistrates and council, founding on the provisions of the third and other sections of the aforesaid statute; and setting forth, "That the intendment, legal import, and effect of the statute was to leave the properties of the defenders and the other heritors in a similar situation within the said extended royalty, subject to a rateable share with those of all the other heritors of the said barony parish, of the annual burden of supporting and maintaining the poor in all time coming, reserving the right of heritors to relief of the sums from the magistrates of Glasgow, as the burdens might arise or be imposed; or otherwise, to render the magistrates and council of Glasgow, as representing the community, directly liable to the pursuers and their successors for such assessments as might be imposed on the [442] properties of the said heritors in the part foresaid of the said extended royalty"; and concluding that the said James Ewing ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree of the lords of our council and session, to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £27 6s. sterling, with the legal interest thereof, or of the foresaid respective portions thereof" (specifying the items); "and the said William Dunn ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £26 6s. 6d. sterling, with the legal interest thereof, or of the foresaid respective portions thereof as follows" (specifying the items), "reserving right to the defenders and to each of them to claim such relief from the magistrates of Glasgow as they or either of them may be able to establish in the premises; or otherwise, in case it should be found that the magistrates of Glasgow are now directly liable to the pursuers in the said sums, then and in that case the Lord Provost of the city of Glasgow, and magistrates of the said city, and the other members of the town council thereof, as representing the community of the said city, and their successors in office, ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree of the lords of our council and session, to make payment to the pursuers of the several sums of money, principal and interest, above specified; and the said defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained to pay the expenses of the process."

In defence Messrs. Ewing and Dunn pleaded, 1, that they are not liable, in respect of their properties libelled, for the support of the poor of the barony parish, as that parish now exists, and are not liable, [443] directly or indirectly, to be assessed therefor by the heritors and kirk session of that parish, or otherwise; 2, that on the contrary they are, along with the other inhabitants within burgh, liable for the support of the poor of the city of Glasgow alienarily; 3, that, having accordingly been assessed for the support of the burgh poor, and having regularly paid their assessments, the present action is wholly groundless as regards them, and they ought to be assolizied simpliciter from its conclusion, with expenses.

The magistrates and town council, referring to the separate defences for Messrs. Ewing and Dunn, pleaded that the sole ground on which the pursuers pretend to rest their case against them, is the enactment in section three of the statute, viz., "That the said magistrates and town council shall also, from the funds of the community of the said city, relieve the holders and occupiers of houses or lands in the said extended royalty of the poor's rates payable by them to the said barony parish, as having been a part thereof before passing this act;" and such being the case, they were not liable to the pursuers in the sums pursued for, or in any part thereof.

The cause having been debated in the Outer House, Lord Jeffrey, Ordinary, 15th March 1836, pronounced the following interlocutor, with a relative explanatory note *

* Note.—"The Lord Ordinary cannot persuade himself that there is any difficulty in this case, and thinks that it is impossible to read attentively through the fourteen first sections of the act, as they stand in their order, and entertain any doubt as to their true meaning and effect.

"The defenders, at the debate, did not find it convenient to proceed in this natural course. They went at once to the eleventh section, which provides in general terms for the disjunction of the annexed lands from the barony parish, and their annexation to the parishes of the old royalty: and then, contending that this disjunction, not being in any way qualified or limited in its terms, imported a total separation, and consequent liberation from all future parochial burdens in the parish from which they are disjoined, they went to the second section (as illustrated by the eighth,) to shew that they were accordingly subjected to a new, and, as they maintained, substituted set of burdens, in their new connection; and argued that, as a double liability was in no case to be presumed without express words, this was a conclusive confirmation of their views as to the effect of the absolute disjunction. They then proceeded to point out the very different terms in which the future payments of cess and statute labour money to the county, from which the annexed lands were disjoined, are provided for in the act, and the provisions there supposed to be made for future poor assessments; and concluded by suggesting that these last provisions, which they represented as being merely for relief from contingent and imaginary claims, must have been inserted to satisfy the groundless anxiety or apprehensions of the owners of the annexed property, but could never be held to import that the claims themselves were just or maintainable.

"The Lord Ordinary takes a very different view of the object and effect of the statute. It was enacted on the petition of the magistrates, and for the purpose of conferring a great benefit on the city, by putting under its municipal jurisdiction, and subjecting to its burghal assessments, a very wealthy and flourishing quarter of the actual town; at the same time, it was obvious that if this rich assessable district was to be entirely withdrawn from the parish and the county to which it formerly belonged, and exempted from all future contributions to their local taxations, a great loss would be sustained by these communities, and a proportionally heavier burden laid on what remained of them. It was necessary, therefore, to provide for this by special enactments; and it is impossible to read the act, and have any doubt as to the principle on which these are framed. That principle is, annexed thereto:—"The Lord Ordi-[444]-nary, having resumed consideration of the debate, with the closed record, productions for the parties, [445] and whole beyond all question, that the annexed lands shall be liable to a double assessment, but that the owners or occupiers shall only pay those chargeable for the city, and be relieved of such as continued due to the county or parish, by the public funds, or some particular branch of the public funds of the city. That this is the case as to the cess and all the other proper county burdens, and the statute labour, cannot possibly be disputed; and as there were obviously as strong, if not still stronger, reasons for applying the same principle to the assessments for the poor, the Lord Ordinary would not have hesitated to construe any doubtful or ambiguous words in the provision as to these assessments upon that assumption, and according to the analogy of the kindred provisions, as to which there was no doubt. But in fact it does not appear to him that the words, even if they stood by themselves, are in the least degree doubtful or ambiguous. The provision as to the cess, etc. (section 10) is, that besides the cess to be levied from the annexed lands for the town, they should also remain liable to their rateable proportion of the county cess, and all other county burdens; 'which cess,' etc. it is added, 'shall be paid by the magistrates and town council of the said city from the funds of the community.' Then, as to the statute labour, it is specially provided (and obviously in terms of a previous agreement), that an annual sum of £5 shall be paid by the said magistrates and town council to the heritors of the barony parish, 'as a conversion for the statute labour of the said annexed lands;' and then immediately after, and as the sequel of the same section, follows the provision as to the poor rates, in these words:— 'And they (the magistrates and council) shall also, from the funds of the said city, relieve the owners and occupiers of lands and houses in the said extended royalty, of the poor's rates payable by them to the said barony parish as having been a part thereof, before passing this act.' If this does not mean that the annexed lands were still to pay poor's rates (as well as cess and statute labour money) to the barony parish, and that the magistrates were to protect the owners and occupiers, by paying these rates for them out of the public funds, it is not easy to conceive what it does mean.

"Accordingly, the defenders are driven to great straits to give it a meaning; and actually maintained, at the debate, first, that the whole of this provision about the poor's rates really had no meaning, and must have been inserted by mistake, or per incuriam; and next, that it could only have been inserted to satisfy the groundless apprehensions of the owners and occupiers as to possible, but evidently incompetent claims on the part of the barony parish; or finally, that it might possibly relate to the arrears of former assessments. It is not thought necessary to make any remarks on these extraordinary suppositions.

"The variance in the phraseology, and indeed in the substance of the arrangements as to the cess and other county burdens, the statute labour and the poor's rates, on which the defenders dwelt largely, is very easily explained. The principle, it has been seen, is the same as to all; but the arrangements for carrying it into effect are naturally different, and the expression accordingly varies. The cess being a fixed and invariable sum, the provision is merely that it shall be annually paid over by the city, and there was in that case no need for any other arrangement. The statute labour assessment again was liable to fluctuation, though not to any great extent; and it was quite practicable, therefore, and seems to have been thought more convenient, to fix an average amount in the statute, which should be paid in all time coming, as its conversion. But the poor assessments were liable to great and incalculable variations; and (as the result has shewn) no fixed average could have been taken with any tolerable safety, as the rule of contribution in all time coming. They were, therefore, left to be settled as before by the annual assessments; and as these assessments must necessarily be made on the individual owners and occupiers of the annexed property, the burden taken by the magistrates is correctly expressed as an obligation to relieve those individuals, against whom personally a charge must have been first constituted, before the amount to be paid for them by the magistrates could in any one year be ascertained. The whole provisions, therefore, as to each and all of these county and parish burdens, are not only perfectly congruous and process, finds, that according to the just and true construction of the act of the 39 and 40 Geo. 3. [446] c. 88., the lands thereby annexed to the royalty of the city identical in substance, but the particular arrangements and expressions as to each are judiciously adapted for carrying the principle into effect.

"After this plain exposition of the words of the act, it can scarcely be necessary to say any thing as to the defenders main argument, that the general terms of the express disjunction of the district in question, from the barony parish, must necessarily import a disjunction quoad omnia. The conclusive answer is, that the statute has not left the nature or effect of that disjunction to inference, but has expressly provided and enacted in what respects, and to what effect, the disjoined property shall still be tributary to the parish from which it is divided, and has, in an especial manner, enacted, inter alia, that it shall still be liable to poor's rates in that parish; in fact, there is no civil burden for which it does not continue liable as before, both to the parish and the county; and while the annexation, with all its consequent liabilities, is complete and total, it may be truly said that the disjunction can extend to ecclesiastical relations only; for there is nothing else left on which it can possibly operate.

"One simple and obvious question brings out the palpable fallacy of the defenders whole argument. If it was really intended by the act to exempt the owners of the annexed territory from future poor assessments in the barony parish, why was it not so provided? and above all, why was a clause inserted looking so very like a special provision the other way? It could not be that the framers of the act trusted to the effect of the general words of the annexation and disjunction, for they leave nothing whatever to the operation of these words; every thing is separately and anxiously provided for. They do not rely on the express annexation and consolidation with the old royalty, even for the extension of the magistrates jurisdiction over the new territory; but this, with everything else, is specially enacted. But, unluckily for this trusting hypothesis, there is a special clause about those poor's rates, and the defenders theory is, that it was introduced to quiet the idle fears of the annexed owners, as to the possible insufficiency of the general words to secure their exemption. Whoever else trusted to the virtue of these words, therefore, it is certain that these owners did not trust to them; and that the legislature knew this, and in order to remove their distrust, is supposed to have put in this clause, binding the magistrates to relieve them from their imaginary perils. The Lord Ordinary must say, that this appears to him to be nothing short of a mere absurdity; if the object was not only to secure these owners from the barony assessments, but to quiet their foolish apprehensions of danger from them, was not the plain way to do this, just to enact that they should be exempted? or is it conceivable that, with this object in view, the legislature, having full power to settle the whole matter by a word, should take this indirect and really unintelligible course to effect it? It is needless to add, that the whole phraseology of the clause excludes this strange hypothesis. The magistrates are there taken bound to give relief, not against possible claims, but against 'rates payable to the barony parish;' and this relief is to be given, not by refuting the assessors, but by paying them, not by a successful argument on the effect of the clause of disjunction, but 'from the funds of the community of the city.'

"When the case is so clear upon the construction of the act itself, there is no need to refer to the powerful corroboration which this construction receives from what confessedly preceded its enactment, or from the interpretation which has, till very recently, been put upon it in practice. It is quite certain that when the act was in preparation the heritors of the barony parish required that satisfaction, both as to the statute labour and the poor's rates, which the Lord Ordinary thinks they have obtained by the clauses in question; and it is admitted, that after they had submitted their amendments, they allowed the act to pass without opposition. He is aware, however, that the admissibility of such evidence, however powerfully it may influence the mind, is very questionable, and, therefore, he in no degree rests his judgment upon it. With regard to the subsequent practice, however, he inclines to think, that when it has been uniform, of many years standing, and against the interest of those by whose consent it has been established, it may fairly be looked to for elucidating the true meaning of any doubtful or obscure enactment; of Glasgow, and disjoined from the parish [447] of barony, and the owners and occupiers of the said lands, or of the houses and buildings thereon, are [448] not relieved from their previous liability for the assessments made or to be made for the support of the poor of the said parish, along with the other lands, and the owners and occupiers thereof, within the said parish; and that the magistrates and town council of the said city are bound to relieve the owners and occupiers of the annexed lands and houses and buildings thereon of the whole of the said assessments made or to be made for the support of the poor of the said barony parish, by paying over from the funds of the community of the said city the whole amount of the said assessments as they have or shall become due to the proper officer of the said parish, or person entitled to collect and receive such assessments; and therefore repels the defences set forth and maintained by both sets of defenders: Decerns in terms of the conclusions of the libel against the defenders, James Ewing and [449] William Dunn severally, for the sums of money concluded for against each of the said defenders, with interest upon the said several sums as libelled; and in the event of payment not being made of the said several sums by the said defenders, within twenty-one days after this interlocutor shall be final, decerns also against the other defenders, the magistrates and town council of the said city of Glasgow, and their successors in office, for such of the said sums as may then be unpaid: Finds the whole of the defenders, conjunctly and severally, liable to the pursuers in expenses; allows an account thereof to be given in; and remits the same, when lodged, to the auditor for his taxation and report."

Against this interlocutor a reclaiming note was presented by the defenders (appellants) to the second division of the Court of Session, and after hearing counsel their Lordships ordered cases on the whole cause; and thereafter (17th May, 1837), upon advising the cases, adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and found the defenders (appellants) liable in additional expenses.

Messrs. Ewing and Dunn and the magistrates appealed.

Appellants.—The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary adhered to by the Court is erroneous in point of form or substantial justice, and it is also ill-founded in its construction of the act. The error in the decerniture against the magistrates was pointed out to the Court, and, though adverted to by the presiding judge, was left uncorrected.

against a plain and precise statute, (at least since the union,) no practice can be of any avail, and the Lord Ordinary thinks the statute clear enough here. But the defenders can scarcely deny, that in their view of its meaning, its enactments are full of obscurity, and that it is competent, therefore, to refer to early and long continued practice for their elucidation. Now, the practice in this case amounts to no less than this, that ever since the passing of the act in 1800 down to 1831, the magistrates, upon whose petition it proceeded, have all along recognized their liability under the clause in dispute, and have every year paid over large sums, varying from £300 to £1795, as their share of the barony poor assessments. In 1811, when the first great increase of these assessments took place, the matter was remitted to a select committee, who gave in a full and well-considered report, expressing their clear conviction, that the increased demand could not be resisted, and this was deliberately adopted by the Council, and acted upon ever after. In 1821, some objections having been taken, not to the general legality of the charge, but to the way of ascertaining its amount, another committee of the town council was appointed to adjust this matter with the barony heritors, which they accordingly effected, and gave in a long and elaborate report to the council, with a scheme for checking the assessor's charges in a particular way, which was also adopted and acted upon down till 1831. In that year a new light broke in upon the magistrates, and it was discovered, that they who framed and carried through the act in 1800 were altogether mistaken as to its meaning; and that their practice, and that of their successors for thirty years was against its true construction, as well as their own interest and duty to the city.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks, that a more extravagant allegation never was brought forward in a Court of Law; and sees nothing but the greatness of the interest at stake, which can explain the conduct of the magistrates in embarking in so unpromising a litigation."

1. The kirk session might have a right to sue, but [450] what right had they to sue the corporation? There may be a question of indemnity between the private defenders and the corporation, but the barony kirk session have no right, in suing the party liable directly to them, to sue also any third party who may be bound to relieve their supposed debtor. But the judgment goes even further than the illegal conclusion of the summons requires, for it finds that if the private defenders fail to pay then the corporation shall make payment; thus Ewing and Dunn have been found liable in the expenses of a record loaded with unnecessary parties. Or suppose the obligation thrown upon the corporation, as betwixt them and the barony kirk session, then Ewing and Dunn are unnecessary parties.

2. As to the question of liability of Ewing and Dunn the Court was so far right in holding that it turns upon the construction of the statute; and keeping in view those canons of construction,—(1.), that a Court must so construe an act as to make every part of the instrument effectual, if it can be made so; (2.), that a clear and precise intention expressed in one part of the instrument is not to be held by implication or otherwise to be repealed or annulled from ambiguous expressions in another part, and thence inferring a different intention by the granter, see Doe v. Hicks (8 Bligh. 475), a case which depended in Chancery as well as in the courts of common law, and in particular the opinion of Tindal, C. J., rep. p. 484; (3.), that no question is to be raised upon the order in which the clauses are to be read, as the whole must be read as forming one [451] instrument, clearly there was complete disjunction by the eleventh section, in every respect, betwixt the annexed lands and the barony parish; and if they were “for ever separated” they thus became extra-parochial in all questions of jurisdiction and liability connected with the barony parish. Nay, more, the disjoined lands are declared to be assessable in an equal proportion of the poor rates payable within the royalty to which they are annexed. The Leith Case, Hill v. Cunninghame (25th June 1835, F. C., and 2 Sh. and M’Lean, 773), in which the principle of double assessment was discountenanced, differs a little from this, but there is no substantial distinction betwixt the two cases; there were no express words of disjunction in that case; and if it was decided as that case was, where there were no words of disjunction, the magistrates here ought not to have been blamed for disputing their liability when there are express words of separation as well as annexation.

There is not,—as would have been requisite to meet the respondents view,—any express clause of reservation of the rights of the barony parish, as was introduced to save the rights of the county for cess and the tithe owners. Against the magistrates there is confessedly no direct clause of liability, neither can any subsidiary liability be contended for. The judges affirmed the interlocutor of the Ordinary, but differed on the grounds, Lord Medwyn, upon the construction of the act, rightly differing from the Lord Ordinary and the other judges, but finding himself tied up by usage. Now as usage, to which the private defenders were no parties, could not be admitted in evidence, the other judges improperly took that view, and went equally far wrong in their [452] construction of the act, which Lord Medwyn put the right construction upon.

Respondents.—The question lies within the four corners of the statute; but still it is necessary to look to the pre-existing state of matters to which the act bore reference. Then, having regard to the language of the act itself, one finds that the construction, which it fairly admits of, is consistent with what was proved by extrinsic evidence to have been the intention of the parties, shown by their practice for the last thirty years. The heritors, and afterwards the heritors and householders, continuing to pay through the corporation just as the heritors paid before the act, redargues the presumption of separation, and shows that the separation was qualified so as to continue the liability of the separated lands to the barony parish, as well as what they should be liable for within burgh, the magistrates relieving them of the burden.

In construing a local act of parliament, if its terms be clear, there can be no relevancy in introducing usage or decisions of courts to control its meaning; but if the language be of doubtful meaning, and there have been decisions explaining it, a court is bound by the construction of other judges, even though originally there might have been room for letting in a different construction; not that usage of parties or decisions of a court can alter the clear meaning of the legislature, but that if parties, for a period of years, put a construction, by practical observance, upon the enactments of the legislature, the court is induced and is entitled to look to this contemporanea expositio in explaining clauses of contradictory or doubtful import.

[453] If for thirty years the public has been in the practical observance of a statute, interpreting it by an uniform usage, a court of justice feels bound to give its support to that usage, which proceeds upon a direct recognition and no disregard of the act. Even in the construction of public acts usage is admitted,—King v. Hog (1 T. R. 728), Stammers v. Dixon (7 East, p. 200). In Anderson v. Bank of England (2 Keen's Rep. p. 328) the ground upon which the judges went when the case was sent for opinion at common law (3 Bing. new ed. 666) was, that the documents objected to were understood to be included among modern bills, and that usage was, so far, a strong confirmation of the statute; and the House of Lords gave effect to the same principle in the case of Magistrates of Dunbar v. Heritors (1 Sh. and M'Lean, 195).

Upon the point of form, there was nothing in the decree inconsistent with the alternative form of the summons. Now, both parties stated the same defence; if the private parties are not liable, then there is nothing in the clause of relief. The private parties cannot be allowed to plead that the action is good against the magistrates as liable in the claim of relief. The conclusions might have been directed against both sets of defenders; but there was no ground to complain that decree had been asked first against the private defenders, and then a decree of relief against the corporation in so far as necessary.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this case, which was heard before your Lordships a few days ago, was an appeal from the interlocutor of the Lords of Session, [454] by which certain persons occupying lands in a district which formerly formed part of what is generally called the barony parish, contiguous to and now part of the burgh of Glasgow, were decreed to make payment of an assessment imposed by the authority of the barony parish; and the interlocutor proceeded to direct that in the event of those individuals not paying, the corporation of Glasgow should pay out of the funds belonging to that corporation.

My Lords, it appears to me extremely important to dispose first of that part of the case which is a decree against the magistrates of Glasgow; for, as your Lordships will very soon see if the interlocutor is clearly wrong in that respect, not only will that dispose of that part of the case, but that will most materially affect the ground upon which the learned judges in the court below have, as it appears to me, proceeded in the judgment they have formed.

My Lords, the act in which this interlocutor has been founded, as far as the magistrates of Glasgow are concerned, merely directs that "they shall also, from the funds of the community of the said city, relieve the holders and occupiers of houses or lands in the said extended royalty of the poor's rates payable by them to the said barony parish, as having been part thereof before the passing of the act." My Lords, those are the words to which it will be material to call your Lordships' particular attention in another part of the case, at present I consider them only as they affect the interlocutor against the magistrates of Glasgow.

My Lords, that is the only part of the act which has been relied upon, or can be relied upon, as imposing a liability on the magistrates of Glasgow; but, on [455] the authority of that proviso in that act, the judgment below has proceeded to direct payment by the magistrates of Glasgow to the authorities of the barony parish. Now, that can proceed only upon this, which is clearly unknown as a principle of the law of this country or the law of Scotland (and I am happy to find that that relieves me from any anxieties upon that subject), which is recognized in the judgment of the learned judges in the court below, namely, that a contract of indemnity between A. and B. is to be the foundation of a charge by the party contending to be actually indemnified against another party. If A. undertakes to indemnify B. against any liability to C. it is clearly a strange principle to contend that A. is consequently liable to C., and yet that is the only ground which I can find in this act, or the proceedings in this cause, on which the judgment of the Court of Session has been given against the magistrates of Glasgow, directing them to pay to the pursuers, namely, the authorities of the barony parish.

My Lords, the learned judges of the court below appeared perfectly aware of the irregularity in that respect, but I must say they pass over that irregularity much more readily than it appears to me it was judicious to do; they seem to think that, being of opinion the occupiers were liable, and that the magistrates of the district were liable, to indemnify the community against what they might be called upon to pay, it was a matter of little consequence whether they were directed to pay directly to the pursuers, or whether they were only to be liable in the mode in which it was by the statute imposed upon them. My Lords, it appears to me to be of the highest importance that these distinc-[456]-tions should be kept up, because, if not, all principle may be set at defiance; if because in the abstract a liability to pay exists, and by some circuitous proceeding, practically the payment of that sum of money may be claimed, therefore the liability may be enforced in a suit that is not calculated to give effect to that liability.

My Lords, if then there is no ground for this, I have the satisfaction of knowing, from the report of the proceedings in the court below, that three at least of the learned judges expressed their opinion, some more strongly than the others, but all sufficiently to show, in the opinion of three, I think, of the learned judges below, the interlocutor was in that respect erroneous. My Lords, it will follow, of course, that whatever may be the case between the authorities of the barony parish and the occupiers within the ceded district, the interlocutor cannot be entertained as against the magistrates of Glasgow.

Now, my Lords, if that be so, your Lordships, adverting to the grounds on which the learned judges below have proceeded, will find that a great majority of them have founded their judgment, not upon the construction of the act of parliament so much as upon the course of proceeding which has been followed since the act passed; certainly the proceedings are of very considerable length, inasmuch as the act passed in the year 1800; but if in this suit the magistrates of Glasgow are subject to no liability, and if, as between the magistrates of Glasgow and the authorities of the barony parish, there is no privity, and therefore no liability, on the part of the magistrates of Glasgow to pay to the authorities of the barony parish, then it is [457] material to inquire if any such evidence was admissible between the parties on the construction of this act of parliament; whether there has been any practice of dealing between the parties in this case, who are the only proper parties to the litigation, namely, the occupiers in the barony parish,—the particular occupiers who have been selected for the purpose of compelling payment to the parish represented by them. The only evidence which has been so much observed upon at the bar, and which seemed to be so much relied upon in the judgment of the learned judges, is entirely that of transactions between the authorities of the parish and the magistrates of Glasgow.

Now, if the magistrates of Glasgow are entirely out of the suit, and they ought never to have been actual parties to the suit, and in adjudicating upon the rights of the parties to the suit, you may consider the magistrates of Glasgow as no parties to it, what evidence is there of transactions between the parties to the suit? That is, what evidence of practice is there, if evidence is admissible at all as against the occupiers, to show that they have by conduct of theirs, or conduct of those having interest in that property which they now possess, which for that purpose might be the same—what evidence is there to show that they have entered into any obligations not imposed by the provisions of the act? My Lords, there is obviously none. It is unnecessary in that view of the case therefore to inquire how it has happened that this course of dealing has taken place between the magistrates of Glasgow and the authorities of the parish. A very natural solution, I think, has been suggested, that as they were before the act passed in the habit of paying a small sum for a [458] particular district, that payment was continued without adverting to the particular provisions of the act. The attention of the inhabitants of the town was called to it only when the demand became so large as naturally to force itself upon the attention of those whose duty it was to consider the interests of the town.

My Lords, then I proceed to consider how the case stands as between the pursuers and the individuals occupying lands, and in respect of that possession of property being called upon to pay rates for the relief of the poor.

My Lords, there are two points which may be considered as free from all doubt, and which in point of fact have not been the subject of any dispute, namely, that ordinarily speaking, and without any special provision in the act for that purpose, the liability to contribute to the poor rate of the parish can only affect those who are the occupiers of property within the parish. No doubt an act of parliament may impose that liability upon any individual, but if there be no act of parliament, if there be no statute for the purpose, then the liability is confined to those who are within the parish, and so the authorities of the parish have considered, because the rate is imposed on the property in the parish, the right, therefore, and the exercise of that right are in this case entirely consistent.

Well, then, the question is really a very simple one, when it comes to be considered whether there is anything in the act which takes this case out of the ordinary rule of law. Is this property occupied by these two defenders within the barony parish, or is it not? Now, my Lords, in the South Leith case there was not an act of parliament which took the land out of the parish of [459] South Leith, and annexed it to any parish in Edinburgh, but there was an act of parliament which included it within the royalty of the city of Edinburgh, and gave the magistrates of Edinburgh a right to levy rates on that ceded district. Some difference of opinion prevailed in the Court of Session how this was to be carried into effect, and how far the lands in question were or were not liable to pay the rates to the parish of South Leith. When it came to your Lordships' House those difficulties were removed; and though there was in that act no provision taking any of the lands out of the parish of South Leith, and annexing them to any parish in Edinburgh, your Lordships held that the act having imposed this liability on the lands to pay rates to the magistrates of the city of Edinburgh, that was sufficient to relieve them from the liability to pay rates to the parish of South Leith. My Lords, that case, therefore, would be applicable to the present if there had not been in this act that which you find in the eleventh section most clearly and explicitly enacted, and if there had not been such provisions in the act directing the lands in the case to which I have referred. According to the opinions of all the learned judges it appeared to them, that no question would be raised as to the liability of the inhabitants to contribute to the rates of South Leith under the eleventh section; the question is not, whether there is any obligation by the statute to pay rates not within the parish, but whether those lands are or are not within the barony parish, or whether they are taken out of that parish and annexed to other parishes.

My Lords, upon that point there is no ambiguity; the words are "such lands hereby annexed to and com-[460]-prehended within the royalty of the city of Glasgow shall be and the same are hereby for ever separated from the barony parish, and are hereby annexed to parishes within the said city to which they lie most contiguous, or to which the magistrates and town council shall by any act or acts of council hereafter direct and appoint." After that enactment had passed the legislature, and had become the law of the land, it is impossible for any man to contend any longer that those lands are within the barony parish. Then, if they are not within the barony parish, how is it that they can be made liable to rates? No doubt this act might have done what it did with respect to tithes, what it did with respect to cess, what it did to a certain extent with respect to statute labour; it might have enacted, that although all these lands ceased to be part of the barony parish, and therefore were placed in a position which would not make them liable to contribute to the rate for the relief of the poor of that parish, yet that they shall for certain purposes be still within the barony parish, and not only shall be within the barony parish, but that they shall contribute their proportion of the rates raised within that parish.

The question then is, has the act said so? My Lords, there are various sections in this act which if there were any doubt on the eleventh section would clearly manifest the intention of the legislature that this should cease to be part of the barony parish. It has said expressly that it shall not be for that purpose, and it is not necessary to advert to the other parts of the act. If it had not said so, and there had been any doubt whether or not this land were part of the barony parish, would not that afford the strongest possible [461] proof that it was no longer to be continued part of the barony parish, because if it continued to be part of the barony parish the liability to tithe would of course remain? But the act has taken care to provide for the interest of those entitled to receive tithe, a provision which would have been unnecessary if the lands had continued part of the parish; and, accordingly, it provides "that the tithes payable out of the lands hereby annexed shall be and the same are hereby saved and reserved to the true owners thereof in the same manner as if this act had never passed."

My Lords, a similar provision is inserted with respect to the cess, although that perhaps is of more importance as keeping it within the county of Lanark than within the parish, except so far as this, that the parish being assessed for a certain contribution to the county, if these lands had been taken out of one parish and put into another, while the same sum would have been to be paid by the parish out of which this was taken, of course that would have thrown an additional burden upon those who remained occupiers and possessors of land within the parish, to the extent of the sum which otherwise would have been contributed by those whose lands were taken out of it, and, therefore, it was extremely proper that provision should be made to prevent the other inhabitants of the parish so suffering. The act therefore provides what it would have been unnecessary to provide if those lands were to remain within the barony parish, namely, that the same sum shall continue to be paid as had been paid for those particular lands.

So, with regard to the statute labour, the framers of the act conceived that the inhabitants of the barony [462] parish ought not to be sufferers by the loss of the amount of statute labour that had been contributed by the occupiers of those lands, and therefore the corporation undertook (and all this is matter of arrangement, which is found in the act itself) to pay a certain annual sum as compensation to the parish for that loss which they would otherwise sustain by the loss of that land. Your Lordships see therefore that there is a distinct enactment that these lands shall not continue within the parish, and you find in the three instances to which I have referred that a distinct provision is made, reserving to a certain extent compensation to the parish for the loss which the parish would sustain from those lands being taken out of it. Now, if there had been any intention in the act to extend a similar provision to the subject of poor rates, why did not the act contain some provision similar to that which is to be found with regard to those several other objects, but there is no such provision.

It was said by some of the learned judges in the court below that the reason was obvious, because the one was a fixed and the other an uncertain amount. That is no reason why there should not be a distinct enactment, that the land should be liable; the amount of charge would be still uncertain, but the obligation to pay that which would have been payable in respect of those lands would have remained and might have been as much the subject of a distinct enactment as the provision with regard to tithes, or cess, or statute labour, but there is no such provision in this act.

My Lords, the other provision in the act is to be found in the third section, and it is the same section which provides for the contribution by the magistrates [463] in lieu of statute labour, which makes it still more strong, and, in my opinion, still more free from doubt, that if there had been any such intention it would have been distinctly enacted in the act. That very section (the third) does distinctly enact, with regard to statute labour, "that the magistrates and town council shall hereafter pay from the money raised for the conversion of the statute labour within the said city to the heritors legally appointed to repair and maintain the public roads in the western district of the barony parish of Glasgow, £5 sterling yearly, as a conversion for the statute labour of the said annexed lands." There is no ambiguity or doubt as to that enactment. Then these words follow, "and shall also, from the funds of the community of the said city, relieve the holders and occupiers of houses or lands in the said extended royalty of the poor's rates payable by them to the said barony parish, as having been a part thereof before the passing of this act." The obligation as to statute labour is, that the magistrates shall pay to the parish; there is no such obligation with respect to the poor's rates, but the only obligation is that the magistrates shall from the funds of the community of the city relieve the holders and occupiers of lands of the poor's rates payable by the occupiers of the annexed lands to the barony parish. Now, why was that change? Why was not the principle of enactment which is applied to the statute labour applied also to the poor's rates? There can be but one reason, namely, because it was not the intention of the legislature that such a provision should be contained in the act. It was intended with regard to statute labour that there should be a liability on the magistrates to pay over a certain sum to the [464] authorities of the parish. If there had been any such intention with respect to the poor's rates, beyond all doubt it would have been made applicable to the circumstances of the case, and would have been found in the act with regard to the poor's rate also, but there is no such provision to be found, the only enactment being that there shall be a liability to indemnify the occupiers in respect of the poor's rates payable by them as having been part of the parish before the passing of the act. If there had been any thing wanting in the other parts of the act to show that this land had ceased to be part of the barony parish, it would have been the very expression, "as having been a part thereof before the passing of the act," in the particular section which is relied upon as creating the obligation between the magistrates of Glasgow and the authorities of the parish; there is here an express recognition in the provisions of the act that the lands had ceased to be part of the barony parish.

My Lords, it is said that some sense must be given to this section; some sense no doubt must be given to it if possible. It is desirable to give a good sense to the section, but some sense must be given to it consistent with the expressions to be found in it; and when the section is used for this purpose, and treated as a matter so clear that no doubt can be entertained by any reasonable person as to the meaning of it, I beg your Lordships' attention to the consideration, how it is possible that the framers of this act could have had the intention, which is now imputed to them, in this section, namely, that the lands in question, though separated from the barony parish, should continue to pay to the authorities of the parish a portion of the [465] rate rateable on the parish. There is no such enactment; there is a mere contract of indemnity on the part of the magistrates and town council undertaking to indemnify the parties in respect of any possible claim. Now the language of the section clearly refers to something either existing or past; the words are "the poor's rate payable by them to the said barony parish as having been a part thereof before passing this act." Now what poor's rate was payable in respect of lands because they had been part of the parish having ceased to be part of the parish? No lands can be liable to the poor's rate because they once belonged to a parish after they have ceased to be part of the parish, but if there is an assessment on property not yet paid,—if there is a liability arising from the lands having been within the parish,—then there would be a claim to make good that which must otherwise be made up out of what remains part of the barony parish, however small the amount might be; it is very natural that they should be held liable for the rates imposed before this became a part of the city, and that the parish should require to be secured and indemnified even for the half year's rate that would be payable before the expiration of the poor's rate imposed upon the parish.

My Lords, the second question is, whether this proviso undoes all that the other provisions of the act intended to do, namely, to remove the lands from the barony parish, and annex them to the city of Glasgow; whether it is intended to subject them to the parish rates, though removed beyond the limits of the parish. The terms do not require that, and there is no doubt it would require a very distinct enactment to do that where the lands were made liable to contribute to the [466] city assessment. If it was intended that they should also remain liable to the barony parish, we should expect to find a distinct clause continuing the old rate while they would be liable to the new. In the act with respect to South Leith there was no such provision; there was no such separation of the lands of South Leith, but they were held to be discharged from payment in the one parish because they were liable to pay in the other. The principle of a double payment was held to be so objectionable in itself that it would require a very direct enactment; but your Lordships would, if you entered into the views of the respondent, put a construction upon the act in effect imposing a double liability. I find nothing from which it is to be inferred,—I find an unequivocal declaration, that the lands have ceased to be part of the barony parish, and I find no enactment by which, being so separated from the barony parish, they can be held or made liable to the poor's rates imposed upon that parish.

My Lords, for these reasons I have very anxiously looked into this case; seeing the very strong opinions which have been expressed by the learned judges in the court below, I have been led to review the conclusion to which I came upon the hearing, to an extent leading me to exhaust every means in my power to ascertain whether there was any ground for the construction of the court below; but on the fullest consideration I have come to a conclusion directly the reverse; and having done so I feel it my duty to advise your Lordships to reverse the interlocutor of the Court of Session. And, my Lords, this being a claim by the authorities of the parish, first of all, against the magistrates, and for which there was no case, and next, against the occupiers of these houses on a claim of liability to which they are not subject, it is but just that the parties making that claim and failing in the claim should pay the costs of the proceeding in the court below. The expense of the proceeding in this house being an appeal against the judgment of the court below is not matter of question; but the course I should propose to advise your Lordships to adopt is, to reverse the interlocutor of the Court of Session, and to assoilzie the appellants from the conclusions of the summons, and to direct the respondents to pay the costs in the court below.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said interlocutors complained of in the said appeal be and the same are hereby reversed, and that the appellants be assoilzied from all the conclusions of the summons: And it is further ordered, That the said respondents do pay or cause to be paid to the said appellants their costs of this suit in the Court of Session in Scotland.

[468]      APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY, IRELAND.

ALICIA O'CONNOR and Others, Appellants—Knight Bruce—Pemberton—Lowndes;
JOHN MALONE, Respondent—Attorney General (Campbell)—Jacob—Hall
[6th June 1839].

[Mews' Dig. vi. 651; xi. 423. S.C. 6 Cl. and F. 572; and see also Sau. and Sc. 516.]

New Trial—Verdict—Evidence—Venue.—A party in a cause in equity to establish the trusts of a will under which he claimed estates of great value, stated and adduced evidence that he was the eldest legitimate son of a marriage of his parents in January 1801, and an issue having thereafter been sent to trial at law, the evidence at which trial adduced by the same party went to show that the marriage had taken place in January 1802, and the party having got a verdict; and the Court of Equity having, upon motion by the adverse parties, ordered a new trial, before a jury of the same county, upon payment of the costs of the former trial, and allowed the former verdict to be used in evidence at the new trial, Held, 1, (affirming in part said order,) That a new trial ought to be granted, in respect that the issue sent had not been satisfactorily tried, the case made at the trial being different from that made in equity; 2, (further affirming in part said order,) That manifestations of applause by one or more of the jury at the close of the speech to evidence of the counsel for the successful party at the trial, was no sufficient reason for altering the venue, or for directing the new trial to be had in one of the counties where the estates in question were situated; 3, (reversing in part said order,) That the verdict obtained on the former trial ought not to be given in evidence on the new trial of the issue; 4, (further reversing in part said order,) That costs of the former trial ought not to be allowed to the party who got the verdict, but that said costs ought to be reserved.

[469] Observed, per L. C., When a Court of Equity has directed an issue to be tried at law, in order to ascertain the facts by which that court is to be guided in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, and after a trial of such issue thinks fit to order a new trial of the same, it is not the practice of the Court of Equity, in making such order, to interfere with or take any notice of the former verdict, to the effect either of setting aside that verdict, or of allowing it to be given in evidence on the new trial; and that a practice which had prevailed in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, of setting aside the former verdict on ordering a new trial, was erroneous.

In 1836 John Malone (respondent) filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland with the view to establish a title as heir tail male to estates of great value in Westmeath and other counties in Ireland, devised by the will of the Right Honourable Anthony Malone, dated in 1774. In his amended bill the respondent set forth that he was the eldest legitimate son of Captain Richard Malone deceased, who was the second son of Richard Malone, the brother of the original settlor; and that the marriage of his parents had taken place on the 22d day of January in the year 1801, in Townsend Street chapel in the city of Dublin.

Mrs. O'Connor and others (the appellants), trustees under settlements of said estates, by their answer denied the legitimacy of the respondent, and maintained that the alleged marriage of the respondent's parents was illegal, the same having been solemnized by a Roman Catholic clergyman, the respondent's father being at the time and for twelve months previously a protestant. Issue was joined, and witnesses examined for both parties in the Court of Chancery. After several witnesses had been examined for the [470] respondent, but before publication, the appellants' solicitor discovered that there had been a son born of the same parents at Preston in Lancashire, in the month of June or July 1801, and baptized by the name of Anthony Malone in the Roman Catholic chapel at Preston on the 26th of July 1801. The solicitor for the appellants apprised the solicitor for the respondent of this circumstance. After publication it appeared from the depositions that several of the respondent's witnesses, including the mother of the respondent, had given evidence that the father and mother of the respondent had returned from Preston, and ceased to reside there in the end of the year 1800; and that they had been married, as stated in the amended bill, in the city of Dublin on the 22d of January 1801.

The cause came on to be heard on the 13th of November 1837, whereupon, by consent of parties, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Lord Plunket) directed an issue be tried in the Court of Queen's Bench, "whether the plaintiff was the heir at law of Richard Malone deceased, who was the son of Richard Malone, one of the brothers of the Right Honourable Anthony Malone in the pleadings mentioned?" That issue was tried before Mr. Justice Crampton and a special jury of the county Dublin, and a verdict had for the plaintiff (respondent). In stating the case at the trial, the respondent's counsel announced that the witnesses in the equity cause had been mistaken as to the true date of the marriage of the respondent's parents, which had really taken place in January 1802; and evidence was accordingly adduced by the respondent to prove that the said marriage had taken place in Dublin in January 1802.

[471] The appellants applied by motion, with notice, to the Lord Chancellor Plunket, to set aside the verdict on the ground of surprise on the trial and variation from the case made in the equity cause; and also that a new trial might be directed before a jury of any county save the county of Dublin. The motion was founded on the judge's report of the trial, and on affidavits by the appellants' solicitor, that said solicitor had relied on the respondent attempting to prove that said marriage had taken place in January 1801, and that Anthony, the elder brother of the respondent, had died without issue, and that the appellants were prepared to prove that said marriage could not have taken place in 1801. The affidavits of the solicitor and his clerk further set forth, that two of the jurors clapped and applauded in the jury box on the conclusion of the speech to evidence of the respondent's counsel.

The Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Lord Plunket), on the 19th of February 1838, made the following order:—"It is ordered that the motion for changing the venue and for setting aside the said verdict be refused; that there be a new trial of the said issue, with liberty to the plaintiff on such new trial to give such former verdict in evidence as he may be advised, the defendants to pay the costs of the former trial, the costs of the motion to abide the result of such new trial."

The appellants appealed. The petition of appeal praying in substance that the above order might be varied, by directing that the former verdict should be set aside; and that the new trial of the issue might take place before a jury of some county in Ireland [472] where the lands in question or some of them lie, and that the appellants should not pay the costs of the former trial.

Appellants.—A new trial had been ordered, and was absolutely necessary, not merely in reference to the amount of the property at issue, but also regard being had to the proceedings at the trial, which showed that a verdict so obtained was as worthless as the inconsistent evidence on which it proceeded. The former verdict had not been set aside, although it was the practice in Ireland to do so in ordering a new trial, and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland had not said whether he was satisfied with that verdict or not, but had ordered a new trial, and had allowed the former verdict to be given in evidence on a new trial. Now, where a new trial had been ordered, the former verdict had always been set aside; it might not always have been so in form, but in substance that was the nature and effect of the order for again trying the question. There was no difference in the form of order whether the judge be satisfied or not. In Seton on Decrees (p. 350) there is the form of an order for a new trial of an issue in Watmore v. Watmore (M. R. 14 Feb. 1815), where certainly, if the former verdict be not expressly set aside, there was no order that it should remain part of the proceedings, or be given in evidence at the new trial. In Locke v. Colman (2 My. and C. 42), and in Mudd v. Suckermore (Rolls 1835), where new trials had been ordered, the former verdict had been entirely disregarded, and no order made for giving it in evidence. The reason why the former verdict could not [473] be entertained as part of the proceedings, a new trial being judged necessary, was, that a verdict cannot be made evidence at law until it has ripened into a judgment, and then it is conclusive betwixt the same parties in the same matter. See Phillips's Evidence by Amos (vol. 2, p. 510, 8th edit.), and the case of Vooght v. Winch (2 B. and Ald. 662), and the cases therein cited. In equity, the Court, seeking to inform its mind, may order a new trial, as in Stace v. Mabbot (2 Ves. sen. 553; see also Ves. Sup. 429), Cleeve v. Gascoigne (1 Amb. 323-24), and in Harder v. Sise, cited in Vernon, 285, in which last case there were five trials, and a case in Lord King's time, noticed in 2 Ves. sen., p. 554, by Lord Hardwicke in his judgment in Cleeve v. Gascoigne; but nothing had been said about giving the former verdict in evidence. But the authorities upon the point were supposed to be controverted by the judgment of Lord Hardwicke in the case of Baker v. Hart, twice reported (3 Atk. 542; S.C. 1 Ves. sen., 27), and which case required explanation and investigation. In Atkyns, Lord Hardwicke is made to say, "Where it is a matter of inheritance, the court without setting aside the first verdict, for the more solemn determination, in some cases direct a second trial; and if the court direct such trial without setting aside the former verdict, then the former may be given in evidence, and will have its weight with the jury, and therefore it is a very material difference to the parties; because, if I was to direct a new trial on my setting aside the first verdict, the defendant would lose the benefit of urging the first verdict in his favour at another trial."

[474] In Vesey senior (p. 28) the expressions are, "the application here is not to set aside the former verdict; and in doubtful questions relating to inheritances a court of equity frequently grants a new trial without setting aside the former verdict, which is of great consequence to the parties, for then it may be given in evidence, though not conclusive, either party being at liberty to show on what grounds it was obtained; but courts of law in that case always set the former aside." But both reports were now understood to contain an inaccurate account, both of the facts of the case and of the order made for the new trial. The registrar's books, however, correctly set forth the order, and it appeared there was no order about giving the former verdict in evidence on the second trial.

The conduct of juries had frequently been made the ground for directing a new trial of issues, see Dent v. Hundred of Hertford (2 Salk. 645; 1 Strange, 642), East India Company v. Bazett (Jacob, 91), in which last case a verdict was held not satisfactory, as the jury had been under great difficulty, and there was not a period sufficient for consideration, between the existence of the difficulty and its removal. Lord Eldon observed, "There is this difference between a motion for a new trial in a court of law and in a court of equity. In a court of law if a jury find the fact, though the judge may think differently, yet it is permitted to stand, for the finding of the fact is the province of the jury; but here the verdict is somewhat more than the verdict of the jury, it must be such as to satisfy the Court that it can make that its own [475] declaration of the fact which the jury have made theirs." [Lord Chancellor: A court of equity does not set aside a verdict at law; it only declines to act upon it.] Neither was there any practice in Ireland to sanction the giving the former verdict in evidence, Harrison v. Cumming, in 1808, being the only case in Ireland found upon a search of the records.

2. The venue ought to be changed. The circumstances under which the former verdict was returned, indicated a feeling and partiality not merely in the minds of the individual jurors animadverted on, but a strong prejudice in reference to the matters under investigation; one of the counties where the lands in dispute lay ought therefore to be preferred.

3. Costs ought not to have been awarded. There may have been cases in which costs were awarded (Cleeve v. Gascoigne, 1 Amb. 323; So, in Stace v. Mabbot, 2 Ves. sen. 553), even where a new trial had been granted, but never where the verdict was so objectionable as this was, being plainly not such a verdict as could ever be deemed satisfactory by the court that directed the issue; and the blame clearly lay with those who got up a case so inconsistent with that made in equity.

Respondent.—The value of the property in question might be deemed a good reason for enabling the parties to try the issue again, before being concluded upon claims, the ascertainment of which had been attended with difficulty. But there was nothing else in the case to justify the application for setting aside the former verdict, or for disturbing the order in so far as it allowed that former verdict to be submitted along with the [476] evidence to be adduced on the new trial. The course which the appellants had adopted in supporting their application, made it incumbent upon the respondent to go fully into the judge's report of the trial, to ascertain how far it was such a verdict as must have been satisfactory to the court that directed the issue. For it was very clear that the admission or rejection of portions of evidence which ought, in strictness, either to have been excluded or let in, formed no sufficient ground for insisting that a court of equity must set aside or disregard the verdict; as that court, seeking merely to inform itself as to the facts upon which its determination might rest, looked to the effect of the evidence in judging how far the verdict was satisfactory; see Bootle v. Blundell (19 Ves. 494), Hampson v. Hampson (3 Ves. and Beam. 41), Barker v. Ray (2 Russ. 63); in which last case Lord Eldon (p. 75) observed, "Issues are directed here to satisfy the judge, which judge is supposed, after he is in possession of all that passed upon the trial, to know all that passed here; and looking at the depositions in the cause, and the proceedings both here and at law, he is to see whether on the whole they do or do not satisfy him. It has been ruled over and over again that if on the trial of an issue a judge reject evidence which ought to have been received, or receive evidence which ought to have been refused, though in that case a court of law would grant a new trial, yet if this court is satisfied that if the evidence improperly received had been rejected, or the evidence improperly rejected had been received, the verdict ought not to have been different, it will not grant a new trial merely upon [477] such grounds." Now the report of the judge who tried this case did not express any dissatisfaction with the verdict, neither had the Court of Equity in Ireland held it unsatisfactory. Indeed, a careful consideration of the report of the trial showed that no other verdict would have been satisfactory to that court, and therefore parties were not to be excluded from the benefit of a previous investigation, the verdict on which could not be impugned. It was not sufficient to allege surprise at the trial, unless it was surprise of such a nature as must necessarily have prejudiced the cause by producing a different result from what the other party might have been prepared to bring about. Besides, it was admitted, that the appellants were aware that there must have been some mistake, and that the marriage could not have been had in January 1801, and that the respondent could not have been the eldest born after a marriage in that year. And the question being whether the respondent was the eldest legitimate son of a marriage betwixt certain persons named, and a marriage being proved, there could be no prejudice to the appellants, when the effect of the whole evidence was looked to, and the mistake explained. The admission of the former verdict was urged on the authority of Lord Hardwicke in Baker v. Hart (3 Atk. 542; 1 Ves. sen. 27), who, in both the reports of that case, was made to use the expressions as if familiar in the practice of the court at the time.

2. The venue had for obvious reasons been fixed in the county of Dublin, where the prejudice upon questions of local importance must have been less than in the counties where the lands were situated. Any manifest [478]-tation of feeling (supposing it to have been as stated in the affidavits) could not attach disabilities to other jurors impartially chosen.

3. Costs were properly found by the court not dissatisfied with the verdict, and which allowed that former verdict to be used on the new trial.

Lord Chancellor (14th March).—My Lords, this is a case of very great importance, not only from the value of the property in question, but on account of the peculiar circumstances which appear to have taken place in the court below. Upon the case itself, therefore, from the opinion which has been entertained by the court below by a very eminent and learned person, your Lordships perhaps will think it advisable, whatever the impressions of your Lordships may be, to look very carefully through the papers before you proceed to give your final judgment upon this appeal.

But, my Lords, there is another reason which induces me to advise your Lordships not to proceed further at the present moment. In the course of this discussion a question has been raised shewing a practice in the courts of equity in Ireland, which is certainly quite inconsistent with the practice which exists in the courts of equity in England. Now, my Lords, there is no reason whatever why the practice of the courts in the two countries should be different. It certainly does appear to have raised a great difficulty in explaining the case of Baker v. Hart (3 Atk. 542; S.C. 1 Ves. sen. 27); for the practice might be somewhat different in Lord Hardwicke's time, and can only be explained by supposing that the practice in [479] equity in this country is different from that in Ireland. My Lords, in order to ascertain that, I have directed a search to be made from 1750 backwards, in order to see whether those expressions attributed to Lord Hardwicke in the case of Baker v. Hart are or are not supported by the authorities in the Court of Chancery. That search has not yet been completed, but as far as it has gone, there is no instance to be found in which the order has set aside the verdict, or in which there is contained any direction as to giving or not giving that verdict in evidence on a new trial. I shall very shortly be furnished with the further result of that inquiry, which I have directed to be made; and I believe, before I call your Lordships' attention to this case again, which I propose to do in the course of next week, that I shall be able to get some further information upon the point as to what passed in the court, beyond what is found in the printed reports and in the registrar's book. It is an extremely important question in this country and in Ireland; and on so important a point in equitable jurisdiction it is desirable that your Lordships should have all the information before you upon that subject, before you finally dispose of this case.

Judgment deferred.

Lord Chancellor (6th June).—In this case the Lord Chancellor of Ireland directed a new trial of an issue which had previously been tried, for the purpose of ascertaining who was the heir at law of Richard Malone. Upon the propriety of the new trial no question has been made; but three points have been raised as to the propriety of some of the directions given upon that order for a new trial. The order directed that the verdict which was obtained upon the former trial of the issue should [480] be laid before the jury upon the second trial, and be used as evidence; it directed the appellants to pay the costs of the previous trial; and another point contended for here by the appellants, as having been erroneously disposed of below, is that the trial which is to be had should not be in the county where the former trial was had, namely, in the county of Dublin.

My Lords, the question therefore for your Lordships to consider is, in the first place, whether the order for the new trial ought to contain the direction with regard to the verdict upon the former trial. It certainly struck me as a very singular direction, and when the case was argued at your Lordships' bar, I had no recollection of any such provision being contained in any order for a new trial. I did not even recollect that I had ever seen an order, in which the court had taken notice of the verdict in a former trial. I directed searches to be made, and after the most diligent searches which the registrars of the Court of Chancery have been able to make, carrying them back for two centuries, there is no instance found but one, which I shall presently call your Lordships' attention to, in which an order for a new trial has taken any notice of the verdict in the former trial. The reason is perfectly obvious. In a court of law the verdict is a necessary part of the proceedings in the cause; it is the foundation of the judgment of the court. If therefore the verdict which has been obtained is not such a verdict as in the opinion of the court to be properly the foundation of a judgment, the court puts the case in a train for having it tried again; and it necessarily sets aside the verdict, inasmuch as the opinion of the court is, that that verdict ought not to be the foundation of the judgment to be pronounced. But when an issue is directed by a court of equity [481] there are no further proceedings upon the verdict; the object of the verdict is to satisfy the court of equity as to the facts. It is not therefore a case in which any thing further is to be done. All that a court of equity does in directing a new trial,—the mind of the judge being made up upon the evidence, or the result of the evidence,—is to put it into a course of further investigation, in order better to satisfy himself of the facts before he proceeds to adjudicate upon the right of the parties.

In this case it was said the new trial was granted not on account of any thing unsatisfactory which had taken place on the first trial, but because as it concerned the inheritance of an estate, the parties proceeding at law would in the ordinary course of things have had an opportunity of trying their right over again in several ways; and therefore that it was not thought proper on the part of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland that he should at once determine the rights of the parties without giving them an opportunity of another trial; and two cases were cited upon that point which were before me,—one when I was Master of the Rolls, and the other when I was in the Court of Chancery. These cases are Locke v. Colman, in 2 Mylne and Craig, p. 42, the other Mudd v. Suckermore (Rolls, 1835), which was before me at the Rolls, and in which I proceeded upon that principle. Mudd v. Suckermore was not in its circumstances the same as the present case, although it involved very much the same principle, because that was not the case of an issue directed by the court for the purpose of informing the mind of the court, but it was a case in which the court superseded the proceedings in the cause, giving [482] the parties leave to bring an ejectment; and the question was, whether an ejectment having been tried, and the question being with respect to the inheritance of an estate, the court should proceed to an adjudication without giving the parties an opportunity of another trial. And I observe that in my note of the judgment in that case, I drew the very distinction to which I have now called your Lordships' attention. I observed, "The distinction between these cases in which the court directs an issue, and those in which it gives the plaintiff an opportunity of establishing his title at law, is most important to be attended to. In the first, the object is to ascertain the facts by which the court is to be guided in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, and therefore necessarily takes upon itself cognizance of the evidence at the trial, and grants or refuses a new trial without regard to those rules which guide a court of law upon this subject. In the other, it only suspends its proceedings till the right is settled at law; and being so settled it acts upon that without regard to the evidence upon which such right has been established or inquiring whether it was properly established or not." Therefore the case of an ejectment brought with the permission of the court, and an issue directed by a court, are not analogous, and do not come within the same principles. At the same time it is quite true that the court does as it did in Locke v. Colman (2 My. and Cr. 42), where there was a question of right to be ascertained depending upon the custom of a very extensive manor; I thought it right, although there was no objection to the trial, that there should be an opportunity of again investigating the circumstances upon which the right of the party depended, by a new trial.

But, my Lords, I cannot think that that applies at all to this case, because it appears to me, without entering at all into the particulars,—which I carefully avoid, as the matter is to be tried again,—that there was enough in the circumstances of the first trial to make it the duty of the court not to act upon that verdict, but to give the parties an opportunity of again proceeding to trial. The party claiming as heir had in the equity cause stated the marriage of his parents, under which therefore he claimed as their legitimate issue, as a marriage in January 1801. That was the case he made in the pleadings, and it was the case he proved by witnesses in the cause where witnesses were examined, who spoke to the marriage as being in January 1801. It appeared that the parents of the claimant had gone to Lancashire, and that some evidence was to be obtained there. Both parties went into Lancashire; and then the party opposed to this claimant found that in the summer, the month of August, I think, of 1801, another child (named Anthony) had been born and baptized there; so that if the marriage had taken place in January 1801, the plaintiff could not possibly be the heir, because there was thus another brother, Anthony, born subsequently to the marriage, and anterior to the period of the birth of the plaintiff. It appears that that fact was brought to the attention of the agent for the claimant; notwithstanding which, when publication took place, and the cause came to be heard in equity, it appeared that witnesses had been examined and proved,—when I say proved, I say they deposed to the marriage being in January 1801.

[484] The issue was then directed, and the parties went down to trial, and when they came down to trial it appeared then for the first time (there is some evidence of there being a communication made to the opposite agent before), but I say the first time with reference to any evidence given on the trial,—that the claimant set up a marriage not as in January 1801 but as in January 1802, which of course displaces Anthony, who was born in the summer of 1801.

Now, whether such marriage be hereafter to be established or not I do not at present at all inquire; it must necessarily be the subject of further investigation of the evidence before it goes to a new trial; and I shall therefore carefully abstain from saying any thing which can lead to a supposition that I have formed a very conclusive opinion as to the evidence upon which the claims of the parties are to be decided. But it is quite clear that, under these circumstances, the party who went to trial to meet the case to be made out was not at all prepared to meet the case which was brought before the court. He might have had a certainty of success if the case of the claimant had been adhered to as at first set out; because, if the claimant had continued to set up his title under a marriage in January 1801, all that it would have been necessary for the defendant to do would have been to show the birth of Anthony in the summer of 1801, and the case must have gone against the claimant.

Now this may have been a misapprehension or misstatement on the part of the witness, and may be set right on a further trial; but it cannot be said that the trial which has taken place was at all calculated to try the real question between the parties. For these [485] reasons I think it was quite right to grant a new trial. Upon that there is no dispute. But the ground upon which a new trial is to be granted is in order to try that over again which has not been satisfactorily tried, arising from the misapprehension (as I take it for the present purpose) of those who acted for the claimant in referring the marriage to another year, namely, 1801 instead of 1802.

But that is not the only point raised with reference to the grounds upon which a new trial is granted, although it is no doubt a very important one. With regard to the direction in the order, that the verdict in the former trial may be used upon the second trial,—why is that verdict which has been obtained under such circumstances to be used upon the new trial? If the case goes down to the jury for a new trial, with the order of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland that the verdict may be used upon that trial, it is all but directing the jury to find the same verdict on the second trial, because it is telling the jury that the Lord Chancellor is satisfied with that verdict; and if the Lord Chancellor is satisfied with that verdict, no doubt it would naturally make a very strong impression upon the mind of the jury that they ought to be satisfied with it also, unless there is some very important variance in the evidence between that produced on the first trial and that produced on the second. Again, if the Lord Chancellor was satisfied with the verdict, why should he send the case back to a jury? or why should he in terms direct the jury to take notice of that verdict, when by granting a new trial he has in substance declared that he does not think proper to give credit to it himself, at least to the extent of adjudi-[486]-cating upon the rights of the parties in respect of that verdict? The case therefore stands entirely by itself. No instance has been produced in which the court has directed a verdict to be used. If the verdict be evidence without such direction, of course that direction is improper, because then it is giving it as legal evidence, an importance beyond that which ought to be given to it. If, on the other hand, it be not legal evidence, then it is directing the jury to try the rights between the parties upon that which the law does not recognize as legitimate and proper evidence. Upon the question therefore, whether the order ought or ought not to contain the direction to use that verdict upon the new trial, I have not, from the beginning of the argument up to this time, entertained the slightest doubt.

But that raises another point perhaps not very important in the present case, but important as showing a considerable variance in the practice in Ireland from that which prevails in this country, and which in cases where the circumstances are precisely similar would be undoubtedly inconvenient, and ought to be altered, unless there is some good reason for it. It was stated, and I think that appears upon the cases with which your Lordships have been furnished, that the course of proceeding in Ireland is to set aside the verdict in directing a new trial; I would observe that that appears to me to be an erroneous proceeding. The inquiries which I have had made into the cases in this country, carried back for nearly two centuries, do not furnish any instance but one of such a proceeding; and when I refer your Lordships to that one case, it does appear to me that there is quite sufficient in the circumstances of that case to explain how it happened [487] that such a provision is to be found in that order. The only case to be found is that of Harcourt v. Cresswell in 1723, and it is furnished to me by one of the registrars of the Court of Chancery, but evidently we have not the terms of the order. Whether the order contains that I am not able to say; but what fell from the Lord Chancellor in giving his judgment was in these words:—"To set aside the verdict as being against evidence or for excessive damages; for the trial being directed to satisfy the conscience of the court, and there appearing to have been means used to influence the jury, the conscience of the court cannot be satisfied with the verdict; therefore set aside the verdict and proceed to a new trial, and commit the party who is found guilty of tampering with the jury." It is quite obvious that that is not the order, but that these were the words which fell from the court at the time the order was made.

Now that case, and a case which I shall presently refer your Lordships to, namely, a case before Lord Hardwicke, are the only authorities I believe to be found in the records of the court, or in any records at all, foreign to the existing practice of not setting aside the verdict, or at all interfering with the verdict which has been obtained. The case which has been referred to, which was before Lord Hardwicke, is Baker v. Hart, which is very imperfectly reported in Atkyns (3 Atky. 542). I have, from the registrar's book, obtained a full note of the order and of the proceedings; and what appears to be the real history of that case explains some of the expressions attributed to Lord Hard[488]-wicke, and which, according to the statement of the facts in Atkyns, are not at all intelligible. That also is a case where an ejectment was brought; the question of legitimacy there turning upon the fact of the date of the marriage of the supposed husband and the mother of the claimant. The claimant brought an ejectment, and obtained a verdict; affirming, therefore, the validity of the marriage of the parents. Afterwards a bill was filed, and the same question was raised, and two issues were directed; first, whether the daughter of the parties was the heir of the father, and upon that if the jury should find that she was not the heir of the father, then whether the other party claiming was the heir of the father. Those two issues went down to trial, and the jury found that the daughter was the heir of the father. Necessarily, therefore, if they found that the daughter was legitimate she would stand first, and the other would not be the heir. There were three verdicts; the verdict in ejectment, and the verdicts upon those two issues. Now, in that case Lord Hardwicke is made to express himself in these words:—"Where it is a matter of inheritance the Court, without setting aside the verdict, for the more solemn determination, in some cases, direct a second trial; and if the Court direct such trial without setting aside the former verdict, then the first may be given in evidence, and will have its weight with the jury. And therefore it is a very material difference to the parties; because, if I was to direct a trial on my setting aside the first verdict, the defendant would lose the benefit of urging the first verdict in his favour at another trial." His Lordship is made to say that it [489] had been stated by the judge who tried the issues, that the jury had been very much influenced by the verdict in the first trial. That must necessarily be in verdicts for ejectment, where the two are tried together. Those expressions, attributed to Lord Hardwicke, would assume that it was the practice of the Court of Chancery, upon an application for a new trial, to set aside the former verdict. But, my Lords, if any such practice existed, it would have been found of course in the registrar's searches, but no instances have been found except the one to which I have now referred.

I cannot therefore consider that that is the practice of the court. How those expressions of the Lord Chancellor are to be explained it is not now necessary to inquire. The investigation I have had made satisfies me that the impression which I entertained at the time this appeal was heard is correct,—namely, that it was not the practice of the court in directing a new trial to take any notice of the former verdict. Lord Hardwicke, it would appear from the report, assumed that if there is nothing said about the former trial, the verdict may be given in evidence. My Lords, I apprehend that Lord Hardwicke could not so have expressed himself, it being a well known rule of law that a verdict without judgment is no evidence at all, and the reason why at common law the courts will not receive as evidence a verdict without judgment is stated to be, because it does not appear that it may not have been set aside or disregarded, or that the court may have thought proper not to act upon it. There can be no judgment upon a verdict obtained in an issue directed from a court of equity. If, indeed, there be an order in equity acting upon the verdict, it would give the same quality and sanc-[490]-tion to the verdict which a verdict after judgment has at law. But when the court of equity for any reasons thinks proper to send the issue to a new trial, I apprehend that a mere verdict would not be evidence in the second trial of the issue; and whether it were used or not, it is quite obvious that the jury would be directed by the judge not to pay attention to the verdict which the court in granting a new trial had thought proper to disregard. Those expressions of Lord Hardwicke really appear to me to be quite unintelligible with reference to the known practice of the courts of equity.

I have thought it desirable, seeing that the practice in Ireland was a practice somewhat different from that which existed in England, namely, of setting aside the verdict where a new trial was directed, to call the attention of your Lordships to the state of the proceedings, in the hope that the courts of equity in Ireland may think it expedient to adopt a course of practice which has always prevailed and does now prevail in this country.

I therefore propose to your Lordships to reverse the order of Lord Plunket in so far as it has reference to the former verdict, leaving it as a simple direction that the parties should proceed to a new trial.

My Lords, the next point is with reference to the costs. The order of Lord Plunket directs the parties in applying for a new trial to pay the costs. In the view which Lord Plunket seems to have taken of the conduct of the parties, I was not very much surprised that that direction is contained in the order, because if it merely were an order applied for, and for the security of the respondent, it might be right to make such an order to indemnify him against the costs of the [491] trial. That assumes that there is no objection upon the face of the former trial, and that the party applying has not any ground of complaint against the conduct of the parties on the other side in the former trial; and I take it that that is his Lordship's view of the case. But without expressing any opinion as to the result of the evidence or the probable result of a new trial, I certainly see that looking at the conduct of the respondent upon the first trial, there was no chance whatever of the appellants obtaining from the hands of the jury a fair decision upon the real question between them. Differing therefore as I do from the Lord Chancellor of Ireland upon that point, I necessarily differ from him as to the propriety of the direction he has given with regard to costs. It appears to me that the costs of the former trial ought to be reserved, and the court will see better how to dispose of the question of costs when it sees how the rights of the parties are established by the verdict.

With regard to the other point of which the appellants complain, or rather the variation in the order which they ask for, that the trial may take place in some other county, and not in the county of Dublin,—the only fact stated as a ground for changing the venue is the indecorous manifestation of feeling exhibited by the former jury, not upon the verdict being pronounced, but at the conclusion of the address of the counsel for the claimant. On the one side that is attributed to too much feeling in some of the jury in favour of the claimant; on the other side it is attributed to mere admiration of the very eloquent speech which had been concluded by the counsel.

Neither one nor the other would justify the jury in [492] the expression of feeling or applause in which some of them indulged; but I cannot consider the fact of some gentlemen of warm feelings happening to be upon that jury as disqualifying another jury of the county of Dublin from exercising the duty which devolves upon them of trying the question. It is very well known that in most instances there is more feeling in the county in which the property is situated than in another county where the jurors selected are not likely to have any connexion with either the one side or the other. I do not think there is any sufficient case stated to induce the House to alter the venue, or to direct the second trial to be had other than in the county in which the former trial took place.

The result, therefore, if your Lordships concur in the view I take of this case, will be to order a new trial, directing the costs to be reserved, and striking out that part of the order which takes notice of the former trial.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said order of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, in part complained of in the said appeal, be varied, by omitting so much thereof as directs that the plaintiff be at liberty on such new trial to give the said former verdict in evidence, and that the defendants Alicia O'Connor, Hugh Morgan Tuite, and Thomas Ardill, the trustees, do pay the costs of the former trial; and that, subject to such variation, the said order be and the same is hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the question of the costs of such former trial be reserved till after the new trial directed by the said order shall have been had.

[493] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY, IRELAND.

EDWARD SHEEHY and Others, Appellants.*—Pemberton—Jacob—James Russell; MATHEW FITZMAURICE DEAN, Lord MUSKERRY, Respondent.—Knight Bruce—Sir W. Follett [11th June 1839].

[Mews' Dig. i. 331; vi. 489; x. 1650; xi. 579; S.C. 7 Cl. and F.; 1 Ll. and G. t. Plunk. 568; see also 1 H.L.C. 576, and note thereto.]

Leasing Power.—Question: Husband and wife, by post-nuptial settlement, convey part of the wife's estates to a trustee to the use of the husband for life, remainder to their eldest son for life, and with an ultimate remainder in fee to the husband, and a power to him to lease "for any term or terms of years or lives, and with or without covenants for renewal, and in case of the determination of all or any of the aforesaid lease or leases to make new or other leases thereof in manner aforesaid, and with or without any fine or fines, as he should think fit." He was also empowered "to raise or levy, by sale or mortgage, any sum or sums of money not exceeding in the whole £20,000, or to charge the premises therewith," for such uses as he should appoint, and to charge to any amount for younger children. The husband and wife afterwards executed three leases of portions of the estates comprised in the settlement, for terms of 999 years, upon which fines were taken. One of the leases contained a clause permitting the lessee to graff and burn the surface, and also a clause of surrender; and another contained clauses making the lessee dispunishable for waste, and permitting him to cut [494] timber, etc., and to graff and burn the surface, and in this lease was included part of the wife's estate not comprised in the settlement; the latter lease, and also the third lease, were made subject to existing freehold leases. The amount of the fines received upon the making of these and other leases was £10,208. The husband subsequently mortgaged those estates, subject to the aforesaid leases, for a sum of £10,500. The mortgagee filed a bill of foreclosure in the Court of Exchequer, and obtained a decree, in pursuance of which the lands were sold, subject to the leases. The first tenant in tail under the settlement filed a bill, impeaching the said decree, and also the leases as having been made contrary to the leasing power. Whether the leases were an undue exercise of the leasing power?—Remitted for reconsideration.

Practice—Enrolment of Decree—Rehearing.—Circumstances in which, without deciding on a ground of appeal, that a decree alleged to have been duly enrolled was incompetently opened, and a rehearing allowed, it was held (recalling the decree on rehearing), that parties were not bound by their consent at such rehearing not to take another case for opinion of court of law;—and the cause remitted to court below to hear parties as to the validity of said leases.

In 1732 John Fitzmaurice, being seised of an estate in fee simple in possession in the lands of Springfield, subject only to a legacy of £1000 charged thereon for his sister Mary, by ante-nuptial settlement conveyed Springfield to trustees, subject to the legacy of £1000 to the use of himself for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of his said intended marriage in tail, with a power to himself to charge the lands with £4000 for the younger children of his marriage, and in default of issue male of his marriage remainder to himself, his heirs and assigns.

[495] There was issue of the marriage one son, John (younger), and a daughter, and upon the marriage of the latter in 1759, John (elder), by virtue of the above power, charged Springfield estate with £4000 and £1000 (the sister's portion he had paid off), and conveyed the lands for a term of 200 years upon trust to raise the sum of £5000 by sale or mortgage, which charge became vested by mesne assignments in John Godley. Previous to 1760 John Fitzmaurice (elder) had purchased fee simple estates called Farrihy and Gurtahedy, and after the death of his wife Anne, having married Hester Littleton, he conveyed to trustees, by a post-nuptial settlement, in 1763, the Farrihy and all other estates in Limerick county of which he had power to dispose, to the use of himself for life, remainder to Hester for life, to whom he also granted a life use after his own death in his personal estate. John Fitzmaurice (younger) died in 1775 intestate, leaving an only child, Anne; and after him, in the same year, died John (elder), also intestate, without issue of his second marriage, leaving Anne his grand-daughter and his heiress at law, and Hester his widow, him surviving. In 1775 Anne, then a minor, married Sir Robert Tilson Deane, afterwards Lord Muskerry; and in 1776, in order to terminate existing differences between Hester the widow and Sir Robert, a deed of compromise was executed between Hester and Sir Robert and Anne his wife, whereby upon recital of the settlement of 1763, in consideration of Hester assuring to Sir Robert all her right and interest in and to the real and personal estate of her late husband, she (Hester) and Sir Robert conveyed to trustees the Springfield and Farrihy and Gurtahedy estates, for a term of 99 years, with powers to lease or [496] mortgage the same, to secure to Hester an annuity of £1083 6s. 8d. in and subject thereto, in trust for the use of Sir Robert and Anne his wife, and the heirs and assigns of the latter.

Anne attained majority in 1779, when there being two sons of the marriage, a settlement was executed on 25th May 1779 between Sir Robert and Anne his wife of the first part, and Thomas Lloyd of the second part, whereby for assuring the lands therein mentioned, and for making a provision for a jointure for the said Anne, and a further provision for the children of the marriage, they granted to Lloyd, his heirs and assigns, the Springfield and Farrihy estates (the property of Anne), to the use of Sir Robert for life, without impeachment for waste; remainder to Anne for life, without impeachment for waste; remainder to Robert Fitzmaurice Deane, their eldest son, for life, and to his first and every other son in tail male; with remainder to the second son, John F. Deane, for life, without impeachment for waste; with an ultimate remainder to Sir Robert; and it was thereby agreed, "that it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Sir Robert, from time to time and at all times during his life, to lease or demise all, every or any part or parts, parcels or parcel of the aforesaid towns, lands, tenements, hereditaments, and premises, for any term or terms of years or lives, and with or without covenants for renewal, and in case of the determination of all or any of the aforesaid leases or lease respectively, from time to time to make new or other leases thereof in manner aforesaid, and with or without any fine or fines as he shall think fit;” and it was also agreed, that it should be lawful to and for the said Sir Robert to charge [497] and encumber all and singular the said towns, lands, tenements, hereditaments, and premises aforesaid, or any part or parts thereof, with any sum or sums for the younger child or children of the said Sir Robert begotten or to be begotten on the said Dame Anne, in such proportions and manner, and payable at such time or times, as he shall by deed or will appoint;” and further, that it should also “be lawful to and for the said Sir Robert to raise and levy, by one or more sales or mortgages of all or any part of the premises, any sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of £20,000, or to charge the premises aforesaid therewith, to and for such use and uses as he shall at any time or times by deed or will appoint.”

By the same deed Sir Robert and his wife covenanted that they would, before the end of the then next Trinity Term, levy a fine of the said towns, lands, tenements, and hereditaments unto the said Thomas Lloyd and his heirs, to the uses of the said indenture of settlement. On the same deed there was an endorsement signed and sealed by Sir Robert and his wife, in the following words:—“It was agreed between the parties within mentioned, previous to the execution of the within deed, that the within-named Robert Fitzmaurice Deane and John Thomas Fitzmaurice Deane, and every other child of said Sir Robert Tilson Deane and Dame Anne his wife, who shall, under the limitations within mentioned, be possessed of the premises within mentioned, or any part thereof, to make leases of the whole or any part thereof for any term not exceeding three lives or thirty-one years, provided such lease be made to commence in possession, and that the best improved yearly rent that can be had [498] for the same at the time of making such lease be reserved thereby, and that no fine or other consideration shall be taken for or on account of the making thereof.”

Sir Robert and Anne, by indenture dated 26th August 1779, in consideration of £1000, demised to William Sheehy for a term of 999 years, at a rent of £20, the lands of Rosnerelane, and also part of Springfield, subject to a lease of the latter in 1746 by John Fitzmaurice to Isaac Howell for three lives, at the rent of £40 3s.; and Sir Robert covenanted for himself and his wife, their heirs, executors, etc., to levy one or more fines unto the said William Sheehy, his executors, etc., of all the premises thereby demised. The lands included in this lease were part of the premises comprised in the settlement of 25th May 1779. By indenture of lease dated 28th October 1779, Sir Robert and Anne, in consideration of £2000, demised to Roger Sheehy the younger the lands of Clonmore, part of the lands in the settlement of May 1779, for a term of 999 years, at a yearly rent of £150, with permission to Roger Sheehy, his executors, etc., during the continuance of the term to graff, cut, and burn the soil and surface of the lands thereby demised, without incurring or being liable to any penalty or forfeiture for the same, notwithstanding the several acts to prevent the pernicious practice of burning land, and with power to Roger Sheehy to quit and surrender the demised premises at the end of every year of the term, upon giving six months' notice in writing. By indenture of lease dated 4th June 1780, Sir Robert and Anne, in consideration of £5780, demised to Roger Sheehy the elder, portions of the Springfield estate and Gurtahedy, being (excepting [499] Gurtahedy) part of the lands in the settlement of 25th May 1779, subject to the remainder of the terms unexpired of different leases then subsisting, and set out in a schedule annexed to the lease, to hold the same for a term of 999 years, at the yearly rent of £50, without impeachment for waste, and with power to the lessee, his executors, etc., to cut, fell, and carry away all timber and other trees then growing or which thereafter should grow on the said demised premises, and to graff and burn any part of the said demised premises as often as he or they should think proper, with a covenant on the part of Sir Robert and his wife to levy a fine or fines to Roger Sheehy, his executors, etc., for the effectually confirming the said demise. In the schedule were specified five leases for lives of different portions of the lands as then subsisting, and all executed previous to the settlement in 1779, the rent reserved by the lease being less than the former rents; the leases to the Sheehys containing usual clauses of entry and distress, etc., and a reservation of the royalties.

Sir Robert and his wife levied no fine pursuant to the above covenants. Sir Robert, by means of fine taken upon these and other leases, raised £10,208.

By deed, dated 29th April 1780, reciting the settlement of 25th of May 1779, and the power therein to raise not exceeding £20,000 by sale or mortgage, Sir Robert mortgaged to St. John Chinnery the Springfield and Farrihy estates, subject to the leases to the Sheehys, for £6000. Sir Robert was, in 1780, created Baron Muskerry. By deed, dated the 7th of April 1783, reciting the settlement of 1779, and the mortgage of 1780, Lord Muskerry executed a further mortgage to St. John Chinnery of the Springfield and Farrihy [500] estates, subject also to the leases to the Sheehys, for £4500.

In 1780 Hester Fitzmaurice, her annuity being largely in arrear, filed a bill in chancery against Lord Muskerry, the lessees in the several leases being made parties, praying that those leases might be declared fraudulent and void as against her; and that the amount due to her on her annuity, an account being taken, might be raised by a sale of the lands comprised in the trust term created for securing the said annuity. In 1790 Hester died, whereupon her executor, Lord Westcote, revived her suit, and by amended bill made Sir B. Chinnery, the personal representative and heir at law of St. John Chinnery his brother, a party, and putting in issue the two deeds of mortgage for £6000 and £4500. All the defendants, except Lord and Lady Muskerry, answered; and in December 1779 there was decree to account. On 27th of January 1802 the master, by his report, found £10,819 due to Lord Westcote as representative of Hester Fitzmaurice, and £5000 due to Godley. On the 18th of November 1802 Lord Redesdale, C., on hearing the cause, directed that the sum of £10,819 due to Lord Westcote should be raised by mortgage of the estates, and that the trustees of the term of ninety-nine years securing the annuity should execute mortgages of the remainder of the term to a trustee, to be named by Lord Westcote; and also declared that the several leases to the Sheehys were fraudulent and void as against the said Hester and her trustees and Lord Westcote; and that the full and fair rents for the estates, discharged from the said leases, ought to have been paid from time to time to the receiver in the cause, and referred it to the master [501] to set fair rents on the estates comprised in the leases, and take an account of what was due for such rents, after giving credit for the sums paid by the tenants to the receiver; and also declared that in case the tenants should redeem the said mortgage by payment of what should be found due for rents beyond the rent reserved in their respective leases, or by payment from their own money, they should be entitled to stand in the place of Lord Westcote for so much as they should pay beyond the rent received by their respective leases.

Sir Broderick Chinnery in 1784 had, in the name of his brother St. John Chinnery, filed a bill in the Court of Exchequer against Lord and Lady Muskerry to foreclose the mortgages of 29th April 1780 and 7th April 1783, pending which suit St. John died without issue, leaving Sir Broderick his heir at law his executor.

By deed dated 11th December 1802, Lord Westcote, in consideration of £4000, assigned to Sir B. Chinnery the sum of £10,819, and the full benefit of the decree of 18th November 1802, and by indenture of the same date the trustees of the term of ninety-nine years (created by deed in 1779 to secure Hester's annuity), by Lord Westcote's direction, and in pursuance of the decree of 1802, mortgaged the lands comprised in the said term to the said Sir B. Chinnery, his executors, administrators, and assigns.

In 1804 Sir B. Chinnery revived the exchequer suit, and obtained a decree to account; and in 1806 a sum of £20,085 7s. 9½d. was reported due to him on the mortgages executed to Sir B. Chinnery, and also £10,819 as assignee of Lord Westcote, and £5000 were reported due on Godley's mortgage. Godley assigned this charge to Sir B. Chinnery during the same cause. [502] In February 1807 there was a decree in the exchequer suit for a sale of Springfield and Farrihy estates, for payment, with interest and costs, of the sum reported due on the footing of the mortgages, subject nevertheless to the debts decreed to Godley and Lord Westcote, and to the remedies for receiving thereof, pursuant to decree of 1802, and subject to the several leases to the Sheehys.

In 1808 Sir B. Chinnery died, after bequeathing to his two sons the sums due on the several mortgages, and on Lord Westcote's claim, and his will was proved and the suit revived by Alice, his widow and executrix.

Under the decree of 1807 in the exchequer suit, Springfield and Farrihy were put up for sale, subject to Godley's and Lord Westcote's demand, and the leases to the Sheehys. On 8th May 1812, Alice, executrix of Sir B. Chinnery, became purchaser, and the estates were conveyed to her, but the deed of conveyance was executed by the Chief Remembrancer only. Robert Lord Muskerry died in 1818, leaving Anne Lady Muskerry and two sons, John Thomas Deane Lord Muskerry and Mathew Deane, him surviving.

In May 1819 John Thomas Lord Muskerry and Anne Lady Muskerry (his mother) filed the original bill in this cause. But John Thomas Lord Muskerry having died in 1824 without issue, and his mother dying in 1830, Mathew Lord Muskerry (the respondent) by amended bill in 1826 against the widow and children of Sir B. Chinnery, and the representatives of the Sheehys, the lessees, after stating the transactions between Robert Lord Muskerry and Sir B. Chinnery, charged that the said several leases were not authorized by any power in the settlement of 1779; that Lord Muskerry, having raised £10,208, by taking fines upon leases, and also [503] £10,500 by mortgages to St. John Chinnery, had exceeded his powers to charge under the settlement of 1779, which limited him to £20,000; that such mortgages having been made subject to said fraudulent leases were contrary to the intent and meaning of the power; that the account in the exchequer cause was fraudulent and erroneous, and that if due credits had been given nothing would have been found due in respect of said mortgages; that the decree in the said cause was also erroneous in directing a sale for the payment of a subsequent mortgage, subject to a prior mortgage and other prior incumbrances, without providing for the payment thereof out of the produce of the sale, and likewise impeaching the said decree on other grounds; and prayed that the leases to the Sheehys might be declared not to have been warranted by the leasing power in the settlement of 1779, and fraudulent and void as against the plaintiff (respondent) claiming in remainder under the said settlement; and that the mortgages to St. John Chinnery might be decreed not warranted by any of the powers in said settlement, and void as against plaintiff (respondent); and that the exchequer decrees might be decreed as fraudulently obtained; and for an account of what was due to Alice as representative of Sir B. Chinnery, or Lord Westcote's and Godley's demands, and that in taking such account such sums only should be allowed as Sir B. Chinnery actually and bona fide paid as assignee of Lord Westcote and Godley respectively, and in case the said mortgages or either of them should be declared a subsisting lien on said estates, then that an account might be taken of the sums due in respect thereof; and that upon payment of the sums actually and bona [504] fide paid for the same, the plaintiff might be entitled to redeem the mortgaged premises; and for a reconveyance of the same; and for an account also of the sums received by Sir B. Chinnery or his representatives, or which without wilful default he or they might have received out of the Springfield and Farrihy estates, etc.

The cause was heard before Lord Plunket, C., on the 29th of November 1832; and his Lordship directed a case for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas upon the following question:—"Whether the leases, bearing date respectively the 28th day of August 1779, the 28th day of October 1779, and the 14th day of June 1780, made by Sir Robert Tilson Deane, who was afterwards created Baron Muskerry, and Dame Anne his wife, to William Sheehy, Roger Sheehy the younger, and Roger Sheehy the elder respectively, or any or either and which of the said leases were or was warranted by any power contained in the deed bearing date the 25th day of May 1779?" all further directions being reserved.

The Court of Common Pleas certified that the leases were not warranted by any power contained in the deed of settlement of 1779.

Alice Chinnery died intestate, after the argument in Common Pleas, leaving her two sons her surviving. The cause came on (4th of February 1835) before the Lord Chancellor (Sir E. B. Sugden) for further directions, upon bill, answer, and this certificate.

When the cause was called on the counsel for the plaintiff (respondent) was understood to state to the court that there was an arrangement in progress with respect to the demands arising on the mortgages, in which the counsel on both sides had concurred; but [505] that as the Chinnerys, in whom the mortgages were vested, were lunatics, a reference was necessary, and that a petition had been presented.

The Lord Chancellor referred it to the master to inquire and report whether the proposed compromise would be for the benefit of the lunatics. His Lordship stated his wish to have the assistance of two of the common law judges in deciding the question as to the validity of the leases.

That question came on, 11th February 1835, to be argued before the Lord Chancellor, assisted by the Lords Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and Chief Baron.

In the course of the argument the Lord Chancellor stated that his attention had been withdrawn from the facts of the case from the time it was stated that a compromise had been entered into, and as the bill had been filed to impeach the mortgages and the sale, and as the Chinnerys and Lord Muskerry had agreed to withdraw from the consideration of the court the question as to the validity of the sale, he did not think he had jurisdiction to decide upon the validity of the leases, and that he was now differently placed than he would have been if the proceedings had been continued against all the parties, and wished to hear one counsel of a side, whether in the then state of the pleadings he could decide upon the validity of the leases.

By the decree as made up (12th Feb. 1835), after reciting that the plaintiff had, by his counsel in open court, waived insisting on any relief as sought by his bill in respect of the said final decree of the Court of Exchequer, and the said sale in pursuance thereof, and that it had appeared that under the said decree in the Court of [506] Exchequer, the said lands were sold to the purchaser Alice Chinnery, subject to the said indentures of lease of 28th October 1779 and 4th June 1780, it was ordered that the plaintiff's bill should be dismissed with costs as against the defendants the representatives of the lessees of the leases of 28th October 1779 and 4th June 1780 (the lessees who appeared at the hearing), save as to costs incurred in respect of the said proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas, as to which it was declared that all parties should abide their own costs. The said decree of 12th of February was, as the appellant contended, duly enrolled.

On 8th May 1835 the respondent presented his petition to Lord Plunket, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, praying for a rehearing of the cause, whereupon his Lordship was pleased to make an order, without notice to the appellants, that the case should be set down to be reheard.

On the 16th May 1835 the appellants Edward Sheehy and John Sheehy applied to the Lord Chancellor to set aside the order for rehearing, as having been obtained by the suppression of the fact that the decree of 12th February 1835 had been enrolled. Affidavits were filed in support of and against the motion.

On the 28th May 1835, on debate in open court, the Lord Chancellor made the following order: "Whereas Mr. Warren and others, of counsel with the defendants Edward and John Sheehy, this day moved the court to set aside the order of rehearing dated the 8th day of May instant, and also moved for the costs of the said motion: Upon debate of the matter, and on reading the said order; the decree of the 12th day of February 1835; the affidavit of John Walsh, filed the [507] 15th of May 1835; the order in Chinnerys, lunatics, of the 5th day of February 1835; the report of the 8th of April 1835; the affidavit of the plaintiff, filed the 23d of May 1835; the affidavit of William Furlong, filed the same day; the affidavit of Theophilus Latouche, filed the same day; the notes on hearing of 21st November 1832 and the 12th of February 1835; the general rule of the 31st of March 1819; the two certificates of the clerk of the rolls, dated the 11th day of May 1835; as also the new rule 132; and hearing what was offered by Mr. Blackburne and others of counsel with the plaintiff; and Mr. John Walsh, solicitor for defendant, and Mr. William Furlong, solicitor for plaintiff, attended: It is ordered by the right honourable the Lord Chancellor of Ireland that the said enrolment be opened for the purpose of the rehearing the cause."

On the 4th June 1835 the cause accordingly came on for rehearing, and was further heard on the 6th, 8th, and 11th June, before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, when his Lordship pronounced a decree, which states, that it appeared to the court that the recital in the decree of dismissal that the respondent waived any relief against the exchequer decree and the sale thereunder, was erroneously inserted in that decree; and on reading the order of reference, and inasmuch as the reference was depending at the time of pronouncing the decree of dismissal, and the Chinnerys were present in court insisting on their rights, it was ordered that the decree of dismissal should be reversed, and the master's report be confirmed; that the compromise therein set forth be carried into effect. The respondent was declared [506] entitled to redeem the mortgages on payment of £24,000 and interest within twelve months; it was further ordered, that the premises be reconveyed discharged of the mortgages, and in default of payment the respondent to be foreclosed; and the respondent was further ordered to release the claims of dower due to Anne Lady Muskerry deceased; and the cause was ordered to stand for further hearing, with liberty to all parties to adopt any defence they might be advised arising out of the said compromise and the decree.

In pursuance of the decree of 11th June 1835 the cause came on to be further heard before his Lordship on the 13th day of July 1835; whereupon his Lordship having proposed that any direction which the counsel for the said defendants Richard Boyle Chinnery, Maria Chinnery, and Louisa Chinnery should require for the purpose of protecting their interest in respect of their having a good and sufficient tenant or tenants of the lands and premises comprised in the several leases in the pleadings mentioned, in the event of the said leases being defeated, be inserted in any decree now to be pronounced; and the counsel for the said defendants Richard Boyle Chinnery, Maria Chinnery, and Louisa Chinnery at the bar declining the same; and "upon reading the case submitted for the opinion of the justices of His Majesty's Court of Common Pleas of Ireland, and the certificate of the learned judges of the said court, therein setting forth that the said case had been argued before them by the counsel of the parties, and that they had considered it, and were of opinion that the leases in the pleadings mentioned, bearing date respectively the 26th day of August 1779, the 28th day of October 1779, and the 14th [509] day of June 1780, made by Sir Robert Tilson Deane, Baronet, afterwards created Lord Muskerry, and Dame Anne his wife, to William Sheehy, Roger Sheehy the younger, and Roger Sheehy the elder respectively, were not warranted by any power contained in the deed of settlement bearing date the 25th day of May 1779; and the said defendants the lessees, Edward Sheehy, John Sheehy, William John Sheehy, Bryan Sheehy a minor, by the said William John Sheehy his father and guardian, Anne Westropp, Thomas Johnston Westropp a minor, by the said Anne Westropp his mother and guardian, by their counsel in open court, declining to accept an offer made by his Lordship to send the said case for the opinion of His Majesty's Court of King's Bench; and upon reading the conditional decree, bearing date the 26th day of April 1832, against the defendants James Keatinge and Henry Singer Keatinge, the orders of the 7th and 15th days of June 1832, and the affidavit of service thereof: it is this day, that is to say, Monday the 13th day of July 1835, ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the right honourable the Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, that the said conditional decree be and the same is hereby made absolute against the said defendants James Keatinge and Henry Singer Keatinge: And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said decree of the 12th day of February 1835 be and the same is hereby reversed; and it is hereby declared that the insertion therein of the waiver by the plaintiff therein recited was not warranted by the facts: And it is hereby further ordered, adjudged, and declared, that the said three several leases in the pleadings [510] and in the said certificate of the Court of Common Pleas specified, bearing date respectively the 26th day of August 1779, the 28th day of October 1779, and the 14th day of June 1780, made by the said Sir Robert Tilson Deane, Baronet, who was afterwards created Lord Baron Muskerry, and Dame Anne his wife, to William Sheehy, Roger Sheehy the younger, and Roger Sheehy the elder respectively, are not, nor is any or either of them, valid at law or warranted by any power contained in the deed of settlement of the 25th day of May 1779, and that there is no ground for sustaining any or either of them on equitable principles; and the said leases being invalid at law and not sustainable on equitable grounds, it is hereby further ordered, adjudged, and declared that the same are void: And accordingly it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the three several leases be and they are hereby set aside respectively: And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that an injunction do forthwith issue to put the plaintiff into possession of the premises comprised in the said three several leases respectively: And it is further ordered, that the said defendant Mary Bourke, the heiress at law of Thomas Lloyd in the said settlement of the 25th May 1779 named, be paid her costs of this suit by the plaintiff, and that the said defendant John Robert Bourke be likewise paid his costs of this suit by the plaintiff: And it is further ordered, that the plaintiff and the several other parties do abide their own costs respectively: And it is further ordered, that the deposit made by the plaintiff on setting down the cause for rehearing be paid back to the said plaintiff's six clerk, [511] and accordingly the plaintiff may make up and enrol a decree as aforesaid, for performance whereof the process of this court is from time to time to issue as is in such cases usual."

The appellants appealed against the order for rehearing made on the 8th May 1835, the order for opening the enrolment of said decree of the 12th February 1835 made on the 28th May 1835, and the final decree made on the 13th July 1835.

Appellants.—The decree of dismissal of the 12th of February 1835 was duly enrolled; and if so, the Court of Chancery ought not to have made the order of 28th May 1835 for opening the enrolment of the decree of 12th of February 1835, but should have suffered the respondent to have sought redress by appeal to the House of Lords, in case he thought himself aggrieved by the decree of dismissal; the more especially as the respondent had obtained the order of the 8th May 1835 for rehearing the cause without notice to the appellants, by their withholding from the Lord Chancellor all knowledge of the fact of the decree of the dismissal having been duly enrolled.

The respondent having by his counsel in open court withdrawn from the consideration of the court the question whether the sale of the Springfield and Farrihy estates to Dame Alice Chinnery, subject to the leases the interest in which had become vested in the appellants, was impeachable or not, he was not in a situation to impeach the validity of the leases. The recital contained in the decree of Lord Chancellor Plunket, "That the recital contained in the said decree of dismissal of the 12th day of February 1835, [512] stating that the said plaintiff, Mathew Baron Muskerry, by his counsel in open court, had waived insisting on any relief, as sought by his bill in respect of the final decree pronounced by the Court of Exchequer in his bill mentioned, and the sale in pursuance thereof was erroneously inserted therein, being unfounded in fact, and not warranted by any statement or waiver made on the part of the said Lord Muskerry," is an averment made without evidence, and contrary to the fact, and contrary to the averment of the decree duly made and signed by the Lord Chancellor, in whose presence and hearing the waiver took place.

The validity of the appellants leases, as against the parties claiming under the settlement of May 1779, is recognized by Lord Redesdale's decree in 1802 and the decree of the Court of Exchequer in 1807; and the lessees are moreover entitled to the benefit of the decree of 1802 in respect of the sums of money which they paid in pursuance of that decree and the agreement of the 16th of May 1803. The leases are warranted by the leasing power contained in the settlement of the 25th of May 1779; and even if the leasing power were ambiguous in its terms in respect of any of the provisions contained in any of the leases, yet the respondent, claiming as a volunteer under the parties who introduced such ambiguous expressions into their deed, ought to be prevented from taking advantage of any such ambiguity, but on the contrary any ambiguity therein ought to be construed in favour of the appellants claiming under lessees who paid large fines and entered into covenants to pay rents equivalent to the value of the land when leased, or such fines and such leases being [513] in all respects bona fide in respect to the lessees, and without any ground for suspicion on their part of the settlement of 25th May 1799 being in any degree impeachable, or the leasing power being insufficient to authorize the leases and the clauses therein contained.

Although the leasing power should be construed as not expressly authorizing the taking of fines on leases, yet inasmuch as there is no express restriction in the settlement against taking such fines, and as there is an express power therein authorizing Sir Robert Tilson Deane to raise or levy by sale or mortgage any sum of money not exceeding £20,000, the fines should be deemed to be part of the £20,000 raised by sale of so much of the rents as would otherwise have been reserved in the leases, and as in fact the most beneficial way of exercising the power of raising the £20,000 as respects the rights of the persons entitled in remainder; and although Sir Robert Tilson Deane by his subsequent mortgages to St. John Chinnery raised a sum of money, which together with the fines exceeded the £20,000 by a sum of £708, yet such subsequent dealings with St. John Chinnery could not affect the validity of the previous leases. The lessees and the appellants are claiming under them as purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice of any ground of claim on the part of the respondent, or of those under whom he derives, to impeach the validity of the leases, and are therefore entitled to rely on their title as such purchasers for valuable consideration as against the respondent claiming under the post-nuptial settlement of 25th May 1779. Even if at law the leases should be considered as not authorized by the leasing power, yet the respondent was not entitled to the aid of a court of equity to set aside [514] leases bona fide made in consideration of large sums of money paid by the lessees, such lessees and their representatives having been suffered to remain in undisturbed enjoyment of the demised premises without any adverse claim for forty years, during which period they had necessarily expended large sums of money in the improvement of the lands, and which leases had been acquiesced in by all parties as due executions of the leasing power in Lord Westcote's cause, in which cause the leases were the subject of discussion before Lord Redesdale, then Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who made a decretal order therein in the year 1802, sustaining the leases against all parties except prior incumbrancers; and the validity of which leases was also subsequently recognized by the Court of Exchequer in the foreclosure cause in the year 1807, and the lands decreed to be sold subject to such leases, under which decree Dame Alice Chinnery had become the purchaser of the lands expressly subject to those leases.

Respondent.—The course pursued, which the appellants objected to, and the result of the rehearing, could not reasonably be complained of; for the final decree appealed against only brought the cause on the merits back to the position in which it stood upon the certificate of the Court of Common Pleas, finding that the leases were not warranted by any powers in the deed of 1779. Lord Chancellor Sugden ought, before over-ruling that decision, to have directed another case for opinion. And if the appellants stood merely on point of practice it was clear that the question whether the decree had been enrolled or not was so doubtful that the safe course to pursue was for the Lord Chancellor to open the [515] enrolment, with a view to a rehearing, the affidavits showed that the Master of the Rolls held there had been no enrolment. It appeared that the solicitor for the appellants lodged two engrossments of the decree in the rolls office, the first transmitted by the registrar, and the second by his six clerk; but these were mere transcripts of the decree, made up in the short form as directed by the new rules, which new rules do not apply to enrolment of decrees or alter the practice with respect to enrolments; and all that the deputy keeper of the rolls could certify was, that a parchment copy of the decree, signed by Sir Edward Sugden, Chancellor, had been lodged at the office; thus the decree had not been duly enrolled according to the established practice of the Court. It was at least a doubtful question whether the new rules had changed the practice, and it was, therefore, a fit case in which to exercise the discretionary power of the Court to open the enrolment, and not to suffer the party to be prejudiced by the uncertain state of the practice; because, by reason of the appellants joining as they have done, it is incompetent for them to object to the opening of the enrolment of the said decree.

There was a mistake, in point of fact, as to the relief prayed against, the sale in the exchequer having been waived; the sale was waived and had been waived long before, but the relief against it was never waived. In point of law, though a sale be made subject to impeachable leases, they may be afterwards impeached, especially if the purchaser do not object, as in this instance.

Besides, the decision of the Court of Common Pleas was right, but in any event, ought not to have been over-ruled, (as it was by Sir Edward Sugden's decrees,) [516] unless upon a case sent to another court, which was offered by Lord Plunket but declined by the appellants.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case I felt particularly desirous to deliver my judgment in the presence of the counsel who argued it; so long a time having elapsed I think it right to enter more minutely into the facts of the case, in as far as they bear upon the two points which were raised in the argument.

The first point in this case is one of form and practice, namely, whether the decree appealed from was regular? or in other words, whether it was competent for the court in the then state of the proceedings to pronounce such a decree? In order to come to a conclusion upon this point it will be necessary shortly to examine the different interests of the parties to the cause.

In 1775 Anne Fitzmaurice was seised in fee of the Springfield estate, subject to a charge of £5000 vested in John Godley, and in fee absolutely of two other estates, called Farrihy and Gortaheedy. She married Sir Robert Deane, and her mother-in-law Hester making a claim upon the estate, it was arranged that she should accept an annuity charged upon a ninety-nine years term over all the estates in full of her demand.

In 1779 a post-nuptial settlement was made of the estates of Springfield and Farrihy, under which the questions in this cause arise. Under that settlement, after life estates to the husband and wife, the estates were limited to the two sons then living for life, remainder to their sons in tail male, remainder to any other sons of the settlor in tail; power was reserved to [517] Sir Robert Deane of granting leases and of charging the estate with £20,000.

This power of leasing he exercised by granting a lease dated 26th August 1779, which is now vested in the appellants William John Sheehy and Bryan Sheehy; by granting another lease, dated 28th October 1779, now vested in the appellants Edward and John Sheehy; by granting another lease, dated 4th June 1780, now vested in the appellants Ann Westropp and Thomas Johnston Westropp. He also exercised the power of charging the estate by two mortgages to St. John Chinnery, one dated 29th April 1780 for £6000, and the other 7th April 1783 for £4500.

On the 18th November 1802 a decree was made in a suit instituted to compel payment of the arrears of the annuity secured to Hester under the deed of the 20th June 1776, the right to which was then vested in Lord Westcote by mortgage of the estate charge; and it was by that decree declared that the leases were fraudulent and void as against their charge, and that the tenants were to account for the full value from the year 1784, but the tenants were to be at liberty to redeem the charge, and as against the estate to be repaid what they might pay for that purpose either by way of rent or sums advanced by them. This suit was instituted in 1782, and soon afterwards, that is, in 1784, Chinnery the mortgagee filed a bill in the Exchequer to foreclose, and in 1787 a decree was made merely of reference to take the accounts, and soon after the decree in the chancery suit, that is, in December 1802, Lord Westcote assigned to Chinnery the mortgagee all his interest under the decree of the 18th November 1802.

[518] On the 19th February 1807 a decree of foreclosure was made in the Exchequer suit, upon the report of the deputy remembrancer, who found a large sum due upon Chinnery's mortgage, but subject to the decree in Chancery of November 1802, and to the leases, and to another mortgage of £5000 then vested in Godley, but which was afterwards assigned to Chinnery the plaintiff. Under this decree a sale of the Springfield and Farrihy estates took place before the remembrancer, and Alice Chinnery, in whom the mortgage was then vested, became the purchaser, but subject, according to the decree, to Lord Westcote's charge, Godley's mortgage, and the leases.

In 1812 a conveyance was directed to be made under their purchase, but it was not executed except by the deputy remembrancer. In 1819 a bill was filed in the Court of Chancery in Ireland by the respondent, then first tenant in tail, and the other parties then interested under the settlement of 1779, impeaching the title of the mortgagees and of the leasees. In 1832 the cause came to be heard before Lord Plunket, who directed a case for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas as to whether the leases were warranted by the power. In February 1834 the certificate of the Common Pleas was obtained, finding that the leases were not warranted by the power contained in the settlement of the 25th May 1779.

Before the cause came on for hearing upon this certificate, an arrangement having taken place between the plaintiff, the now respondent, and the Chinnerys, in whom the mortgages and Lord Westcote's charge were then vested, the Court was informed that no judgment was required as between the plaintiff and the mortgagees; [519] upon which Sir Edward Sugden, then Lord Chancellor of Ireland, expressed his opinion that the plaintiff having waived all relief against the mortgagees, and as to the sale in the Exchequer suit, no judgment could be pronounced as to the leases, and therefore dismissed the bill as against the defendants claiming the several leases. Before this time, that is on the 5th February 1835, one of the parties interested in the mortgages being a lunatic, a reference was made to inquire whether the proposed arrangement would be for the benefit of the lunatic; and after the decree, that is on the 8th April 1835, the master reported in the affirmative. This decree, according to the case made by the defendants, was enrolled, but that is denied by the plaintiff.

On the 8th May 1835 an order for rehearing was made as of course; and on the 28th May 1835, upon an application by the appellants to discharge the order for rehearing, an order was made to open the enrolment for the purpose of the rehearing.

On the 13th July 1835 Lord Plunket pronounced his decree upon the rehearing, carrying into effect the terms of the arrangement giving to the plaintiff the benefit of the redemption on payment of the sum agreed to be paid upon account of the mortgages and charges, and as against the lessees declaring the leases void, they having declined to take another case for the opinion of the King's Bench.

The appeal is against the order of the 8th May 1835 for a rehearing, the order of the 28th May 1835 opening the enrolment, and the final decree of the 13th July 1835. The two first may be considered together, the question as to both being the regularity and propriety of the order for rehearing, that is whether [520] under the circumstances the Court was precluded by the enrolment from rehearing the cause.

It appears from the affidavit of Mr. Furlong that it was a subject of doubt whether there had been in fact any enrolment of the decree; the deputy keeper of the rolls having objected to the engrossments left with him, as being merely copies of the decree in the short form, and that he had, therefore, consulted the Master of the Rolls, who was of opinion that they were not to be considered as an enrolment, and therefore he declined to give any certificate of the enrolment, and, in fact, there was not any such certificate. Mr. Furlong, the plaintiff's solicitor, having received this information, explains the reason of his not having made any application to the Court to vacate the enrolment; but it appears that the defendants, Edward and John Sheehy, moved to set aside the order for a rehearing upon the ground of the decrees having been enrolled, whereupon Lord Plunket ordered that the enrolment should be opened, for the purpose of rehearing the cause.

There certainly is a want of regularity in this proceeding, which may perhaps be accounted for by the doubt which appears to have existed as to whether there had in fact been any enrolment; and if the Lord Chancellor was of opinion that under the circumstances there had been no enrolment, or that there was doubt about it, or that if the enrolment were good there was sufficient ground for vacating it, he may have thought it right to remove the doubt by his order of the 28th May 1835. The question, however, now is, whether it be necessary to dispose of this appeal upon the ground of this irregularity, and after all the expense and delay which has been experienced to send the parties back to [521] commence their proceedings de novo, so far as to make it necessary for the present respondent to appeal against the decree of the 12th February 1835, instead of deciding any of the questions between the parties upon the appellants appeal against the decree of the 13th July 1835.

A court of appeal is always unwilling to adopt such a course when it is possible to reach any of the merits of the case. In questions respecting the enrolment of decrees, the court exercises a discretionary power, and although such discretion ought to be regulated by precedent and authority, yet the circumstances of this case were very peculiar, and I think that your Lordships will not consider it to be your duty upon this question of form to refuse to entertain the other points in the cause.

If then your Lordships feel at liberty to consider the merits of the decree of dismissal of the 12th February 1835, it is material to consider that the decree contains in its recitals the grounds upon which it was founded. It recites that the plaintiff had by his counsel in open court waived insisting on any relief in respect to the final decree in the exchequer and the sale made in pursuance thereof, and that it appeared that the lands had been sold subject to the leases. It proceeds then to dismiss the bill against the lessees with costs. It is unnecessary to consider whether, if these recitals in the decree of the plaintiff having waived insisting on any relief in respect to the decree of the exchequer, and the sale made in pursuance thereof, were consistent with the fact, it would necessarily lead to a dismissal of the bill against the lessees, because it appears to me evident from the proceedings independently of the affidavits, [522] that the recital must have been inserted from a misapprehension. It is indeed stated in one of the affidavits that it was introduced after the hearing, and this is not contradicted, but upon a rehearing there can be no reason for binding the plaintiff by this evident mistake by the officer of the court. The whole transaction proves that the plaintiff's counsel could not have done what the decree recites, because the arrangement with the Chinnerys was to be carried into effect by a decree. The proposal was, that the defendant should submit to a decree, and a reference had been obtained to inquire on behalf of one of them, who was a lunatic, whether it would be for the benefit of such lunatic to submit to the proposed decree. Now, from the terms of the recital, it would be inferred that the plaintiff had waived all relief against the decree and sale in the exchequer. Whereas in fact the defendant had at the time agreed, subject to the inquiry, to submit to a decree in the plaintiff's favour. This having been so arranged the counsel might naturally have informed the court that the plaintiff had not to trouble the court to adjudicate as against the Chinnerys, but not because the relief against them had been abandoned, but because the terms of it had been arranged, and this no doubt led to the mistake.

If this had been rightly understood at the time, I cannot think there would have been a decree of dismissal without any decision upon the merits. A decree so arranged with the Chinnerys must have had the same effect as if the Court had pronounced it, with this difference only, that the lessees might themselves have disputed the plaintiff's title to any interest in the estate. It was not competent for any of the defendants at the [523] hearing to insist that the relief prayed against the Chinnerys and against the lessees had been improperly joined in one suit; and if not, and if the plaintiffs had shown a good title to relief against the Chinnerys, and had so established an interest sufficient to entitle him to dispute the validity of the leases, the Court could not have declined to adjudicate upon the subject.

It was indeed contended, that independently of this title to question the leases, there was sufficient interest left in the plaintiff, notwithstanding the sale in the exchequer, to entitle him to ask a decree to set aside the leases, the sale having been subject to the leases, so that nothing more was disposed of than what remained of the estate, after deducting the interests comprised in the leases; so that so much of such interest as had not been effectually given to the lessees, not belonging to the lessees and not having been sold, remained undisposed of in the original decree, that it is not necessary to give any opinion upon that point, because if the plaintiff had an equity to set aside the decree in the exchequer and the sale had in pursuance thereof, or if these proceedings were in themselves defective, his title to raise the question respecting the leases cannot be disputed, and I have the satisfaction to find from the printed report that Sir Edward Sugden entirely concurs in this view of the case, and gives it as his decided opinion that the suit was not in its original joinder multifarious, but that the plaintiff, disputing the title of the mortgages under the decree in the exchequer and the sale, was clearly entitled in the same suit to raise his objection to the leases. If then he was so entitled to assert in one suit his equity as against the decree and sale, and also [524] against the lessee, he must have been entitled in that suit to relief as to both, if he succeeded in making out his case. Suppose at the hearing he had made out his case so far as to set aside the decree and sale in the exchequer, or to prove that they were defective and void, and that he was, therefore, still entitled to the equity of redemption, he would, no doubt, in that case have been entitled to ask of the court a decision as to the leases, and this right could not properly depend upon the greater or less degree of resistance which the mortgagees might make to the plaintiff's title to relief as against them. If, at the hearing, they had by their counsel said that they could not resist the plaintiff's title to redeem, the hearing, as against them, would have been closed, and the title as to the lessees would alone have remained for decision; but this is, in fact, what was done,—the terms upon which the plaintiff was to have his decree against the mortgagees had been the subject of negotiation, but the groundwork of the whole was that the plaintiff should have a decree for redemption against them, nor could the defendants, the lessees, be in any degree prejudiced by this, for, notwithstanding this arrangement, it was quite competent for them, and it necessarily formed part of their case, that the plaintiff had no title to question the leases, not having in him sufficient estate and interest to enable him to do so. For this purpose it was part of their case to insist that by the decree in the exchequer, and the sale had in pursuance of it, the plaintiff had lost that estate and interest which was necessary to enable him to question the leases, and this was as much open to them after the arrangement with the mortgagees as before it took place, for if the lessees could show that before that arrangement [525] the plaintiff had not any such estate and interest, his acquiring the estate and interest of the mortgagees, even before the hearing, would not have improved his situation, but, in fact, he had it not at that time. If, as seems to have been understood at the time, the plaintiff had consented to the mortgagees keeping the estate under the sale, the plaintiff's position as between himself and the lessees would, no doubt, have been materially altered; but as the arrangement was that he should redeem the mortgages, I think that he was as much entitled to a judgment against the lessees, according to the merits, as if he had proved his title to redeem adversely against the mortgagees.

Possibly the lessees may have relied upon the mortgagees fighting that part of the case which turned upon the want of title in the plaintiff, but as it was undoubtedly competent for the lessees to have done that themselves, they cannot complain if a decree has passed against them from their having omitted to insist upon a point in the case which was open to them.

It appears to me, therefore, that your Lordships must come to the conclusion that the grounds for the dismissal in February 1835 cannot be maintained; if that be so, it appears to me that there is the greatest difficulty in your Lordships proceeding any further in adjudicating upon the question between the parties,—I mean so as to pronounce any judgment upon the leases,—as to which the case stands thus: there has been no adjudication below upon that subject; there is the certificate of the Common Pleas against the leases; there was an argument in February 1835 before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, assisted by the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and the Chief Baron, but no judgment was [526] pronounced upon it, the Lord Chancellor having been of opinion that the suit must be dismissed upon the point of form already observed upon. He, indeed, expressed a strong opinion in favour of the leases, but carefully guarded against any inference that he was deciding upon their validity. When the cause came on again before Lord Plunket the lessee declined taking any other case for the opinion of the Court of King's Bench, and Lord Plunket made his decree setting the leases aside.

After the opinion of one court of law has been obtained upon a case, if the equity judge entertains doubts as to the opinion returned, or thinks the case of so much difficulty and importance as to require further consideration, it is almost of course to send it for the opinion of another court; it is certainly not necessary so to do, as the judge in equity may take upon himself to decide against the opinion of the court of law, but clearly the parties cannot require him so to do, or complain of his declining to decide the question without further assistance. If, therefore, the parties against whose case the judges have certified decline the offer of the court to have another case sent to another court, they cannot complain of the judge acting upon the opinion already obtained, and in an ordinary case I should not think your Lordships would be exercising a sound discretion if you were to open the door to further litigation on behalf of a party who had declined to accept the offer of the court below, to put the case in the ordinary course for final adjudication.

But there certainly are great peculiarities in the present case; what had taken place in the cause may naturally have led the lessees to think they had a good [527] ground for getting rid of the suit, without referring their title to further question, which ground they must have abandoned had they accepted the offer of a second case. I do, therefore, think, that it would be hard and might lead to injustice if we were to bind them by their refusal to accept that offer, particularly in a case in which there has been such a conflict of opinions upon the point of law, and I am the more inclined to think so because I do not see in the last decree any such inquiries and reservations of right, as it would seem the lessees would be entitled to before their leases could be taken away; for instance, I find that in the decree of 1802 they are ordered to account from 1784 to the party entitled to the arrears of the annuity, without reference to the amount which has been given upon the leases. Now, before that can constitute a part of the claim of the Chinnerys, the lessees have a right to reserve those payments against the estate, and to stand in the place of that party for what excess of rent they might so pay or what they might themselves advance. What was done upon this does not appear from the appeal papers, but it is obvious that a considerable demand may have arisen in favour of the lessees from the provisions of that decree, but the decree of July 1835 simply declares the leases void, and proceeds to put the plaintiff into possession.

Now, it is very possible that these and other points may have been overlooked in the contest which was going on as to the principal matters in issue, and this affords another reason to induce this House not to attempt finally to settle the decree between the parties. It is, however, quite sufficient, that as to the question as to the validity of the leases there has been no judgment [528] below, except the last decree, which proceeds upon the lessees refusal to accept the offer of another case, and which, for the reasons I have given, I think ought not to bind them. I think, therefore, that for the purpose of obtaining such an adjudication the case must be sent back to the Court of Chancery in Ireland; that court will of course use its own discretion as to the manner of disposing of that question, that is, whether by deciding it itself or calling for further assistance from another court of law. My object is, that this question should come before the court relieved from the difficulties with which it has hitherto been embarrassed, and this, I think, will be attained by this House declaring that it was competent for the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, at the time of making the decree of the 12th February 1835, to adjudicate between the plaintiff and the defendants the lessees as to the validity of the leases, and, therefore, to remit the case to that court to be heard upon that question, and to make such decree between the plaintiff and such lessees as shall be just.

It is true, that if the lessees should adhere to the course they followed below of declining another case, and if they require no inquiries as to advances made by the lessees, expense might be saved by your now dealing with the case upon that ground; but unless I am so informed I shall not suppose that to be the case. I therefore move your Lordships that the case be remitted to the Court of Chancery in Ireland with the declaration and direction proposed.

The House of Lords declared, That it was competent for the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, at the time of making the decree of 12th of February 1835, to adjudicate between the plaintiff and the defendants, the lessees, in the said suit in the [529] Court below, as to the validity of the said leases: And it is ordered, That with this declaration the cause be remitted back to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, to be heard upon that question, and to make such decree between the said plaintiff and the said defendants the lessees as shall be just, and consistent with this judgment.

[530] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

JOHN BOYLE GRAY,* Appellant.—Knight Bruce—Hill; The Rev. JOHN FORBES and Others (Outer Kirk Session of the High Church of Glasgow), Respondents.—Tinney—John Stuart [13th June 1839].

[Mews' Dig. i. 335, 354, 364; iii. 254. See 5 Cl. and F. 356.]

Trust—Contract—Burgh.—(1) Where funds were vested in the magistrates and council of a burgh as trustees, to apply the yearly produce in the support and maintenance from time to time of "schools" taught on the Madras system, and the town council entered into an agreement with the several kirk sessions in the burgh, binding themselves and their successors to pay over the dividends equally among the kirk sessions, each of the latter becoming bound to lodge annually with the council a vidimus, "showing definitely that the dividend was to be strictly applied in the promotion of the system of education proposed by the donor, and accompanied by an obligation by the kirk session to apply the same accordingly," and so long as each kirk session did so, "and satisfied the town council " that the contract was duly performed, it should have right to its share of the dividend, and not otherwise, provision being made for admitting members of the town council to the annual examination of the schools " to satisfy themselves of the bonâ fide and legitimate application of the dividend," [531] and the contract bearing that this was done strictly in terms of the deed of donation ; The town council of a subsequent year having refused to implement the contract,—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that the contract was strictly within the competency of the magistrates and town council as trustees, and that the performance of such contract was binding on all parties.

- (2.) It having been determined by the House of Lords (3 Sh. and M'Lean, 381), that one member of the town council might competently appeal against the judgment of the Court of Session, the appellant was allowed to plead every objection to the performance of the contract urged in that Court, although the council as a body had acquiesced in the judgment appealed against, and had, by a farther agreement with the kirk sessions, arranged the details preparatory to the execution of the trust.

Costs.—Costs, including those incurred by respondent in unsuccessfully opposing, on the ground of incompetency, an appeal, which was afterwards dismissed on the merits, awarded against the appellant.

The late Rev. Dr. Andrew Bell of Egmore, prebendary of the collegiate church of St. Peter Westminster, by deed of indenture, executed between him and the provost and certain clergymen and professors of St. Andrew's, dated the 14th day of July 1831, gave and transferred to these parties the two several sums of £60,000 three per centum consolidated bank annuities, and £60,000 three per centum reduced bank annuities, on the recital, " that the said Dr. Andrew Bell, the author of the system of education called the Madras System, considering that the progress of the said system in his native country of Scotland had hitherto been slow [532] and imperfect, and that the greatest boon he could confer upon that country would be by taking measures for the more effectual diffusion of the said system therein ;" and, therefore, the trustees were taken bound to divide the stocks or sums into twelve equal parts, and, inter alia, to transfer one twelfth part thereof to the provost, magistrates, and town council of Glasgow ; but upon condition, " that the sum so to be transferred to them should be by them, and their successors, employed for the founding or maintenance of a school or schools in that city for the instruction of children, whether male or female or both, in the ordinary branches of education, but so that the tuition at every one of the schools be upon the system of mutual instruction and moral discipline exemplified in the Madras school ;" and that the magistrates and council " should stand possessed of the said stock, so to be transferred to it as aforesaid, upon trust for ever, to apply the interest and dividends thereof in the support and maintenance, from time to time, of schools already founded or hereafter to be founded on the principles of the said Madras system, such funds either to remain as invested, or to be invested on any government, heritable, or other sufficient securities, as might from time to time be thought fitting ;" and that, before any appropriation or application of the said stock, they should execute a declaration and acknowledgment of acceptance by them of the several trusts declared in the said indenture. The provost, magistrates, and council of Glasgow having accepted the shares of stock upon the terms mentioned in his said deed, amounting to £9791 13s. 4d., which was transferred to them upon the 18th day of [533] November 1831, executed a declaration of trust, binding themselves and their successors in office, in all time to come, upon or for the trust following ; viz. " That we and our successors in office shall for ever apply the dividends and interest of the foresaid sums, or of the proceeds thereof, in the support and maintenance, from time to time, of a school or schools already founded, or to be founded, in the city of Glasgow, on the principle of the system of mutual instruction and moral discipline, as exemplified in the Madras school, or in what is known by the name of the Madras System." In October 1833 ten contracts or agreements were executed between a committee representing the magistrates and town council of Glasgow on the one part, and the committees of the ten kirk sessions of Glasgow, as authorized by the said kirk sessions respectively, on the other part, the contract with the pursuers bearing that "it had been agreed between the said first party and the several kirk sessions of Glasgow that, in order more extensively and effectually to promote the system of education contemplated and prescribed by the Reverend Dr. Bell, the annual interest or proceeds of the foresaid two sums now vested in government securities should be equally divided among and paid over, half yearly, to the different kirk sessions, upon their severally executing the said contracts; therefore the said second party, as representing one of the kirk sessions, and, in particular, the pursuers, or some of their number, as representing the kirk session of the foresaid Outer High Church and parish of Glasgow, and as taking burden on them for the same, bound and obliged themselves, and their successors in office, to [534] lodge in writing with the secretary of the said first party, a distinct vidimus or statement of the proposed application of the proportion of the annual interest or proceeds of the said two sums falling to be paid to the said second party, showing definitely that the same is to be strictly applied in the promotion of the system of education proposed by the donor, the Reverend Dr. Bell, and accompanied by an obligation, binding the said kirk session to apply the same accordingly; declaring, that so long as the said second party shall continue to furnish an annual statement or vidimus and obligation, to the effect before mentioned, and shall, from year to year, satisfy the said first party that the same has been followed out and carried into execution, the said second party, and their successors in office, shall be entitled to draw the proportion before mentioned of the foresaid annual interest or proceeds from the said first party; but in the event of the said second party failing to lodge the said annual statement or vidimus and obligation, or failing to satisfy the said first party of the same having been carried into effect, they shall forfeit their right to the proportion of the said interest or annual proceeds falling to be paid to the said kirk session, and the said first party shall be entitled to apply the same as fully and freely as if the said contracts had never been executed. And, farther, the said second party bind and oblige themselves, and their successors in office, to hold annual examinations of the schools to be established or maintained, either partially or totally, by the proportion of the interest or annual proceeds payable to them as before mentioned, and to give to the secre-[535]-tary of the said first party at least six days previous notice of the time fixed for that purpose, so that the said first party, one or more of them, may have an opportunity of attending the said examination, and becoming satisfied with the bonâ fide and legitimate application of the foresaid annual interest or proceeds; and, particularly, that the same are applied agreeably to the said contracts, and strictly in terms of the deed of donation executed in favour of the said first party by the said Reverend Dr. Bell." Within a few days after the execution of the several contracts above mentioned a vidimus or statement was lodged by each of the said ten kirk sessions, and particularly by the respondents, to the following effect:—"In terms of the contract entered into between the lord provost, magistrates, and town council of Glasgow on the one hand, and the session of the outer high church on the other hand, of date the 16th and 28th days of October 1833, the said session hereby undertake that there shall be conducted, under their inspection, a school or schools for teaching English reading, grammar, and religious knowledge, with such other branches of education as may be required, said school or schools to be divided into classes, over each of which a monitor shall preside, and under the charge of a master or masters appointed by the kirk session, and for whom they shall be responsible, and that the sum of at least £50 shall be expended in instituting and carrying on said school or schools, during the period of twelve months from this date." These contracts were approved and ratified by Dr. Bell's trustees.

The new town council, elected under a recent muni-[536]-cipal act (3 and 4 W. 4. c. 76) for Scotland, refused performance of contracts thus duly executed, alleging that the same were not in accordance with the trusts under which the funds had come into the hands of their predecessors in office. An action was brought by the respondents, as representing the kirk session of the Outer High Church of Glasgow, founding upon the contracts, and concluding "that although the pursuers have fulfilled their part of the said contract in every respect, and are still willing to do so, and although, upon the faith thereof, they have expended considerable sums of money, and entered into various engagements, and matters are not now entire, yet the said magistrates and council refuse to comply with their part of said contract, and to pay over to the pursuers the share of the said dividends or interest, payable to them in terms thereof; and although the pursuers have frequently desired and required the said lord provost, magistrates, and town council of the city of Glasgow to fulfil their part of the said contract, by making payment to the pursuers of their said share of the said dividends, in terms of the said contract, yet they refuse or delay so to do; therefore the said lord provost, magistrates, and council of the city of Glasgow, and the Hon. William Mills, lord provost, William Gilmour, James Lumsden, John Fleming, William Craig, and John Small, esqrs., bailies; James Martin, esq., dean of guild; Archibald M'Lellan, esq., deacon convener; and Messrs. Hugh Tennent, John Boyle Gray, etc., as councillors, for themselves and as representing the burgh and community of [537] Glasgow, ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree of the lords of our council and session, to make payment to the pursuers of their proportion, being one tenth part or share of the annual interest, proceeds, or dividends which have already accrued or may hereafter accrue on the foresaid two sums of £4895 16s. 8d., making together £9791 13s. 4d., transferred to the said defenders as above mentioned, and that half-yearly, agreeably to and in terms of the contract between them and the said pursuers before narrated, in all time coming, so long as the pursuers shall fulfil and observe their part of the said contract," together with interest, penalty, and expenses.

In defence it was pleaded, 1st, that the pursuers had no title to pursue; 2d, that the contract sought to be enforced was invalid and illegal, contained no proper operative obligations capable of being specifically enforced against either party, and ultra vires of the defenders' predecessors, as trustees under Dr. Bell's trust, and still more of any committee of their number, to enter into, or at all events to enter into so as to tie up the hands of the successors. The sound construction and the true intent and meaning of the trust was, that "the corporation of the provost, magistrates, and town council" should, from time to time, and according to what they might themselves deem expedient and proper under every change of circumstances, at their own discretion, in their own judgment, and on their own responsibility, direct the application of the trust funds, and conduct the whole administration and management of the trust, so as might best answer for the time the ends and purposes of the truster; [538] whereas the arrangement in dispute implies a surrender of all their most important rights and functions as trustees, and a delegation of these functions to others, permanently, and without the least control on their part, so far as regards the whole essential details connected with a proper discharge of the trust; 3d, in the circumstances the defenders, who are not satisfied that the arrangement in question is at all calculated to carry into effect the purposes of the truster, or even that it has been duly implemented in its own terms on the other side, were not bound by the contract libelled.

The Lord Ordinary, having advised cases for the parties, pronounced this interlocutor (29th November 1836): "The Lord Ordinary, having considered the revised cases for the parties, repels the objection to the title of the pursuers; and on the merits finds that the agreement libelled between the magistrates and town council of Glasgow on the one hand, and the pursuers on the other, cannot be held as a valid execution of the trust created in them by the deed of the late Dr. Bell, but truly imports a devolution of that trust on the pursuers, for such time as the pursuers choose to undertake it: Finds, that such agreement on the part of the magistrates and town council for the time was ultra vires, and cannot bind their successors in office. Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the general conclusion, that in all time coming, the part or share of the annual interest or dividend libelled shall be paid over to the pursuers; but appoints the case to be enrolled, that parties may be farther heard on the pursuers' claims for reimbursement, out of the annual interest or dividends [539] falling due since the date of the agreement, of any expense that may have been incurred by them in the maintenance or establishment of a school or schools conducted in terms of that agreement, and decerns.

(Signed) JOHN FULLERTON."

"Note.—Whatever may be the peculiarity of the constitution of the kirk session of the Outer High Church of Glasgow, and of the other kirk sessions of that city, the Lord Ordinary has no doubt that the members of that kirk session, being the parties with whom the alleged contract was entered into, have a title to insist in the present action, seeking to enforce it. But, upon the merits, the Lord Ordinary thinks the action cannot be sustained.

"By the deed of indenture entered into between the late Dr. Bell and the persons who may be called his general trustees, the magistrates and town council were appointed trustees for the special purpose of establishing or maintaining schools on the Madras system in the city of Glasgow. The words of the trust are very general, and the Lord Ordinary thinks that these trustees had full power to bind themselves and their successors in office, in all contracts entered into in the execution or furtherance of the objects of the trust; accordingly, it rather appears to him that a contract, binding themselves to pay annually the whole, or any part of the dividends or interest, under their management, to the pursuers, or any public body or individual having the power to undertake, and absolutely undertaking, for the permanent establishment or maintenance of a school, taught on the Madras system, would have been a valid exercise of their power as trustees. If, by a transaction with [540] parties invested with the management of an existing school, they could, at a comparatively small annual expense, have permanently secured the conducting of that school on the Madras system, such transaction would have evidently been a fair and most advantageous act of administration. But the agreement libelled is one of a very different kind; the kirk session of the Outer High Church and the other kirk sessions have no powers to undertake such an obligation, nor do they profess to undertake it by the alleged contract forming the ground of the present action; while, on the one hand, the magistrates and town council irrevocably bind themselves to make over, all time coming, the whole dividends and interests, in certain proportions, to the kirk sessions of the city of Glasgow, the pursuers, and those other kirk sessions, only undertake to furnish annually a 'vidimus,' showing that those shares of the dividends or interests are to be 'applied in the promotion of the system of education proposed by the donor, Dr. Bell,' which vidimus shall contain an obligation binding them to apply such annual payments accordingly. And the only consequence of their failure to furnish that 'vidimus,' and to satisfy the other party of the same having been carried into effect is, that the kirk sessions or kirk session that fails shall forfeit their right under the contract, and that the magistrates and council shall be entitled to apply the funds so forfeited as if the said contract never had been entered into.

"The Lord Ordinary cannot hold this to be a contract; the only obligation on the pursuers and the other kirk sessions is to apply funds, to be [541] annually placed in their hands, 'in the promotion of the system of education proposed by the donor,' being just the general obligation imposed by the trust; and, in this particular, the pursuers do not disguise that they claim a very considerable latitude, for they fairly state in their condescendence, that it is neither required in the contract or the vidimus that a school or schools should be established in each parish; in short, they assert under the transaction a permanent right to a certain share of the trust revenue, under the single obligation of applying it to the purposes of the trust, and that only so long as they choose to undertake the duty. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that this is not a contract, in the proper sense of the term, but truly a delegation of the powers of the corporation, a substitution of ten trusts, to be vested in the ten kirk sessions of the city of Glasgow, for that single trust established by Dr. Bell. Whether or not the attempted transaction might not secure a more beneficial employment of the fund is a different question, but that question has been determined by the truster himself, whose will must, in this particular, be the law.

"Holding this opinion, the Lord Ordinary thinks the general conclusion to the action, that a particular proportion of the annual dividends shall be paid to the pursuers in all time coming, cannot be sustained. But there may be a question, whether the pursuers, if they have maintained a school on the Madras system since the agreement was entered into, may not be entitled to some reimbursement for any expense thence incurred, out of the annual interests or dividends fallen due since the date of the agree-[542]-ment, and now in the hands of the defenders; and as that question has been hitherto little if at all touched upon by the parties, the Lord Ordinary has directed the case to be enrolled for further argument on that point, before finally disposing of the cause."

The respondents reclaimed on the merits, as did also the appellant and the other trustees, in so far as the interlocutor repelled the objection to the title of the respondents to pursue. The Lords of the First Division pronounced the following interlocutor (21st Feb. 1837): "The Lords having advised this reclaiming note, and the reclaiming note for the defenders, refuse the reclaiming note for the defenders, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against in so far as it repels the objection to the title of the pursuers; quoad ultra, alter the said interlocutors, and find the agreement libelled between the pursuers and defenders is in due conformity with the trust deed of the late Dr. Bell, and a valid and effectual agreement, and therefore decern against the defenders in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Find the defenders liable to the pursuers in expenses, and remit the account thereof, when lodged, to the auditor of court to tax the same and report, with this declaration, that no part of the expense of this litigation shall form a charge on the trust funds of Dr. Bell."

The details of the future arrangement of the funds were in consequence of this decision arranged, and a compromise was effected to the satisfaction of the members of the magistracy and town council, with the exception of Mr. John Boyle Gray, who appealed.

The petition of appeal having been presented and intimated in common form, an application was made by [543] petition, on the part of the respondents, praying that the appeal should be dismissed. The reasons relied upon were in substance that the appellant being only an individual trustee was not entitled to act against the vote of the council, or appeal against proceedings which it was alleged had been taken against the council in their corporate capacity only. The House of Lords ordered that the question of competency should be argued in cases; such pleadings were accordingly prepared and laid before their Lordships. After having considered these cases, and heard counsel, the House of Lords pronounced the following order:—"Die Jovis, 16o Augusti 1838.—Gray v. Forbes.—Respondent's petition to dismiss appeal as incompetent considered, and respondent's petition dismissed, and the appeal sustained. Costs to be reserved until the hearing of the appeal" (3 Sh. and M'Lean, 381).

The cause having come on for hearing on the merits:—

Appellant.—The former argument on the competency was resumed, to the effect of showing the title as well as interest of Mr. Gray to resist the performance of a contract which he deemed illegal, and in the illegality of which he, as a councillor, would be implicated.

On the merits it was contended, that in terms of the trust deed, and deed of acceptance thereof, the trustees are themselves bound to exercise the whole powers, rights, and duties entrusted to them; therefore, they could not legally and validly devolve upon or delegate [544] to others those rights, powers, and duties, in anywise to restrain or fetter themselves; and, consequently, any such devolution, delegation, or restraint in the exercise of them was invalid and illegal.

In no case had the appellant discovered even an approach to that construction of discretionary powers for which the respondents contend. In the case of Hill and others v. Burns and others (2 Shaw and Wilson's Appeal Cases, p. 80), decided by the House of Lords on the 4th of April 1826, the doctrine of discretionary power and the relative authorities were fully considered. Where powers of distribution amongst a certain class of persons not precisely described are conferred upon trustees, they have a discretionary power of distributing among such persons and in such a manner as they shall deem most in accordance with the implied will of the truster. This was held to be the import of the case of Dick v. Fergusson (Mor. 7446), 22d January 1758; of that of J. Wharrie v. the distant relations of Edward Wharrie (Mor. 6599), 16th July 1760; and of that of the trustees of John Burn v. his relations (Mor. 2318), 3d August 1762; and was rendered effective in the case of Hill and others v. Burns and others. In those cases discretionary powers to that extent were held to have been conferred; and the principle was sound, because necessary for explicating the will of the granter. But neither in those cases nor in any other were discretionary powers in the management of details held to confer a right to devolve or delegate the trust. A trust can no more be delegated in Scotland than it can in England; and this is not a trust the execution of [545] which can be performed by any parties except those expressly appointed by the deed. It is no answer that the court can control the trustees, for that is but an imperfect remedy. The true question is, what the donor intended; and in the consideration of that question it is to be borne in mind that the larger the powers it is less likely he meant that they should be devolved on others.

Assuming the contract to have been executed by parties invested with sufficient powers, the rights, powers, and duties of the trustees were devolved upon and delegated by them to the kirk sessions, whereby they ceased to be the administrators; or by the alleged contract, if valid and binding, they did so fetter and restrain themselves as to cease to have the rights, powers, and duties confided to them by the granter.

Farther, the magistracy presumed to act as a body corporate; if they are not so, then they have no power to bind their successors (Pollock v. Turnbull, 5 Sh. 195. 199). The respondents counsel were not called on.

The Lord Chancellor moved, That the interlocutor be affirmed, with costs; stating, that if the appellant be right, that he has such an interest in the fund as to dispute the judgment, he cannot object to being made a party; and if properly a party he is properly made liable with the others. Upon the merits it was clear that the judgment of the Court was well founded. Although the appellant's right to appeal had been sustained, yet he had been recommended to consider of the propriety of pressing his appeal further on the merits; [546] and he was clearly wrong on the merits of his appeal. The interlocutor appealed from ought to be affirmed, with costs, including the respondents costs of discussing the competency of this appeal.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutors, so far as therein complained of, be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellant do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal (which costs are to include the costs incurred by the said respondents in the matter of their petition touching the competency of the appeal, which last-mentioned petition was heard at the bar by one counsel of a side on the 12th day of March 1838, and considered on the 16th day of August 1838, and was dismissed, but the question of costs thereupon was reserved until the hearing of the said appeal), the amount of the said costs to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is also further ordered, That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

[547] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

JOHN FLEMING,—Appellant.*—Lord Advocate (Rutherford)—Hill; HENRY DUNLOP, Respondent.—Knight Bruce—Pemberton—James Anderson.

[13th June, 1839.]

[Mews Dig. i. 360; S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 43; and, in Court of Session, 16 Shaw and Dunlop 254, Fac. Coll. 16th Dec., 1837. On point as to not interfering with practice of the Courts below, see Cowan v. Buccleugh (Duke of), 1876, 2 A.C. 344. On point as to Scotch Municipal Reform Act (3 and 4 Will. iv. c. 76), discussed in Whyte v. Scott, 1851, 14 Dunlop, 108.]

Burgh—Stat. 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 76 (Scotch Municipal Act)—Process.—An application for suspension and interdict having been made by a party alleging that he had been duly elected provost of a burgh, and founding upon the minutes of election as his title to the possession of the office, and stating that he was molested by a party also claiming to have been elected provost, and who alone was called as a respondent, or was sought to be interdicted; and the bill of suspension having been passed by the Inner House on report of the Lord Ordinary on the bills,—Held (reversing the interlocutor of the Inner House deciding in the Bill Chamber), That, as the validity of the election of the provost could not, under the statute 3 and 4 W. 4, c. 76, be tried by summary application in which the two claimants were alone made parties, the suspension and interdict was incompetent.

Question raised, but not determined, as to the party who (under certain circumstances) was entitled to preside at the election of a provost, and, in case of an equality of votes, to exercise the right of giving a casting vote.

Appeal—Stat. 48 G. 3. c. 151.—Held, that an interlocutor, passing a bill for letters of suspension pronounced by the Inner House upon report of the Lord Ordinary on the bills, is not an interim order, and may be competently appealed against, even although the suspender has expedited the letters of suspension before intimation of such appeal.

[548] By the statute 3 and 4 W. 4, c. 76, intituled “An act to alter and amend the laws for the election of the magistrates and councils of the royal burghs in Scotland,” it is enacted, by section 1, that thenceforth the right of electing the town council in such burghs shall be vested in a certain class of the inhabitants possessing a particular qualification, being the same which entitles inhabitants in burghs to vote for a member of parliament under the statute 2 and 3 W. 4, c. 65.

By section 15 it is enacted, “that upon the first Tuesday of November in every year the electors in such burghs shall in like manner, viz. the burghs contained in the said schedule C.” (which includes Glasgow), “in their several wards or districts, and the other burghs, at their general meetings, assemble and elect, in manner herein-before prescribed, in relation to the first election under this act, one third part, or nearly as may be one third part, of the council of such burghs, in the place of the third thereof who shall, as herein-after directed, go annually out of office.”

By section 16 it is enacted, “that upon the first Tuesday in November in the year 1834, and in every succeeding year, one third, or a number as near as may be to one third, of the whole council of each such burgh shall go out of office; and in the said year 1834, the third who shall go out shall consist of the councillors who had the smallest number of votes at the election of councillors in this present year; and in the succeeding year, 1835, the third of the councillors first elected under this act who shall go out shall consist of the councillors who, at such first election under this act, had the next smallest number [549] of votes (the majority of the council always determining, where the votes for any such persons shall have been equal, who shall be the persons to retire); and thereafter the third of the councillors so annually going out of office shall always consist of the councillors who have been longest in office; provided always, that any councillors so going out of office shall be capable of being immediately re-elected.”

By section 17, which relates to the election of magistrates upon the first election of councillors under the statute, viz. in November 1833, it is enacted, “that the councillors of all such burghs not contained in schedule F. to this act annexed,” (which schedule contains only some small burghs, and not the city of Glasgow,) “respectively so elected, and accepting, shall, upon the third lawful day after the election of the whole number of such councillors in the present year, assemble in the town hall, or other usual public place of meeting within such burgh, and shall there, by a plurality of voices, (the councillor who had the greatest number of votes at the election of councillors having a casting or double vote in case of equality,) elect from among their own number a provost or chief magistrate, the number of bailies fixed by the set or usage of such burgh, a treasurer or other usual and ordinary office-bearers now existing in the council, by the set or usage of each such burgh; and shall also elect the managers of any charitable or public institution existing in or connected with such burghs,” etc.

By section 18 it is enacted, “that (with and under the exception herein-after enacted, viz. of certain [550] small burghs,) upon the completion of the first elections of councillors, magistrates, and office-bearers to be made in all the royal burghs of Scotland under the provisions of this act, and not sooner, the provost, magistrates, and office-bearers, and other councillors now in office, shall go out, and their whole powers, duties, and functions shall cease and determine, except only where any of the said persons shall have been again elected under the provisions of this act."

By section 24 it is enacted, "that when any magistrate or office-bearer (other than the provost or chief magistrate and treasurer) shall be in the third of the council going out of office, the place of such magistrate or office-bearer shall be supplied by election by the council as soon as the full number thereof shall have been completed by the annual election of the third then hereby directed to take place; the said election to be made by plurality of voices, and the chief or senior attending magistrate to have a double or casting voting vote in case of equality: provided always, that the provost or chief magistrate and the treasurer shall always remain in office for the period of three years, and that they, as well as all the other magistrates or office-bearers, shall at all times be capable of being re-elected."

By section 25 it is provided, "that if any vacancy shall in the course of the year occur in the council or magistracy or office-bearers of any such burgh, by death, disability, or resignation, the same shall be filled up, ad interim, by the remaining members of the council, by election, as herein-before provided, [551] at a meeting to be called on five days' notice by the town clerk, by intimation in writing to each of such remaining members of council." But this interim election is only to last till the end of the current year in which it is made.

By section 31 it is enacted, "that the magistrates and council and office-bearers to be elected under the provisions of this act shall in all respects stand in relation to the administration of the affairs and property of such burghs, or of property under the care and management of such burghs, in the same situation in which the magistrates and council and office-bearers of such burghs did stand previous to the passing of this act; and the magistrates and council and office-bearers to be elected under the provisions of this act shall have such and the like jurisdiction, and the same rights and powers of administration of the property and affairs of the burgh, and of making all usual and necessary appointments, as heretofore lawfully belonged to and was exercised by their predecessors in office, any thing in the set, usage, or custom of any burgh to the contrary notwithstanding."

By section 36 it was declared, "that all laws, statutes, and usages now in force respecting the royal burghs in that part of Great Britain called Scotland shall be and the same are hereby repealed, in so far as they are inconsistent or at variance with the provisions of this act, but in all other respects the same shall remain in full force and effect." Under its former constitution the town council of Glasgow consisted of thirty-two members, and now consists of that number, [552] including the dean of guild and deacon convener ex officio, the two last being elected by the merchants house and trades house.

At the first municipal election under the statute, in November 1833, Mr. Robert Graham was elected provost by the council then chosen. In consequence of his resignation in the following year, Mr. William Mills was chosen provost on 7th of November 1834, an office which by virtue of the statute, sec. 24, he continued to hold for the period of three years. Upon the first Tuesday of November 1837, that is to say, on the 7th of November of that year, the election of councillors for the different wards to supply the places of the ten members or third of the council going out of office as councillors, of whom Mr. Mills was one, took place; and Mr. Mills having been put in nomination, though for a different ward from what he had formerly sat in council for, was again elected.

On the 8th of November a meeting of the town council was held, at which the poll books were opened, and the result of the elections of new councillors declared. At this meeting Mr. Mills attended, and claimed right to preside and act in the declaration of the election of the new councillors, in virtue of his continuing to hold the office of provost till his successor in that office should be appointed. The right to preside at the same meeting was also claimed by Mr. Henry Paul, who held the office of first bailie (being the office next in seniority in the magistracy to that of provost), and who was not of the third of the council who had that year gone out of office. The parties acted, however, by the following opinion of Mr. Reddie, legal assessor for Glasgow:—

[553] "OPINION as to the person who is to cast up the votes, and declare upon whom the election has fallen, on Wednesday the 8th November 1837.

"I am of opinion that, by the 16th section of the burgh reform act, Mr. Mills goes out of office as councillor this year, as being one of the third of the councillors who have been longest in office. But I am of opinion that the election of councillors is not completed till the declaration on Wednesday; and that by the 24th section Mr. Mills is authorized on Wednesday to cast up the votes, and declare upon whom the election has fallen. As Mr. Mills, however, is a candidate this year for the office of councillor, I am of opinion he is not legally entitled to ascertain and declare the election where he himself is a party, namely for the third ward, and, in these circumstances, I would recommend that Mr. Mills and Mr. Paul should both be present at the casting up of the votes and the declaration of the councillors elected. This is the course which I originally advised, and I still think it the best calculated to prevent all ground of objection to the validity of the proceeding. (Signed) J.A. REDDIE."

" 7th November 1837."

Accordingly Mills and Paul mutually presided, a protest being taken against the former acting.

On the 9th of November 1837 another meeting of council took place for the induction of the new councillors, at which Bailie Paul presided and administered the oaths to the new members, of whom Mr. Mills was one.

[554] On the 10th of November 1837 the council met for the purpose of electing from among their own number a provost and other office-bearers. The minutes of this meeting of council, as authenticated and recorded in the books of council, bear that Mr. Mills stated, that being advised that he was entitled to take the chair, he would occupy it at the present meeting.

Mr. Paul stated that it was his right to preside at the present meeting, and that as Mr. Reddie's opinion was taken on the subject, he moved that it should now be read and engrossed in the minutes, which was accordingly done, and is in these terms:

" OPINION with regard to the proceedings at the election of the lord provost and magistrates on Friday, 10th November 1837.

" I am of opinion that, although the 24th section of the burgh reform act may authorize the individual elected provost to remain a third year in office without any new election as councillor, and after he must otherwise have retired from the council, this clause does not authorize such individual to preside at and vote in the election of his successor at the meeting of council directed to be held for that purpose. For such a construction of this clause would increase, by one, the number of electors of the provost and magistrates, namely, the number of the members of council entitled to vote at this meeting, from thirty-two to thirty-three, and would thus be inconsistent with and contrary to the fundamental law of the constitution of the burgh, which limits the number of councillors to thirty-two.

" By the 17th section the election of the provost and magistrates is vested solely in the members of council; and by the 4th section provision is made for the [555] retirement of the provost who has been three years in office and ceased to be a member of council, by the direction that the election is to be made by plurality of voices, and the chief or senior attending magistrate to have a double or casting vote in case of equality.

" A certain curriculum in office is fixed by the enactment that a third of the council shall retire every year; and the clause providing that the provost and treasurer shall always continue three years in office must have reference, for the due extrication of the other provisions of the act, to this statutory curriculum, which, according to the opinion I have already given, I conceive terminates at latest with the act of declaration of the election of the new councillors.

" Nor does the circumstance of the individual who has been provost for three years being again elected a member of council make any difference; for such a re-election is merely an accidental event, which may or may not happen, and cannot, consistently with sound legal principle, be held to affect the general and permanent construction of the statute.

" Upon these grounds I am of opinion that Bailie Paul, as senior magistrate, is legally entitled to preside at the meeting on Friday first for the election of provost and magistrates. (Signed) JAMES REDDIE."

" 8th November 1837."

The foregoing opinion having been read, Mr. Mills stated that he would, notwithstanding, occupy the chair, and protested that he had a right to do so. Mr. Paul likewise insisted upon his right to occupy the chair, and protested that he had the only legal right to do so. [556] Both parties continued in the chairs originally occupied by them.

Bailie Paul moved that Bailie Dunlop should be elected provost; Mr. Johnston moved that Bailie Fleming should be elected lord provost; and the vote being put upon the two candidates, who had been duly seconded, fifteen members of council voted for Bailie Dunlop, and fifteen voted for Bailie Fleming, and Bailie Dunlop and Bailie Fleming both declined to vote. There being thus an equality of votes, Mr. Mills declared that he gave his casting vote for Bailie Fleming, and Bailie Paul declared he gave his casting vote for Bailie Dunlop. Thereupon Mr. Mills declared that Bailie Fleming was duly elected lord provost, and Bailie Paul declared that Bailie Dunlop was duly elected lord provost. Whereupon (after protests by the supporters of both candidates) Mr. Mills administered to Bailie Fleming the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, and Bailie Fleming subscribed the same, with the assurance. Mr. Mills also administered to Bailie Fleming the oath de fidei administratione officii. Bailie Paul administered to Bailie Dunlop the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, and Bailie Dunlop subscribed the same, with the assurance. Bailie Paul also administered to Bailie Dunlop the oath de fidei administratione officii; and the minutes of the meeting for election were respectively signed by Wm. Mills and Henry Paul. The other magistrates and office-bearers were thereupon appointed. The minutes also bear that Mills hung the chain and badge of office round Fleming's shoulders, and presented him with the seal usually worn by the provost. A meeting of council was held on the 16th November, at which both Dunlop and Fleming claimed [557] the office of provost, and both signed the minutes of the meeting.

On the 17th November 1837 Dunlop presented a bill of suspension and interdict to the Lord Ordinary on the bills, wherein, after stating that he had in virtue of the statute been duly elected provost, and was in the actual exercise of the duties of the office, he set forth, that "notwithstanding of the election having thus fallen upon the complainer, he is nevertheless molested, and threatened to be molested, by the interference of Mr. Fleming claiming the office of lord provost for himself in respect of the pretended casting vote attempted to be given by Mr. Mills at the meeting in question, and this, it will be observed, in the face of a clear opinion to the contrary, delivered by the legal assessor for the city, and read at the meeting of council. It is manifest that this state of things may be productive of the greatest inconvenience and prejudice to the affairs of the city of Glasgow, as well as to the administration of justice in that burgh: and the complainer now applies to your Lordships in the present summary form, as one which is undoubtedly competent, for protecting him in his rights;" and concluding, "Herefore, and for other reasons to be proponed at discussing hereof, the said attempted or threatened molestation of the complainer in his office of lord provost aforesaid, on the part of the said John Fleming, and the said attempted or threatened usurpation of the said office of lord provost by the said John Fleming, ought and should be simpliciter suspended; and the said John Fleming ought and should be prohibited, interdicted, and discharged from molesting the complainer in the dignity and [558] functions of the said office, and from usurping or claiming and pretending to the same on his own behalf.

"Herefore I beseech your Lordships for letters of suspension and interdict in the premises, with or without caution, in common form; and your Lordships are craved to grant interim interdict until the case be finally disposed of. According to justice," etc.

The Lord Ordinary granted a sist, and appointed answers to be lodged with a view to reporting the case for the opinion of the Inner House, reserving consideration of the interdict till the bill and answers should be advised. The sist was held as intimated on the same day to the agent of Fleming, the only party complained against.

Fleming lodged answers to the bill of suspension, in which he pleaded, (1st,) that the summary application was incompetent, and that the proceedings complained of which affected the validity of the election of magistracy for that year could only be challenged by declarator and reduction, in which the other members of council ought to be made parties defenders; and (2dly,) that even on the minutes of election, as they stood, he, Fleming, had been duly elected provost by means of the casting vote of Mills, who was then provost, and therefore senior magistrate until his successor was appointed.

The Lords of the Second Division sitting in the Bill Chamber having considered the pleadings, and heard argument viva voce, pronounced the following interlocutor (16th December 1837): "The Lords having advised this bill, with the answers and productions, and heard parties' procurators, on report of Lord [559] Cuninghame, Ordinary, pass the bill, and grant the interdict as craved."

On the 20th of December 1837 Dunlop expedite his letters of suspension and interdict; and on the 21st of December 1837 he caused the same to be served on Fleming.

Fleming, immediately after the interlocutor of the 16th of December was pronounced, presented a petition of appeal. That petition was presented on the 20th December 1837, when an order was made by the House of Lords on the respondent to lodge an answer to the petition. Notice of that order was, on the 23d December 1837, served on the respondent Dunlop.

In the appeal committee Dunlop objected to the competency of this appeal against an interlocutor in the Bill Chamber passing the bill, which objection was reserved till the hearing.

Appellant.—1. (In answer to respondent's objection to the competency of appeal.) Before the stat. 48 Geo. 3, c. 151, every interlocutor might be appealed, which was productive of inconvenience, and was remedied by that act; and although interim interlocutors cannot now be appealed, is this interlocutor to be held as an interim or interlocutory judgment? It certainly cannot. If the interlocutor had been a refusal of the bill of suspension it would have been final, and ex concessis appealable; and why not equally so where the right of the adverse party was as conclusively determined by that judgment? In this process of suspension in the Bill Chamber the suspender asks for letters of suspension, and the passing of the bill is a judicial authority to the granting of letters of suspension, which form the [560] commencement of a new process in the Court of Session distinct from the process which depended in the Bill Chamber in regard to the passing of the bill. The judgment pronounced by the Court assisting the Lord Ordinary in the Bill Chamber cannot, in the process upon the bill praying for letters, be reviewed by the Court; so in that respect it is final. The suspender may then commence a new process upon expediting the letters. This appeal does not bring up the process ensuing upon the letters, but only the process on the bill upon which every step has been taken that could competently have been taken. See Young v. Dewar, 17th Nov. 1814 (Fac. Coll.), Lord Meadowbank's opinion in that case, referring to Scott v. Brodie, 2d March 1803 (Fac. Coll.); so that the House of Lords is in a sufficient condition to decide upon the merits.

2. (As to the incompetency of suspension and interdict.) The incompetency of suspension in trying the validity of the election of a town councillor since the late statute took effect had been all but decided by the House of Lords in the case of Monteith v. M'Gavin (3 Shaw and Maclean, 290), where the Lord Chancellor had expressed (p. 313) doubts which the appellant now adopted as satisfactory grounds for a reversal.

In the election of a provost the whole merits and validity of the election of the magistracy for the year was involved. Previous to the statute 3 and 4 Will. 4, c. 76, a summary mode of trying all such questions affecting the election of magistrates and councillors individually or collectively had existed under authority of the statute 7 Geo. 2, c. 16, which, in the absence of [561] any common law remedy introduced the form of petition and complaint, which accordingly had been acted on where an action of reduction or declarator had not been necessary. It had been determined by the Court of Session (Thomson v. Magistrates of Wick (14 D., B., and M., 1118), 8th July 1836), that since the late act the summary process of petition and complaint was incompetent; hence there being no other summary mode of application at common law, parties were necessarily driven to the mode of determining such questions by an ordinary action of declarator or reduction in the Court of Session. The cases quoted establish this distinction, that where a question of right to an office is in dispute a declarator is necessary, and that suspension and interdict is the proper form for complaining of any interference or molestation in the exercise of an office, the right to which does not require to be declared (Buckney and others

v. Ferrier, 10th March 1753, Mor. 1854; Donaldson v. Magistrates of Kinghorn, 29th July 1789, Mor. 1892; Orr v. Vallance, 2d Dec. 1831, 10 S. and D. 93; Watson v. Commissioners of Police of Glasgow, 10th March 1832, Fac. Coll.; Drysdale v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy, 10th June 1825, 4 S. and D. 658; Abbey, 3d Dec. 1825, 4 S. and D. 266). There is no case on which the respondent can found. He cannot now found on that of M'Gavin. He cannot maintain that there has been induction into office, to the effect of holding that the merits of the election of a provost are not in dispute. There being two candidates in the field, both eligible, both on the face of the minutes appearing to have been, and both claiming to have been, elected, while the point of law on which the election turns remains to be determined, clearly there is a controverted election, or at least no such election [562] as to warrant the respondent in claiming summary protection against molestation in an office of which he is indisputably the legal holder. But the question of right cannot now be tried summarily; and certainly not without the other councillors as proper parties to defend their own acts, and see the validity of the election determined on.

3. (Assuming that suspension and interdict is competent, the appellant was duly elected). Each of the two candidates had fifteen votes, including Mills, who voted for Fleming, and Paul who voted for Dunlop. Either Mills or Paul was entitled to preside, and in that character to have a double or casting vote. Mills was clearly the party so entitled under the 18th and other sections of the act as holding the office of provost till his successor in that office was appointed. His councillorship ended on the 7th; but that was not decisive of the question, as a provost once elected continued so for three years, even although the period of his councillorship might have terminated a year before (as was Mill's own case). The sound view of the terminus ad quem was the official year, terminating with the appointment of the provost's successor, and thus perpetuity of succession instead of discontinuance would be in that office upheld, but which would not be the case upon either of the two more uncertain theories of the respondent; viz., that the year consisting of twelve calendar months, and concluding in this instance upon the 7th of November, or the year terminating always upon the first Tuesday of November, was to be the rule in demitting office. The principle of perpetuity is recognized in England in corporations, and so churchwardens continue in office till their successors are [563] appointed. At all rates Bailie Paul could not have the casting vote, because, the bailies being elected yearly, his career of office had closed.

Respondent.—1. (As to incompetency of appeal.) A mere question of interim possession had been decided. The proceedings in the suspension take place in the bill chamber; and all that was then obtained by the judgment appealed from was a warrant for letters which enabled the respondent to bring the other party into court to try the question at issue. A mere interim order like this ought not to be the subject of appeal; the proceedings might in the meantime have been going on in court where a different order from that now appealed from might have been pronounced, but till parties be duly heard upon a closed record in the suspension when brought into court, this order remains an interim one, which it was the object of the sections 17 and 18 of 48 Geo. 3, c. 151, to prevent being disturbed (Ersk. b. iv. tit. 3, s. 18; Jurid. Styles, "Bill of Suspension," A. S., 14th June 1799; 6 G. 4, c. 120; A. S., 19th Dec. 1778; Agnew v. Grierson, 2 Shaw, 377; Macaulay v. Brown, 16th Feb. 1833; 11 S., D., and B., 411). It is not a judgment that could be pleaded as res judicata; Wood v. M'Caul, (12 D., B., and M., 50); Binny v. Smith, 26th Jan. 1836, (14 D., B., and M., 355). The advantage of the statute in putting an end to appeals against interim orders is apparent from the circumstance that by this time the question upon the merits might have been finally decided upon the expedite letters.

2. (Suspension and interdict competent.) The minutes show that Dunlop was appointed to that office, and he was in the full exercise of it except in so far as [564] molested by the appellant. Suspension and interdict is the proceeding recognized in Scotland as the protective remedy against all wrongful encroachment upon the possession or rights of a party having primâ facie a good title to the property or office held by him (Ersk. b. iv. tit. 3, s. 20; M'Kenzie, 4 Sh. 1002; Manners and Miller v. King's Printer, 2 Sh. 275, 4 Sh. and D. 559, 3 Wilson and Sh. 268; Siddons v. Ryder, 3 S. and D. 576). Independently of all remedies from the election statutes, this was the subsisting remedy at common law, to which a party, whether complaining of official or any other molestation, could always have recourse, yet it was seriously maintained that because petition and complaint was no longer competent, the remedial process of suspension was to be excluded. No doubt this remedy is incompetent where applied for at too late a stage of the proceedings, 1 Darling, Prac. 283, and cases there cited. Although the statutes 7 Geo. 2, c. 16, and 16 Geo. 2, c. 11, authorized a process of summary reduction and of petition and complaint against proceedings at elections, no argument is thence deducible either that suspension was superseded or that it had not previously been competent. The introduction of a new legal remedy for specific wrongs does not, unless the statute so provides, extinguish the ancient common law remedies; and so subsequent practice in this particular showed; see Buckney v. Ferrier, 10th March 1753, Mor. 1854; Chalmers v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, 24th July 1782, Mor. 1863; Gray v. Magistrates of Anstruther, 29th June 1819.—Orr v. Vallance, 10 S., D., B., 93, is not adverse, for (1.) the object there was to set aside, at the instance of a minority, a formal election as informal and challengeable, an attempt not [565] merely to stop, but to rescind; (2) it was admitted in that case that the party whose place was improperly filled up would have been entitled to this mode of application, and the observations of the judges there ought to be read in reference to the actual circumstances only, and even in Drysdale v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy suspension was held to be a proper form of complaining of molestation in the exercise of an office the right to which does not require to be declared; and the same remedy was again acted on, as betwixt two councillors, in Scott v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, 21st Dec. 1838 (1 D., B., and M., N.S., 347). The appellant was the only necessary party, as he alone claimed the office, and against him alone was any interim order required. The other members of council might if they had chosen have sisted themselves in the course of the after proceedings, which could however have been had between the two contending parties for the office in dispute.

3. (The respondent was duly elected to the office in which he is now molested). The difference betwixt the respective claimants for the casting vote consisted in this, that Paul was the senior magistrate present, whereas Mills was not a magistrate, but was then in council as a new councillor, into which office he had de recenti been inducted, Paul also there officiating as senior magistrate. Mills could not have applied to a different ward for re-election except on the footing of his no longer having a seat in the council, and his election for that ward and subsequent induction was the only character in which he could now sit in the council. The argument drawn from the fact that in some burghs parties had been advised to hold fast to [566] the office of provost, even after they had ceased to be councillors through the lapse of the elective period or of disqualification, did not solve the difficulty upon the act of parliament, because in the instances last referred to there had been no actual demission of office by such councillor being provost, and no new election for the ward for which such councillor had sat. Here, however, the continuity of office had ceased; and a new election, and qualification, by taking oaths, enabled Mills to exercise the duties of the office into which he had been so inducted, but could not operate a restoration of an office of which he was functus. After the 7th of November, therefore, Mills was a candidate for election, but no longer a member of the council-board in any capacity. The notion of the official year was adopted as a remedy to the supposed inconvenience of a vacancy in the provostship, which in any view was for a short period at least inevitable. But there was no inconvenience in the respondent's view of the case, inasmuch as Bailie Paul (who is admitted on the minutes to be the senior magistrate) is by law vested with the powers of provost or chief magistrate.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this case, which was argued before your Lordships not long since, raises a question of the utmost possible importance, not so much as affecting the interests of the parties in contest in this litigation, but as respecting the general rule, which, if not properly laid down, may be extremely prejudicial in the present state of the corporation law in Scotland.

It has been considered that the statutory provisions by the two statutes, the 7th and 16th of George the Second, giving a summary remedy by application to the [567] Court of Session in questions arising out of municipal elections, does not apply to the system of corporations as now established under the municipal corporation reform act. I think your Lordships will find, that from that circumstance a course is likely to be adopted, which, if not properly regulated, may lead to very serious consequences as affecting these corporations.

The facts of the case which gave rise to the present litigation were simply these:—Upon the election in November 1837, in the corporation of Glasgow, two persons were candidates for the office of Lord Provost; the votes of the council being equal for each, it came to be decided by the casting vote of the presiding officer. It was made a matter of question, whether the Lord Provost who had been in office the three preceding years was the presiding officer; that is, whether he continued Lord Provost up to the 10th November, when the election took place, or whether he had ceased to be Lord Provost upon the 7th of November. If he had ceased to be Lord Provost on the 7th of November, a certain other person would be the senior magistrate. The question therefore was, whether the one or the other had the casting vote; the one voted for the one side, and the other voted for the other; so that the question, who had been elected Lord Provost, turned upon the question, who was the presiding officer at that election. My Lords, there was no possession of the office by either party; each claimed the right of having been properly elected, and there was nothing done upon either side which could be said to put either party in possession of the office. Under these circumstances, one of the parties applied in the bill chamber for an interdict. The Lord Ordinary reported it to the Inner [568] House, and the Inner House, upon an application for a suspension and interdict, granted an interdict against one party; and that is the subject of the appeal to your Lordships House. The first question, therefore, raised, independently of the merits of the election, is, whether this be a proper course of proceeding to decide upon the merits of the election under the circumstances which occurred in this case.

Now, in looking back to the authorities upon this subject, it seems to be a statement common to both sides, that there is a very great paucity of authority to be found in the records of proceedings in the Court of Session; and that may be accounted for, no doubt, during the period anterior to the 3 and 4 W. 4, c. 76, when the statutes of George the Second were in force. I find, however, that although there may be but few cases to be found, there seems to be no question as to certain propositions that may be laid down; namely, that a proceeding by suspension and interdict cannot apply against a party in possession of an office; it is equally clear that it is not applicable to proceedings prior to the election, so that, in point of fact, if it be competent at all, it is not necessary to discuss that question. In the present case it can hardly be supposed to apply to any case, except where, from the proceedings at the election, it is a matter of doubt who has been elected, neither party being in possession of the office which is the subject of the election.

But there is ample authority that this mode of proceeding is not the mode of proceeding to decide the question of election in a burgh election at all.

There is another class of cases, indeed, with regard to which the authorities seem consistent, namely, that where there is an undisputed right to an office, and the [569] party is in possession of the office, it is not incompetent to apply this mode of proceeding for the purpose of protecting the person in possession of the office against an unauthorized intrusion by a mere stranger; but your Lordships, I think, will find that it is confined to cases where the title to the office is so clear and so free from doubt that there is no question to be adjudicated upon as to the title to the office.

I find almost all these propositions laid down, and by all the judges, who all seem to concur in that opinion, in the case of Orr v. Vallance (10 S., D., and B., 93), decided in the year 1831. The Lord Justice Clerk in that case says: "I have a clear opinion that this application is incompetent" (viz., an application for suspension and interdict). "I apprehend that there is no point more thoroughly fixed, than that there is no process for reviewing proceedings of town councils, filling up a vacancy, real or supposed, other than by petition and complaint or reduction;" petition and complaint not applying now to the corporations in Scotland. "Then what is the nature of this? It is in form, no doubt, a complaint against the actings of this person, Vallance, as chief magistrate; but what is put in issue is the merits of the election by the town council, and we have the regular minutes of the election as an appendix to the bill. If we could sustain such applications under the miserable cover that they are only against the actings of the man, there would be no case in which the same sort of argument might not be used to sanction a bill of this kind instead of a complaint or reduction, in which it is a fundamental [570] principle that the council, one and all, must be called. I can listen to no such flimsy pretext, and it is not necessary to enter into the question whether all the parties are called, for on the incompetency alone I think the bill must be refused."

Lord Glenlee (10 S., D., and B., 95) says: "I am of the same opinion; if Dods had applied,"—Dods was the party who was unquestionably in possession of the office. Lord Glenlee says, "if Dods had applied, it would have been a different case; but the complainants have no title in them, and we must first of all enter into the consideration of the merits of the election, which is incompetent in the present shape."

Lord Cringletie says: "A bill of suspension would do against a party having no title or election at all; but here there is a formal election, which must be complained of by complaint or reduction."

Lord Meadowbank says: "In the case of Dods applying there would be no need to inquire into the merits of the election, and so a bill by him would have been competent."

Now, it is impossible that any doctrine can be laid down more distinct, or more directly applicable to the present case. They say that that court cannot try the merits of an election in a proceeding by suspension and interdict.

Now, that is supposed to have been interfered with by the case of Watson against the commissioners of police of Glasgow (Rep. in Fac. Coll. 10th March 1832), which took place in the following year; but the circumstances of the case are by no means similar. It was not a burgh election, to begin [571] with. The learned judges took a distinction between the two, recognizing to the full extent the doctrine laid down in the case of Orr v. Vallance: The Lord Justice Clerk says, "The case of Vallance is in no respect parallel to the present, the former referring to a burgh election, as to which there must be either a petition and complaint, or a reduction."

At an earlier date than those cases, namely, the year 1825, was the case of Drysdale against the magistrates of Kirkcaldy (4 S. and D. 128, new ed.). The facts of that case are not similar to the present; it is only valuable for the doctrine laid down. The report there states, "That where a question of right to an office is in dispute, a declarator is necessary, and that a suspension and interdict is the proper form for complaining of any interference or molestation in the exercise of an office, the right to which does not require to be declared." Up to the time at which it was declared that the summary proceedings under the statutes of George the Second (7 Geo. 2, c. 16; 16 Geo. 2, c. 11) were not applicable to the present state of Scotch burghs, there does not appear to have been any difference of opinion amongst the learned judges that the question of an election in burghs could not be tried by suspension and interdict.

After it was found that that mode of proceeding was not applicable, it does appear to me that an attempt has been made, or rather a disposition has been manifested, to introduce a mode of proceeding, which was not considered as competent before that time. Now, upon all the cases to which I have referred, nothing can [572] be more clear than this proposition at least, that where a party was in possession of an office, his title to that office could not be questioned by proceedings of suspension and interdict; that it was necessary to proceed by process of reduction or declarator. There are obvious reasons, to which I shall presently advert, which shew how utterly incompetent a proceeding of suspension and interdict would be to effect the object in view. But I am now referring to it only for the purpose of shewing that, up to the year 1831, no doubt was entertained that suspension and interdict was not applicable to that state of things.

Now, previous to this very election, one of the circumstances which gave rise to the election of Lord Provost was the election of one of the councillors of the name of M'Gavin; and your Lordships will find, by referring to the report of that case, which was argued during the last session, in the third volume of Shaw and Maclean's Reports (p. 290), that M'Gavin was actually elected. He was actually then in possession of his office. Those who questioned his right to be a councilman, depending upon a supposed defect in the list of electors, applied for a process of suspension and interdict. The judges did not act upon that: they thought, under the circumstances, it was not a case in which they ought to grant an interdict, but they sustained the competency of the proceedings; so that in M'Gavin's case they sustained the competency, although the proceeding by suspension and interdict applied to a party actually in possession of his office, which in the three cases I have mentioned was considered by all the judges as a totally [573] incompetent proceeding for the purpose of questioning the title of a person in possession of an office.

Such is the state of the authorities; now for one moment I call your Lordships' attention to the effect of proceeding by the process of suspension and interdict. The result and the only result of it can be to prohibit one party, the party against whom it is directed, from exercising the functions of an office which he either is in possession of, or which he claims the right to exercise; it decides nothing as to the right of election. It may prevent one man from exercising the duties of the office, but it does nothing towards putting any other person in his place: an observation which occurred to me when your Lordships were considering the case of Monteith v. M'Gavin, in July last, and was strongly exemplified by what had then taken place, but had not then been brought under your Lordships' consideration.

Now, the only means of trying the right of parties to any office in a corporation must be first of all to try the right of the party in possession, and then by some process to try the right of the party who claims to stand in his place. The proceeding by suspension and interdict may do the one,—it may undoubtedly displace the party in possession, not by depriving him of the office, but by prohibiting him from exercising the functions of the office. It does not declare that any other person ought to be elected in his place, but prohibits the individual from exercising the functions of the office. One, therefore, is not surprized that the learned judges, up to the time when the difficulty arose with respect to the statute (7 Geo. 2, c. 16) of George the Second, [574] considered that the proceeding of suspension and interdict was wholly inapplicable for the purpose of trying the right to an office.

In the present case it is true that the party against whom the process was addressed cannot be considered as in possession of the office; because, a question having arisen as to the mode of election, both parties having claimed to be in possession of the office, in point of law it may be considered that neither of them is actually so. Now, if the learned judges adopted this course of proceeding with the intention of deciding which of the two was really the Lord Provost of Glasgow, then they did that which in the case of Orr v. Vallance, and in the case of Drysdale v. The Magistrates of Kirkcaldy, and in the other case of Watson v. The Police Commissioners of Glasgow, to which I have referred, the judges themselves stated distinctly that it was not competent for them to do, upon that proceeding, because it would then be a proceeding to adjudicate upon the merits of an election in a case of suspension and interdict.

But if they proceed upon the ground that this is a mere intrusion by a stranger upon the office of a party properly elected, they could never come to that conclusion without adjudicating that the other party had been first properly elected, and then to treat the other as a stranger intruding. They could not so treat him without considering the merits of the election. It is perfectly clear that they would have first to adjudicate on the merits of the election, and then to treat the other party as a mere intruder. But that applies only where the party is actually in possession; and if one party is not in possession, no more is the other party in possession. I apprehend it is extremely difficult to explain the course that has been adopted [575] upon the supposition that they were acting upon that which is recognized as a competent mode of proceeding for protecting a party actually in possession of an office against the unauthorized intrusion of a stranger. But if, on the other hand, they exercised a discretion as to the merits of an election, it must have been, in their opinion, a matter free from all doubt that the party upon whose account they allowed the suspension and interdict was the party duly elected.

Now, it is not my intention in the view I take of this case to give any opinion as to the merits of the election; but to this extent I think your Lordships are bound to attend to what took place. It cannot be considered a matter free from doubt and difficulty, which of the parties should be held to have been duly elected, the point turning upon the construction of the act; the construction of the act, as it is contended for by the present appellant, being that the Lord Provost for the time being, who by the act is to remain in possession of his office three years, is, according to his construction, to go out of his office at the anniversary of the day of his election; whereas the argument on the other side is, that he is to remain three municipal years in the office, and that he shall retain his office till his successor is appointed. There appear difficulties enough on either side upon considering the different clauses of the act,—difficulties, certainly, which the Court of Session can hardly have considered before they came to the conclusion that there was no question at all to discuss between the parties; but if there was any question to be discussed between the parties, then they were adjudicating upon the right of election, and were in a cause of suspension and interdict deciding [576] which of these two parties had been properly elected Lord Provost, contrary to all preceding authorities, and contrary to the doctrine which has been acted upon in all the cases to which I have referred.

That is the state of the contest between these parties. The Court of Session have, by an interlocutor upon a bill of suspension and interdict, prohibited the one party from exercising the duties of the office, and put no other party in possession of the office, leaving the town of Glasgow just as much without a Lord Provost by any adjudication of right as it was before.

It was urged at your Lordships' bar that great inconvenience would arise from interfering with the interlocutor that has been pronounced, inasmuch as it would leave the parties, and all those interested in the affairs of the corporation, in a state of uncertainty as to who was the Lord Provost. My Lords, it is perfectly true that great inconvenience must arise from this state of things. But in a question which affects all the corporations of Scotland,—in a question, therefore, which it is of the utmost importance to have rightly understood at an early period after the question has arisen,—no inconvenience that may arise to any particular corporation ought to induce your Lordships to take a course that might be productive of mischief to the general administration of the affairs of corporations. My Lords, would no inconvenience arise from sustaining the interdict that has been pronounced? It is admitted that it is no adjudication upon the right to the office; but it is said that if the party had not appealed, and therefore if the process had gone on in the usual course, it was essentially necessary, according to the rules laid down for that purpose, that within [577] a certain number of days a suit should be instituted. But that suit would only have been a more formal way of calling for the same species of interference by interdict which had been already made by the Lord Ordinary in the Bill Chamber; that would leave the matter just where it was. It is said that the judges might have called upon the parties to adopt proper proceedings, by which a proper adjudication might have been obtained. If your Lordships think that this interdict ought not to stand, it will be competent to either party to adopt those proceedings which may lead to an adjudication upon the question of right; nor am I aware that any time will be saved in coming to a final conclusion as to who is Lord Provost of Glasgow by your Lordships adopting either the one course or the other. I have referred to the principal authorities which have been referred to as impeaching the competency of the proceedings by suspension and interdict. But if this had been a recognized course of proceeding, that is, if the Court had, by means of this summary process of suspension and interdict, the means of deciding questions upon controverted elections without the delay of a regular suit for that purpose, one would be inclined to ask, why was that summary proceeding given by the statute of George the Second? If any summary process already existed, why give that summary process in addition by petition and complaint? Nothing can be more rapid than the proceeding by suspension and interdict; and if it is competent for the judges by that proceeding to adjudicate upon the merits of an election, it could not, in point of rapidity, be improved upon by any other mode of proceeding. It is evident, therefore, that it was not known at that time that there were [578] already existing in the Court of Session means of deciding by summary process, and therefore the statute gave a mode of proceeding by petition and complaint.

My Lords, two cases, and two only, have been referred to as interfering with the doctrine laid down by the learned judges in the cases I have referred to, one is the case of Chalmers v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh (Mor. 1863); but upon examining the case, it does not appear to be a case which can have any influence upon your Lordships' judgment in the present case. In the first place, it was not a burgh election at all which, according to the doctrine to which I have adverted of the learned judges, makes a distinction between that and the other cases; nor was it an original application to the Court of Session to interfere with the existing right by suspension and interdict. It was a process of suspension and interdict, it is true; but it was an appeal to the Court of Session from the adjudication of the magistrates of Edinburgh, who had decided upon an election matter subject to their jurisdiction. Therefore, although the proceeding was undoubtedly by suspension and interdict, it is a proceeding of such a nature as prevents it from being an authority in favour of the present proceeding. One cannot but observe even in that case, it was contrary to what is laid down generally as applicable to all cases of proceeding by suspension and interdict, namely, that it was a proceeding against the party actually possessed of the office. It may, therefore, well be a question, if the case was material to the [579] present purpose, whether that decision would not be liable to be impeached upon the ground of its being a proceeding by interdict against the party actually in possession of the office.

The other case referred to is the case of Gray v. The Magistrates of Anstruther Wester (Fac. Coll. 29th June 1819). Now, that is a case which, so far from being applicable to the present, was a case where the proceedings was by petition and complaint; it was not a case of suspension and interdict at all, but by petition and complaint under the statute of George the Second.

My Lords, it may perhaps be found necessary, if the Court of Session has lost the jurisdiction given to it by the statute of George the Second (7 Geo. 2, c. 16), and is incapable of administering justice in the case of controverted elections in burghs in Scotland by summary proceeding,—it may be necessary that the legislature should interfere; it may be necessary that they should have the summary power given to them which they had under the statute of George the Second, and which it appears they have lost, with reference to the existing corporations of Scotland. Whether that ought or ought not to be done is not now the matter for consideration; but the circumstance of their having lost the power under that statute can be no reason why the power should be exercised under a jurisdiction which it appears at the time when the municipal corporation reform act was passed was found incompetent, and over and over again declared to be incompetent, for the purpose of trying elections in burghs in Scotland. My Lords, it would obviously be productive of [580] the greatest possible inconvenience. It is impossible that justice can be done by this course. It is wholly incompetent to carry into effect that which must be the object of every court in interfering with questions as to the validity of these elections. But then another strong reason against your Lordships sanctioning a proceeding of that character is this:—that there are already modes of proceeding which, although not summary modes of proceeding, are calculated to meet every possible case that can arise. If the party is improperly in possession of an office it is not a matter of dispute that the Court of Session has jurisdiction, by process of reduction, to displace him from that office. If the party be not actually in possession of that office, then there is nothing to reduce. If a question arises, which of two parties is properly elected, then the proceeding by process of declarator is beyond all question competent and suited to the purpose of enabling the Court of Session to adjudicate between the parties, and to say which of the two is to be considered as properly exercising the duties and functions of the office. It is very true that these are not summary proceedings; but it is equally true, as I apprehend, and not disputed on either side at the bar, that, coupled with these proceedings, the proceeding by suspension and interdict might very well be applied; so that, pending the proceeding in which ultimate adjudication was to take place, the court might in the meantime, by virtue of this process of suspension and interdict, regulate as to the party who should happen to be in possession of the office. Whether that be or be not a course of proceeding consistent with the practice of the Court of Session, it is not necessary at present to [581] consider; it was so represented at the bar, and I find it referred to as the recognized practice in some of the cases to which I have adverted. The present question is, whether it is a wholesome practice that in the present case the Court of Session should proceed by suspension and interdict only.

My Lords, there is another point to which I shall have to call your Lordships' attention; but upon the merits of the case, considering that this is a question at least difficult to be decided which of these two parties is properly elected, and therefore a question in which the proceeding by interdict cannot be supported, upon the ground of its being a mere intrusion upon an office, of which some other person is clearly and legally in possession, I should advise your Lordships not to sanction a proceeding which, if acted upon by the Court of Session in Scotland, must obviously lead to very serious consequences.

It has been objected that this appeal is incompetent, because this is not a final adjudication between the parties; and under the statute no appeal lies from the interlocutory order. My Lords, the very general terms used in the statute prohibiting appeals against interlocutory orders no doubt have created considerable difficulty in several cases which have occurred, and it is often matter of difficulty to ascertain whether within the meaning of that act a particular proceeding is to be considered as interlocutory or not. From the best information I have been able to obtain as to the nature of this proceeding, it cannot be considered an interlocutory proceeding. It is a preliminary proceeding, it is true, but it is final as far as that proceeding itself is concerned, the proceeding being by an application [582] made ex parte in the first instance to the Lord Ordinary in the Bill Chamber, stating the case and praying for an interdict; it prays that the Lord Ordinary may pass the bill and grant the interdict. If he passes the bill and grants the interdict, as far as the passing the bill is concerned it is merely an authority for a more regular proceeding being commenced; but it is final. He may refuse the bill; and if he refuses the bill nothing further can be done in that proceeding; but the party may apply again to the same or to another Lord Ordinary for letters of suspension and interdict.

In considering whether this is final or not, and whether it is a subject of appeal or not, you must suppose the Lord Ordinary either to decide the one way or the other. Now, suppose he refuses the bill, that may be productive of the greatest possible evil to the parties. But the opinion of the Lord Ordinary is final; that is, he refuses the interdict, because that is the effect of his refusing the bill; and he denies to the party the opportunity of pursuing that remedy at least, though he may adopt some other, or may again apply to the Court for a similar remedy.

It seems hardly necessary to consider this any further, because I find by reference to a case which I believe was referred to in the argument that your Lordships have entertained appeals upon proceedings of this kind. I find in the case of Scott v. Brodie in the year 1803, reported in the Faculty Collection of Decisions, that the Lord Ordinary had passed the bill and granted the interdict. That was the subject of an application to the Court of Session, who sustained the bill, but varied the terms of the interdict; so that there was [583] the order of the Lord Ordinary confirmed, as to the principal part, by the judges of the Court of Session. The interdict was in some degree altered; that was made the subject of appeal to your Lordships' house. Now, that was in precisely the same terms as the present, for all material purposes; for, though here the Lord Ordinary did not himself originally exercise a jurisdiction, but reported the case to the Inner House, and the bill was in the first instance passed and the interdict granted by them, yet, it was in that case the order of the Court of Session passing the bill and granting an interdict that was made the subject of an appeal to your Lordships' house. I do not apprehend, therefore, that your Lordships will feel any difficulty in exercising your jurisdiction in this case, and that you will not consider that it is taken away by the act of parliament, inasmuch as the proceeding, though preliminary, is a proceeding complete in itself, and therefore it is to all intents and purposes within the meaning of the act a final adjudication, upon which an appeal will lie to this House upon the provisions of the act.

I by no means wish to be understood as giving any opinion as to whether a jurisdiction exists by suspension and interdict in other cases; it is a question of practice which is much better left to those who are familiar with the practice of the Court of Session. But looking at the authorities which are to be found in the books, and finding this to be a question in which an interdict could not be granted without an adjudication upon the merits of the election, and finding that all the judges have laid down, in the cases to which I have referred, that it is not competent in proceeding by [584] suspension and interdict to adjudicate upon the merits of the election. I think your Lordships will adopt the safest course by not sanctioning a proceeding which may lead to dangerous consequences, and which is contrary to all the authorities to be found in the books; but that your Lordships will adopt a much safer course, by remitting it to the Court of Session to consider what is the best course to be taken in these cases, but not permitting them to interfere with the merits of an election upon a proceeding by suspension and interdict. The best way to effect that object, I submit to your Lordships, will be to reverse the interlocutor passing the bill and granting the interdict which has been pronounced in the Court below.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said interlocutors complained of in the said appeal be and the same are hereby reversed: And it is further ordered, That the said cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, with instructions to refuse the bill of suspension, and to do otherwise therein as may be just, and consistent with this judgment.

[585] WRIT OF ERROR FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER, SCOTLAND.

THOMAS SPEARS (representing Robert Spears deceased), THOMAS SPEARS, and WILLIAM MITCHELL (representing George Douglas Mitchell deceased), Plaintiffs in Error.—Dr. Lushington.—Miller; Sir JOHN ARCHIBALD MURRAY, Her Majesty's Advocate General of Scotland, on behalf of Her Majesty, Defendant in Error.—Attorney General (Campbell)—Lord Advocate (Murray)—Kaye [18th June 1839].

[Mews' Dig. v. 34. S.C. 6 Cl. and F., 180.]

Extent—Assignment in Security.—Two partners of a trading firm executed a trust conveyance of part of their shares in the partnership stock to certain co-obligants in bonds of credit at the bank; under the conditions, first, that before any sale or transfer of the said stock should take place, the trustees should be bound to give three months' intimation of their intention to the assignors, and secondly, that the trustees should be bound to apply the proceeds of the stock in paying whatever should be due on the bonds of credit at the time of the sale of the stock. The assignors intimated said assignment, by having the stock transferred in the books of their firm to the names of the assignees. A writ of extent was afterwards issued against the assignors as crown debtors, at which time the value of the stock so assigned was £960 4s. 8d., and the debt due on the bonds of credit was £1200. Upon scire facias by the Crown against the trust assignees, Held (reversing on error the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland), That the assignees [586] had, by virtue of the intimated assignment, a special property in said stock, available against the Crown seizing the stock under an extent against the assignors for a debt due to the Crown.

George M'Lagan and Frederick M'Lagan carried on in partnership, under the firm of George M'Lagan and Co., the business of distillers in Scotland. They were also partners in another distillery company, under the firm of Spears, Mitchell, and Co.

A balance was struck on the company books of Spears, Mitchell, and Co. on the 1st of September 1813, when the amount of stock then at the credit of Frederick and George M'Lagan respectively, in the concern of Spears, Mitchell, and Company, was £1529 13s. 10 3-12d.

On the 7th of April 1814 the M'Lagans executed a trust assignment, setting forth "that for certain good causes and considerations it is proper and expedient that we should grant the trust right underwritten;" and therefore they assigned, conveyed, and made over to and in favour of certain other partners in the firm of Spears and Co., "but in trust always for behoof of us and our heirs and successors, and under the conditions and provisions herein-after specified, a part of our stock belonging to us in the concern of Spears and Co., to the extent of £1200 sterling each, together with the whole interests, dividends, profits, etc. that shall arise upon the said share of the stock of the said company of Spears and Co., to the extent fore-said, from and after the date hereof, turning and transferring the whole right of the premises from us, our heirs, executors, and successors, to and in favour of the said R., T., and [587] H. Spears, and assignees, whom we hereby surrogate and substitute in our full right and place of the premises," with full power to them to sell and dispose of the whole or any part of the said shares of the capital stock of the company of Spears and Co., to the extent foresaid, with all right competent, to the assignors, but under the conditions, "(1.) that before any sale or transfer of such stock shall take place the trustees shall be bound to give three months' intimation of their intention so to do to the M'Lagans: (2.) declaring always, that the trustees shall be bound to apply the proceeds of the stock so conveyed in paying and discharging whatever sums shall be due at the time of the sale of the said stock on two bonds of credit for £1000 sterling each, granted and subscribed by the said Robert, Thomas, and Henry Spears, and David Millie, binding themselves along with us the said F. and G. M'Lagan, one thereof to the Bank of Scotland, and the other to the Falkirk Banking Company, to be operated upon by the said company of George M'Lagan and Co.: (3.) during the subsistence of the trust to pay the profits to the M'Lagans."

On the 11th and 12th of April 1814 the M'Lagans wrote to the managing partner of Spears and Co., desiring him to "transfer £1200 of their stock in the concern of Spears, Mitchell, and Co. to Robert, Henry, and Thomas Spears, jointly to be held by them in terms of trust deed."

On the 16th of May an entry was made in each of the accounts in company of the M'Lagans in the books of Spears, Mitchell, and Co. thus:—"1814, 10th May. [588] To Robert, Henry, and Thomas Spears joint account. fo. 23. £1200;" and a joint account was opened in the books of Spears and Co. in the names of Robert, Henry, and Thomas Spears, in which account were the following entries:—"1814, 10th May. By Frederick M'Lagan's account in company, fo. 5. £1200.—1814, 10th May. By George M'Lagan's account in company, fo. 6. £1200."

On the 27th March 1816 a writ of extent issued against G. and F. M'Lagan, for excise duties due to the Crown.

By an inquisition under that extent it was found that the firm of Spears and Co. were indebted in the sum of £509 15s. 9d. to G. and F. M'Lagan, in respect of their share in the company funds of Spears and Co., which was seized by the sheriff, and claimed by Messrs. Spears. At the trial in the Court of Exchequer it was agreed that the M'Lagans interest in the company funds of Spears and Co. at the time of taking the inquisition was £960 4s. 8d., instead of £509 15s. 9d. On the 2d of June 1832 a writ of scire facias was brought by the Advocate General of Scotland on behalf of the Crown, in the Court of Exchequer, to recover this sum. To this writ Messrs. Spears pleaded, that they were not at the time of the teste of the writ of extent, nor at the time of taking the inquisition under the extent, indebted to the M'Lagans in the said sum, and issue was joined. The case came on to be tried before the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, on the 23d May 1834, when the jury returned a special verdict, setting out the foregoing facts; the question thereby raised being whether the Crown was entitled to the £960 4s. 8d. as a debt due from Spears, Mitchell, and Co. to the M'Lagans, the [589] Crown debtors, or whether Messrs. Spears were not in full right of that sum, by virtue of their assignation of 7th April 1814, duly intimated.

This special verdict was argued on the 27th June 1834, when Baron Sir P. Murray directed judgment to be entered for the Crown.

Spears and others brought a writ of error.

Plaintiffs in error.—The stock was duly assigned by the M'Lagans, who were divested of all right in the same. The assignation was expressly granted to secure those now represented by the plaintiffs in error against the consequences to which they might be subjected by their having become bound as obligants in two bonds of credit granted by them for the use and benefit of the assignors; and according to the law of Scotland an assignation in trust or in security, followed by intimation, is equally available as an absolute assignation for the purpose for which it may have been granted; and such assignation, from and after the intimation thereof, completely divests the assignors of the property or subject conveyed, and transfers the full right thereof to the assignees. The assignation was not only intimated, but the amount of stock assigned was set apart and transferred and appropriated to the assignees in a separate account entered in their names in the books of the company, part of whose stock held by the assignors was conveyed to those represented by the plaintiffs in error, by such assignation, so that the stock ceased to be the property of the M'Lagans, or attachable for their debts, until the claims of the assignees thereupon were fully satisfied. The Crown upon an extent in aid is entitled only to the rights of the Crown debtor in so far [590] as available against his debtor, and here, after assignation intimated, the assignors have no right against the assignees.

Defendant in error.—The trust assignation of the 7th of April 1814, set out in this special verdict, and upon which the decision of this question depends, was, under the circumstances of this case, inoperative. For one of its conditions was, that no sale or transfer by the trustees of the subjects assigned could take place till three months' notice had been given by the trustees to the assignors. At the time when the extent issued no such notice had been given, so that the trustees then had no power to sell, and might never have acquired that power, as the assignors might have discharged their liability to the banks out of their private funds, or have made some other arrangement, without allowing the trustees to resort to their property in the house of Spears and Co.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case Frederick and George M'Lagan, the Crown debtors, carried on the business of distillers, in partnership together, under the firm of M'Lagan and Co., and they were also partners in the firm of Spears, Mitchell, and Co.

By a balance struck in the books of Spears and Co. in September 1813, the amount of stock to the credit of Frederick and George M'Lagan was £1529. On 7th April 1814, Frederick and George M'Lagan by deed assigned to the other partners in the firm of Spears and Co., part of the stock belonging to them in the firm of Spears, Mitchell, and Co. to the extent of £1200, with all the dividends and profits which [591] should arise therefrom, to the extent aforesaid, upon trust, first, to give three months' notice before selling; second, to apply the proceeds in discharge of what should at the time be due upon two bonds, in which Messrs. Spears, partners in the firm of Spears and Co., had joined the M'Lagans as securities for advances made to them by two banks; thirdly, during the subsistence of the trust to pay the profits to the M'Lagans.

On the 11th April the M'Lagans wrote to Spears and Co., desiring that £1200 of their stock in the firm of Spears, Mitchell, and Co. might be transferred to the account of Messrs. Spears, their co-obligors, which was done, and which was dated on the 10th May 1814. On the 27th March 1816 the writ of extent issued, at which time the share or stock of the M'Lagans in the house of Spears, Mitchell, and Co. was £960, and at the same time the debt due from the M'Lagans to the banks exceeded the £1200. These facts were found by the special verdict; and the question upon the writ of error was, whether the Crown was entitled to the £960 as a debt due from Spears, Mitchell, and Co. to the M'Lagans, the Crown debtors, or whether the Spears, the co-obligors, were entitled to that sum under the deed of the 7th April 1814.

The learned baron, Sir Patrick Murray, was of opinion that the Crown was entitled, not upon the ground of any invalidity, under the law of Scotland, of the assignation in trust, but because it was not an absolute but only a conditional assignation, which had not been rendered absolute before the teste of the extent, by notice and actual sale under the provisions of the deed.

I cannot concur in this opinion; the deed was an [592] assignment of what was due from the firm of Spears, Mitchell, and Co. to the M'Lagans, or of their interest in the stock of that firm. Due intimation was given, and no question is made as to this having been a valid assignation of the property in question according to the law of Scotland. The £1200 was actually transferred into the names of the assignees in the books of the firm.

The M'Lagans, therefore, could not have compelled payment of the amount of their share of the stock in that firm without satisfying the terms of the trust of the deed. They had ceased to be creditors for or owners of the full amount of their share in such stock, and had become creditors for or owners of so much only of such stock as might remain after satisfying the trusts of the deed, and that by a valid assignment according to the law of Scotland, two years before the issuing of the extent.

Could the Crown, claiming title to receive what was due to or was the property of the M'Lagans, be entitled to more than they could themselves have demanded! Could the Crown, so claiming, be entitled to seize what had two years before become the property of the plaintiff under the deed, to the extent of their lien thereon! If such were the law it would be most unjust, and it would make it impossible to deal with any one liable to become debtor to the Crown for any assignment of property upon trust, or subject to conditions or otherwise than for an absolute interest. The authorities show that such is not the rule of law as applicable to extents.

In West on Extents, page 116, the rule, as extracted from the authorities quoted, is thus stated: "Goods, [593] pawned or pledged before the teste of an extent cannot be taken, because the pawnee or bailee has a special property in them. Nor for the same reason goods demised or lent to another for a term certain during the term. But it seems that goods pawned before the teste of the extent may be taken as against the pawnee, on satisfaction of the pledge, or taken and sold subject to the pawnee's right." In the King v. Sanderson, (reported in Wightwick, page 53,) the Chief Baron says, the preference of the Crown can only operate upon what the partner himself had.

In the King v. Lee, (reported in 6 Price, page 369,) the goods of the Crown debtor were in the hands of a factor, who had paid bills accepted upon the credit of the goods before the issuing of the extent, and had accepted other bills not due at the time of issuing the extent, judgment was given for the factor, the Chief Baron (Richards), in delivering the judgment of the Court, saying: "The Crown debtor himself could not have compelled the factors to give up the goods to him without first paying them what was due. Therefore we think that the Crown could not compel the factors to give up their lien without paying them what money they had advanced on the faith of the consignment to their principal." The rule upon this subject must be the same in Scotland as in this country; indeed the learned Baron so considers it. The case of Redfearn v. Somervail, in 1 Dow. page 50, shows the title, according to the law of Scotland, of the assignee under an intimated assignment; and the authorities referred to show that the Crown can only claim that which its debtor was entitled to.

[594] I therefore move your Lordships to give judgment for the plaintiffs in error.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the judgment given in the said Court of Exchequer in Scotland for the defendant in error be and the same is hereby reversed.

ALEXANDER MUNDELL.—BOWYER, Solicitors.

[595] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

JOHN HART and WILLIAM HODGE, Appellants.*—Sir William Follett—A. McNeill; JOHN FRAME and COMPANY, Respondents.—Dr. Lushington [18th June 1839].

[Mews' Dig. xiii. 1467, 1470. S.C., 6 Cl. and F., 193; 3 Jur., 547; 7 Scots, R.R., 241. Distinguished in Smith v. Grant, 1838, 20 Dunlop, 1078. Commented on in Purves v. Landell, 1845, 12 Cl. and F., 100.]

Agent and Client—Reparation.—A country agent was employed by a manufacturing company to prepare petitions, at their instance, to the justices of peace against two apprentices, for having deserted their work, and other misconduct. The agent accordingly prepared and presented petitions, founded on the 4th Geo. 4. c. 34., but libelling the third section, instead of the first which related to apprentices in the situation of those complained of; the apprentices were convicted and imprisoned, but subsequently liberated by the Court of Justiciary in respect of the wrong section having been founded on, and they thereafter sued the company for damages and expenses: Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that as the terms of the act were clear, the agent was liable in relief, although there was no established course of practice under the statute, and although neither the opposite agents in the inferior court nor the sheriff-substitute of the county considered the petitions to have been erroneously libelled.

The appellants are in partnership as writers in the town of Paisley, and the respondents were calico manufacturers in Glasgow and at Locherbank in the county of [596] Renfrew, where their works are situated, having in their employment a great number of apprentices. By the first section of the 4th Geo. 4. c. 34., intitled "An act to enlarge the power of justices in determining complaints between masters and servants, and between masters, apprentices, artificers, and others," it is enacted, "that it shall and may be lawful not only for any master or mistress, but also for his or her steward, manager, or agent, to make complaint upon oath against any apprentice within the meaning of the said before recited acts (viz. 20 Geo. 2. c. 19. and 6 Geo. 3. c. 25.) to any justice of the peace of the county or place where such apprentice shall be employed, or for any misdemeanor, misconduct, or ill-behaviour of any such apprentice; or if such apprentice shall have absconded, it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace of the county or place where such apprentice shall be found, or where such apprentice shall have been employed, and any such justice is hereby empowered, upon complaint thereof made upon oath by such master, mistress, steward, manager, or agent, which oath the said justice is hereby empowered to administer, to issue his warrant for apprehending every such apprentice; and further that it shall be lawful for any such justice to hear and determine the same complaint, and to punish the offender by abating the whole or any part of his or her wages, or otherwise by commitment to the house of correction, there to remain and be held to hard labour for a reasonable time not exceeding three months."

By the third section of the statute it is enacted, "that if any servant in husbandry, or any artificer, [597] calico printer, handicraftsman, miner, collier, keelman, pitman, glassman, potter, labourer, or other person, shall contract with any person or persons whomsoever, to serve him, her, or them for any time or times whatsoever, or in any other manner, and shall not enter into or commence his or her service according to his or her contract (such contract being in writing, and signed by the contracting parties,) or having entered into such service, shall absent himself or herself from his or her service before the term of his or her contract, whether such contract shall be in writing or not in writing, shall be completed, or neglect to fulfil the same, or be guilty of any other misconduct or misdemeanor in the execution thereof, or otherwise respecting the same, then and in every such case it shall and may be lawful for any such justice of the peace of the county or place where such servant in husbandry, artificer, etc., or other person, shall have so contracted, or be employed, or be found; and such justice is hereby authorized and empowered, upon complaint thereof made upon oath to him by the person or persons, or any of them, with whom such servant in husbandry, artificer, etc., or other person, shall have so contracted, or by his, her, or their steward, manager, or agent, which oath such justice is hereby empowered to administer, to issue his warrant for the apprehending every such servant in husbandry, artificer, etc., or other person, and to examine into the nature of the complaint; and if it shall appear to such justice that any such servant in husbandry, artificer, etc., or other person, shall not have fulfilled such contract, or hath been guilty of any other misconduct or misdemeanor as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful [598] for such justice to commit every such person to the house of correction, there to remain and be held to hard labour for a reasonable time, not exceeding three months, and to abate a portionable part of his or her wages, for and during such period as he or she shall be so confined in the house of correction, or in lieu thereof, to punish the offender by abating the whole or any part of his or her wages; or to discharge such servant in husbandry, artificer, etc., or other person, from his or her contract, service, or employment, which discharge shall be given under the hand and seal of such justice gratis."

The respondents having deemed it necessary, for the safety and protection of themselves and their business, to take proceedings against some of their apprentices, under the above act, employed the appellants to prepare petitions to the justices of the peace for Renfrewshire against two apprentices belonging to the manufactory, of the names of Houston and Crookshanks, for having deserted their work, and other misconduct.

These petitions were presented to the justices, and after certain procedure and proof Houston and Crookshanks were convicted, and committed to the house of correction.

Bills of suspension and liberation having been presented to the high court of justiciary by Houston and Crookshanks and two other apprentices named Hunter and Gilmour, who had been convicted and committed to the house of correction upon petitions, at the instance of the respondents, prepared by Mr. James Campbell, writer in Johnston, these convictions were quashed, and the prisoners ordered to be liberated. The petitions which had been prepared and presented by [599] Mr. Campbell specially libelled on the third section, and the appellants, seeing that a conviction had followed, prepared the petitions against Houston and Crookshanks in similar terms, specially libelling on the same section.

In the course of the proceedings against Hunter and Gilmour, no objection to the petitions, as founded on a wrong section of the statute, had been taken by the agents who appeared on behalf of the apprentices; but in the case of petitions presented against Houston and Crookshanks, in answer to an objection taken, that the petition had been founded on the third section instead of upon the first, the sheriff substitute of Renfrew, acting as a justice of the peace, delivered the following decision:—"As to this objection I should not be disposed to sustain it, at any rate, considering that the provisions of the third section are of general application; but any doubt on that score seems removed by the subsequent statute 10 Geo. 4. c. 52., which has the effect of making all the provisions of the act founded on applicable to apprentices."

Houston and Crookshanks raised separate actions of damages against the respondents on account of the proceedings at their instance, which actions were duly intimated by the respondents to the appellants. After an arrangement the respondents agreed to pay to each of the parties, Houston and Crookshanks, £25, in the name of damages, and also to pay the taxed expenses of their actions, and these sums were accordingly paid by the respondents, who then brought actions of relief against the appellants.

A special case, comprising the above facts, having been agreed to, the Lord Ordinary, on the 1st of March [600] 1836, pronounced the following interlocutor and note:—"Finds, that the defenders are bound to relieve the pursuers of the damages and expenses to which they have been or may be subjected in consequence of the illegal and incompetent proceedings which they instituted and carried on in their names against the apprentices named in the libel, the illegality and incompetency of the said proceedings having been wholly occasioned by the negligence or want of professional skill of the said defenders while acting in the employment of the pursuers, and repels the defences, and decerns accordingly; but before answer as to the specific sum for which decret for execution should pass against the said defenders, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that the parties may be farther heard."—"Note. The grounds of this judgment are substantially the same as explained in a note * to an interlocutor of this date, in the action by the same [601]

* Note.—"It is certainly with regret, and not without some hesitation, that the Lord Ordinary gives this judgment. Where there is no suspicion of fraud, or reckless disregard of the client's interest, cases of this kind are always distressing. But, on attending to the whole circumstances, he has not found it possible to come to any other conclusion. In the first place, he must say, that he thinks the blunder, in libelling on the third section of the statute, instead of the first, was a very palpable and gross blunder. The one section dealt professedly with apprentices, and with them only; the other with servants, and other persons hired or engaged to work on special contracts; and being almost identical with the former in the substance of its enactments, could not be supposed also to relate to apprentices, without imputing to the legislature the most absurd and preposterous repetition. But the whole style and substance of the two sections points out the distinction in the parties against James Campbell. The only difference between the cases is, that Campbell says he [602] deliberately considered the statutes, and came to the conclusion on which he acted, after using all possible [603] diligence to be right; while the present defenders say they did not deliberate at all; but having been employed after Campbell's petition had been received and acted upon, merely followed that precedent, and judged of its propriety by its success. Of the two, the Lord Ordinary rather thinks this last defence the worst. Even communis error, and a long course of local irregularity, has been found to afford no protection to one qui spondet peritiam artis. But here there had been nothing like a course of practice, or any series of precedents which had received the tacit sanction of the proper authorities. The defenders were in no way bound to submit their judgment to Campbell's, and had no right to deprive their employers of the benefit of their own skill and sagacity clearest and plainest manner. The section about apprentices gives its remedies to the masters or mistresses of such apprentices, and uses this and no other phraseology throughout. But the section about servants and persons employed to work never once uses these expressions, and gives its remedies only to 'the person or persons with whom such servant, etc. may have contracted, etc. ;' and in the fourth section, which contains regulations common to both classes, the distinction is still most anxiously and carefully preserved; that section setting forth, that as such masters, mistresses, or employers may sometimes reside at a distance, by which the said apprentices or servants, artificers, etc. may be put to inconvenience in recovering their wages, certain facilities should be provided, etc. But the very substance of the third section might have shown any attentive (even though unprofessional) reader, that it could not relate to apprentices, since it speaks exclusively of persons whose only contract with their employers is a contract to work for hire, and who are contemplated as persons sui juris, and completely capable of binding themselves by such a contract. Now, the contract with an apprentice, though it may include a contract to work for hire, is primarily a contract to teach and to learn a certain trade or handicraft; and being generally entered into with persons under age, is almost invariably concluded, not only with them, but with their parents or other guardians, expressly taking burden for them, as is the case with the indentures referred to, and produced with the original petitions by the defender; and yet libelling only on the third section relating to independent contractors, not with a master or mistress, but with an employer for him. In these circumstances it is quite idle in the defender to say that the first section related only to apprentices of a particular description, and that he, conceiving that the third was intended to reach all descriptions, was therefore induced to select it as the safest for his purpose. In the first place, it is manifest that the apprentices excluded from the operation of the first section were not intended to be affected by the statute at all, as belonging, like apprentices to surgeons, attorneys, etc., to a higher class of persons, for whose misconduct it was not thought necessary to provide such summary remedies. But, second, whoever might be without the provisions of the first section, the defender could not possibly doubt that the persons he was to prosecute were within it. It extended, in express terms, to all who had not paid an apprentice fee of £25 or upwards. But, first, it is a matter of notoriety to every one in Paisley that no such fee was ever paid in the trade of calico printing, and, second, the defender had the indentures before him, which showed there was no such fee. But strong as this ground is, the Lord Ordinary would have had great difficulty in subjecting the defender on it alone, considering the apparent novelty of the proceeding, the acquiescence not only of the justices, but of the legal advisers of the apprentices, and above all, the deliberate opinion of the respectable sheriff substitute (given, no doubt, after the defender was committed to the course he had taken) in favour of all that had been done. The sanction of still higher opinions proved insufficient indeed to protect a law agent from the consequences of professional error, in the cases of Mathie, 17th May 1826, and Stevenson, 6th July 1827. But still the Lord Ordinary could not have perfectly satisfied himself with a judgment resting merely on his own conviction, that a great, and, in his view, an inconceivable blunder had been committed. He thinks it right to state, therefore, that he has proceeded chiefly on a different view,—a view very nearly corresponding with that on which Lord Lyndhurst appears to have placed his judgment, in affirming the interlocutor of this Court by leaning indolently on his example. If the blind will follow the blind they must both lie in the same ditch."

The court (9th June 1836) having adhered to the above interlocutor, the present appeal was brought.

[604] Appellants.—In the ground of action, as set forth in the special case, upon which the judgment of the Court of Session is founded, there are no facts stated by the respondents relevant to infer a liability against the appellants; it is not alleged that there was any professional negligence in conducting the proceedings, nor is it averred that the petitions were informal, or that there was any neglect, in matter of form, by the appellants, in doing their duty as practitioners before the court; on the contrary, except for the alleged error in law, the proceedings were regular and competent. Neither is it relevant to infer a liability by a law agent or attorney in the case of Stevenson, (4 W. and S. App. 182.) already referred to. He there said, that if the agent had been necessarily constrained to grapple with a nice and difficult point of law or practice, he might not have been answerable for the consequences; but that the case was very different, when it appeared that he had a safe and plain course before him, which he chose to desert, in order to embark on a doubtful one; and that if he needlessly raised a nice question, when he might have avoided it, he must answer the consequence of resolving it wrong. Now, in this case, if the defender really was at a loss which of the two sections to proceed on, was it not open to him to proceed upon both? If he actually believed that apprentices (though not once mentioned) were, or might be included in the third section, and that it was only a repetition, in more comprehensive terms, of the first, why not make sure of reaching the parties accused, by referring to both conjunctly, as merely explicatory and supplementary of each other? Or, if he was aware that both could not be intended for the same class of persons, and was doubtful under which his parties were included, what was to hinder him from founding upon both alternatively, and seeking a conviction upon the same state of facts against them, as certainly comprehended under the one or the other description? There is no doubt, it is humbly conceived, that a libel, in either of these forms, would have been perfectly relevant, and a conviction obtained under either, liable to no objection. If the last or alternative form was adopted it would probably have been necessary for the Court to decide under which section the parties were to be held as arraigned; and if they, with both before them, should have fallen into the alleged error of the defender, (which it is not easy to imagine,) it is, no doubt, possible that the consequences might have been the same to the pursuers. But the defender would, at all events, have been saved from responsibility, and been entitled to say, what he cannot now say, that in a matter of supposed difficulty he had run upon no needless risks, but followed a course perfectly unexceptionable, and safe for all parties. Nay, if this very plain statute had appeared to him absolutely inextricable and obscure in all its sections, there was still a plain and a safe way by which he might have escaped all possible embarrassment. It is settled by the special case that he had no instructions to proceed upon that statute at all. His employment was quite general, 'to prepare petitions to the justices against certain apprentices who had deserted their work, and otherwise misconducted themselves.' Now, by the original acts of 1617 and 1661, as interpreted by immemorial usage, the justices had undoubted power of enforcing all such contracts, without the aid of any recent enactment; and the defender might have discharged himself of the task he had undertaken without referring to the 4th of Geo. IV. at all. In this view it appears to the Lord Ordinary that he stands very much in the situation of Stevenson in the question with Rowand; and that, even supposing that there could have been any material difficulty in fixing upon the proper section, it was a difficulty which the defender created by his own act, and met, consequently, at his own peril, there being a plain and safe course open to him, by which, without injury to any one, all peril might have been avoided. No man of common judgment, professional or unprofessional, can be listened to, who would say, that after reading the statute, he thought there was no sort of risk or difficulty in entirely passing over, or neglecting the first section,—or if there was a plain or palpable difficulty, the defender must be answerable for the consequences of not taking a plain way to avoid it." for a debt which he is instructed to recover, or a liability to pay damage arising out of proceedings which he has been instructed to institute, to say that he has been negligent, or has shown want of skill; it must be averred that there was crassa negligentia, that there was gross ignorance, or that there was gross want of skill; and in the present case there are no facts averred which amount to crassa negligentia or gross want of skill. (Pitt v. Yalden, 4 Bur. Rep. 2060; Laidler v. Elliot, 3 Barn. and Cress. 738; Baillie v. Chandless, 3 Camp. 16; Godefroy v. Dalton, 4 Bingham 460; see also M'Lean v. Grant, 15th Nov. 1805, Mor. No. 2, App. voce Reparation.)

Although the petitions recite particularly the third section of the statute referred to, yet the statute itself, which is a public statute, was also founded on, as appears from the conclusion of the petition, which bears,—“That in these circumstances it is clear that the said Thomas Houston junior has contravened the statute before narrated and founded on; and in order that he may be brought to punishment for [606] so doing, the present application is made to your honours for the usual warrant in such cases.”

The statute, therefore, is expressly founded on, and being a public statute, the judge was bound to take notice of and give effect to such of the provisions as, on considering the facts proved, he thought applicable; but in the judgment actually pronounced it does not appear that the Lord Ordinary placed his decision on any particular part of the act.

It is correctly stated in his lordship's note, “That there had been nothing like a course of practice, or any series of precedents, which had received the tacit sanction of the proper authorities,” and this principle ought to have led his Lordship to acquit the appellants, in place of deciding against them; for even in the more mechanical branch of the profession of a law agent, viz., that of conveyancing, it was laid down in the House of Lords (Stevenson v. Rowand, 4 Wilson and Shaw's Rep. 182),—“That a solicitor, called upon to perform duties in his character as a solicitor, is not to be held responsible for every mistake in point of law which he may commit. Every person is liable to mistakes in difficult and doubtful points of law; and if the question had turned solely on the construction of this instrument, I should be of opinion that Mr. Stevenson was not liable. But, my Lords, the true distinction is this:—In this particular case it appears that Mr. Stevenson, without any sufficient reason, departed from the ordinary and beaten course, from the usual and established forms of conveyancing.”

But the appellants had no such beaten track,—no [606] guide to light their path in construing this recent and complex act. The Lord Ordinary, from the note of his opinion in the relative case of Campbell, seems himself to have been uncertain as to what would have been the safest road. He admits the competency of founding on the first section, but says it might have been founded on jointly with the third; or that the petitions and sections might have been founded on alternatively; or that the statute might have been avoided altogether, and the petition placed on the Scottish statutes 1617 and 1661. The Judges of the Inner House distinctly announced that they did not concur in these views. Indeed there can be no doubt, that if the appellants had followed any of the courses suggested by the Lord Ordinary, the proceedings must have been quashed for uncertainty and inapplicability.

The appellants are country practitioners, who have not immediate access to the best advice, and the offence committed by the apprentices being one requiring an immediate check, and the proceedings very summary in their nature, they are necessarily called on to exercise their judgment under the pressure of obtaining instant redress.

Both the judge to whom the execution of this act is entrusted and the sheriff substitute of the county, and other practitioners engaged in precisely similar cases, and the agents of the parties accused, either directly sanctioned the petitions as being correctly and accurately laid, or acted on the footing that they were so.

In such circumstances it is impossible to maintain that there was, on the part of the appellants, crassa negligentia, or gross ignorance and want of skill.

[607] Respondents.—The appellants, as the paid agents of the respondents, were responsible for the skill and art necessary to accomplish safely the business which, as professional men, they undertook. The general rule as to the party employed in such cases is spondet peritiam artis, and imperitia culpe annumeratur.

The nature and extent of their employment is distinctly set forth in the special case as follows, viz. that the appellants were employed by the respondents "to prepare petitions to the justices of the peace for Renfrewshire, at their instance, against two apprentices of the names of Houston and Crookshanks, belonging to their manufactory, for having deserted their work, and other misconduct."

As to the form of proceeding no instructions were given; but the respondents trusted entirely to the appellants, as their legal advisers, and it was to secure the benefit of such advice that they resorted to the appellants at all, but having so resorted to them, and paying, of course, the usual professional charges in the matter, they trusted themselves implicitly in the appellants hands. The object was, that their refractory apprentices should be brought back to a state of subordination, and the respondents knew that the law afforded means to this effect; but whether the remedy was a remedy at common law, or whether it was to be found in the statute book, and if so, in what part of the statute book, the respondents did not know, and gave themselves no concern.

The Lord Ordinary very justly observed, that there was, independently of that statute, "a plain and a safe way by which they (the appellants) might have [608] escaped all possible embarrassment. By the original acts of 1617 and 1661, as interpreted by immemorial usage, the justices had undoubted power of enforcing all such contracts, without the aid of any recent enactment, and the defender might have discharged himself of the task he had undertaken without referring to 4 Geo. 4 at all."

The jurisdiction and powers of the justices independently altogether of the stat. 4 Geo. 4 are undeniable (Anderson, 24th Jan. 1837, 15 D., B., and M., 412; M'Lellan, 9th July 1825, 4 Shaw and Dunlop, 165; Jack, 11th March 1837, 15 D., B., and M., 833; Dinwoodie, 22d Nov. 1748, Mor. 7638; Bisset, 15th May 1810; Raeburn, 4th June 1824, 3 S. and D. 69; Wright, 9th Feb. 1826, 4 S. and D. 440; Stewart, 21st June 1832 and 21st May 1833, 11 S., D., and B., 628; M'Dougall, 27th June 1833, 11 S., D., and B., 795; Stevenson v. Rowand, 4 W. and S. Appeal Cases, 177; see to the same effect, 2 W. and S. 563; Frame and Son v. Campbell, 14 S. and D. 914).

It is not doubted that the appellants acted with the most perfect bona fides. But the question here is, whether as between two parties, one of them a professional man, and taking money for his professional aid and assistance, and the other an unprofessional man, resorting to the first, and paying him his utmost charge for a piece of professional business to be performed, and the result having been that matters were not merely blundered to the extent of making the business performed inoperative, but blundered to such an extreme degree as to involve the client in penal damages, as having been guilty of the quasi delict of wrongous imprisonment,—is it the paid agent, or the employer who pays him, upon whom the loss is to fall? Surely it is not asking too much at the hands of a professional man, that he shall at least have sufficient skill not to bring his client into the disgrace and the dangers of a false [609] imprisonment; and if he have not such skill, surely where both are equally certantes de damno vitando, it is upon the former, and not upon the latter, that any loss which thence accrues shall be laid.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this was an action in the Court of Session in Scotland by the respondents against the appellants, who are provincial writers or attornies, for damages sustained by the alleged negligence or want of skill of the appellants in the transaction in which they were employed by the respondents. The parties had the good sense to avoid the expense of going into evidence, by agreeing to a statement upon a special case; as to the facts, therefore, there is no question. It is to be observed, that this special case assumes the employment of the appellants by the respondents, and that their instructions were generally to prepare petitions to the justices of the peace against the two apprentices Houston and Crookshanks, no special instructions being stated; that these two apprentices and another, Hunter, who had been convicted upon a similar petition, having disputed the legality of the convictions by bills of suspension and liberation, the present appellants acted for the respondents in maintaining the legality of the conviction, but the conviction in Hunter's case having been held illegal, and he having consequently been liberated, no opposition was made to the application by Houston and Crookshanks, and that they were consequently liberated, and having afterwards brought actions for false imprisonment, the respondents, with the concurrence of the appellants, settled those actions by paying to each £25 and their costs. This arrangement, it was agreed, should not prejudice the [610] present action, but was to be considered as if the sums had been found due by the verdict of a jury or final judgment. No objection to the form of the proceeding was taken in Houstoun's case, but the objection was taken in Crookshank's case, and over-ruled. Although these proceedings may not be conclusive in this action of the illegality of the imprisonment of the apprentices, yet it is, I think, very difficult for the appellants, in the face of these admissions, to contend that the convictions were legal, and, consequently, that the adjudication of their illegality and the order for the discharge of the apprentices were not well founded, as they admit that it was by their advice, or that of the agent employed by them, that no opposition was made to this adjudication and order; but there is, I think, no doubt of the illegality of the proceedings against the apprentices.

The question, therefore, is reduced to this: Was there such a degree of negligence or ignorance in the conduct of the appellants, in conducting the proceedings against the apprentices, as to subject them to the liability of indemnifying their employers against the injury which has arisen from it? Their instructions were general,—to prepare petitions to the justices of the peace against the apprentices, for having deserted their work, and other misconduct.

It is, I think, unnecessary to inquire what course the appellants, acting under these instructions, ought to have adopted if any serious doubt or difficulty had existed as to the construction of the act of 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, because the recent statute was naturally the authority to be resorted to. It has, however, been well observed, that had the construction been thought doubtful, all danger [611] of miscarriage might have been avoided by founding upon the statutes generally, without specifying the particular section; but I cannot discover any ambiguity or doubt as to the construction of the act. It recites the 20 Geo. 2, c. 19, 6 Geo. 3, c. 25, and 4 Geo. 4, c. 29. In the two first of these statutes, the distinctions between servants and apprentices is very distinctly marked; the title of 6 Geo. 3, c. 25, indeed, is "An act for better regulating apprentices and persons working under contract," and the 4 Geo. 4, c. 29, extends the provisions of the two former acts to apprentices upon whose binding-out no larger sum than £25 had been or should be paid. The 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, reciting this act, in which this distinction is so clearly marked, itself maintains it in the clearest possible terms: the first section provides for complaints by a master or mistress against any apprentice within the meaning of the said before-recited act; the second section also relates to apprentices, giving to them a summary remedy for their wages not exceeding £10; the third section takes up the case of servants working under contract, and describes them in this way, "That if any servant in husbandry, or any artificer, calico printer," and then it enumerates a great variety of other trades, "or other person shall contract with any person or persons whomsoever to serve him, her, or them for any time or times whatsoever, or in any other manner;" and then it gives summary jurisdiction to the magistrates to punish such servants breaking such contract, or being guilty of any misconduct in the execution thereof; the fourth section providing a remedy for wages unpaid, when the party to pay is absent, applies to both classes, and, therefore, in describing the parties to be paid, [612] it repeats the description in the third section, but adds to it "and apprentices," and in describing the parties liable to pay it describes them as "masters, mistresses, or employers;" the first evidently applying to the master of apprentices, and the latter to the employer of servants.

The appellants, however, receiving instructions to proceed against two apprentices, wholly neglected the first section, and founded the petition exclusively upon the third section, which they set out in the petition, and then stating the indentures of apprenticeship and that the apprentice had absented himself, and had neglected his service and duty as an apprentice and servant as aforesaid, concludes that he had contravened the statute before narrated and founded on, that is, section third, which did not relate to apprentices at all. From this error, in founding upon the third section instead of the first, the whole evil has arisen; and, as I have before observed, the appellants cannot now dispute that such evil has been the necessary and legal consequence of such error, and that the respondents have thereby been exposed to the damages and expenses which they have paid to the apprentices. Looking, therefore, to the case against the apprentices, which the appellants were directed to conduct, and to the act under which they proceeded, it appears to me to be a case of very great negligence, which term I think more applicable than ignorance; the appellants' case being that they were led into the error by following the example of another professional agent of the respondent, who had adopted the same course, and thereby involved his employer in the same difficulty, and exposed himself to the same responsibility. It is obvious that this can be no defence. [613] It was the duty of the appellants to look with their own eyes, and judge with their own understanding; and if, instead of doing so, they have blindly followed the erroneous course of another they cannot complain at being made responsible for the consequences of the error into which their guide has led them. Their employer had a right to their diligence, their knowledge, and their skill; and whether they had not so much of these qualities as they were bound to have, or, having it, neglected to employ it, the law properly makes them liable for the loss which has arisen to their employer. Another ground of defence is, that the point having been raised in the case of Crookshanks, the justice who heard the case was of opinion that section third was the one applicable to the case. This circumstance, if there had been any real doubt upon the construction of the act, might possibly have induced the court to consider whether there was sufficient opening for the construction adopted to operate as an excuse for the appellants; but the case appears to me to be too clear for any such construction; besides, as was observed by some of the judges below, the cause of action by the apprentices had already arisen, as they had been apprehended and were in custody. I cannot, however, but express my surprise at the opinion imputed to the sheriff-substitute, that the 10 Geo. 4, c. 52, has the effect of making all the provisions of the act founded on applicable to apprentices; whereas the obvious intention and construction of the act is only to extend the provisions of the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, to persons engaged in certain other descriptions of business, as if such other description had been particularly mentioned in it, leaving the distinction untouched [614] between such of those provisions as related to apprentices and such as related to servants, and, applicando singula singulis, applying the separate provisions as to apprentices and as to servants, to apprentices and servants in the additional description of trades.

Professional men, possessed of a reasonable portion of information and skill, according to the duties they undertake to perform, and exercising what they so possess with reasonable care and diligence in the affairs of their employers, certainly ought not to be liable for errors in judgment, whether in matters of law or of discretion. Every case, therefore, must depend upon its own peculiar circumstances; and when an injury has been sustained, which could not have arisen except from the want of such reasonable information and skill, or the absence of such reasonable skill and diligence, the law holds the attorney liable. In undertaking the client's business he undertakes for the existence and employment of these qualities, and receives the price of them.

Such is the principle of the law of England, and that of Scotland does not vary from it. I think this case clearly within the principle; but I must observe that this is a case in which your Lordships would not be disposed to disturb the judgment of the court below, without a clear case of miscarriage in the court. There is no principle of law in dispute; the only question was as to its application to the facts of the case; that is the degree of information and skill, diligence and care, to be expected from a particular class of professional men in Scotland, a subject upon which the judges of the Court of Session have much better means of information than your Lordships can possess. If there were doubt upon this point in the present case your Lordships would be disposed to give great weight to the opinion of the judges of the Court of Session; but that is not the ground upon which the advice I shall give your Lordships is founded,—being of opinion that there was clearly a want of that reasonable degree of information, skill, care, and diligence which is required to protect professional men from the liability to indemnify their employers against the consequences of any error they may commit.

It is much to be regretted that the appellants did not see their liability, and discharge the obligations they had incurred, when that might have been done at the small expense of the two sums of £25, which the apprentices have received. Great expenses have since been incurred in the court below, which have been necessarily added to the charge upon the appellants, and to which I am compelled to add the respondents' costs of this appeal.

I therefore move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed, with costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutors therein complained of be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellants do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is also further ordered, That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of [616] Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

DEANS and DUNLOP—ARCHIBALD GRAHAM, Solicitors.

[617]      APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

HENRY BROCK and Others, Appellants.*—Knight Bruce—John Stuart; Mrs. MARGARET ISABELLA M'CALLUM or WEBSTER and Others, Respondents.
—Tinney—James Anderson [24th June 1839].

[Commented on in Stiven v. Reynolds and Co., 1891, 18 Rettie, 424, 426, 427.]

Bonâ fide Payment—Consignation—Bankrupt—Stat. 1696, c. 5.—A company having been pressed by a creditor, who threatened legal proceedings, but whose title to discharge the admitted debt the company doubted, remitted the amount to their agents, who, with full authority for that purpose, after depositing the sum in bank, lodged the bank receipt in a process of multiple-poining then commenced, in order to be disposed of as the court should appoint; and an order of court having thereafter been pronounced, appointing the said agents to consign the admitted sum in bank, upon a receipt taken payable to such person as should be preferred by the court, and to lodge the receipt with the clerk to the process; the company was sequestrated before this order of court had been complied with:—Held, in a question betwixt the creditor and the trustee on the debtor's estate, (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session,) 1. that the amount had been effectually consigned, and formed no part of the sequestrated estate of the debtor; 2. that as a bonâ fide consignation, and equivalent to payment of an admitted debt, which the debtor in the ordinary course of business, and under pressure, agreed to consign, such consignation was not struck at by the act 1696, c. 5.

[618] Messrs. Connell, merchants in Glasgow, had for some years acted as the agents in Great Britain of Neil M'Callum, who was resident in Jamaica, and by whom various remittances had been made to them, as his agents, both on his own account and on account of the Cousins Cove estate, which he managed or held as executor of his-deceased brother Alexander M'Callum, who had also been resident in Jamaica.

In making these remittances to the Connells, Neil M'Callum distinguished the funds or produce which he transmitted on his own account from what he sent home as belonging to the Cousins Cove estate, and in communications with the Connells had expressly desired them to keep the one account distinct from the other.

Acting on the special instructions from Neil M'Callum, the several transactions between him and the Connells were by them kept quite distinct in their books, and, according as they related to his own business or were transactions with him as manager of Cousins Cove, were invariably entered in separate accounts.

* Fac. Coll. 14th Nov. 1838; 1 D., B., and M., (new series), p. 1.

The funds which belonged to Neil M'Callum himself, in the hands of the Connells, were fully accounted for to his executor, Mr. Gordon.

Of the funds remitted by Neil M'Callum on account of Cousins Cove, there remained in the hands of the Connells an admitted balance of £2564 8s. 3d., with interest from 2d March 1836, amounting, on 26th November 1836, to £2639 14s. 4d. It is exclusively to this fund that the present question relates.

Neil M'Callum died in the year 1835, while the Connells held the above balance. He appointed Mr. Gordon to be his executor, who expedite confirmation [619] before the commissaries of Edinburgh on 5th September 1836. Mr. Gordon required payment from the Connells of the sums due on their accounts with Neil M'Callum, both as an individual and as the manager of Cousins Cove; and the Connells, while they settled the balance due on their account with Neil personally, declined payment of the balance due on the Cousins Cove account, in respect they were advised that Mr. Gordon, qua executor simply of Neil, had no valid title to uplift and discharge any part of the estate of Alexander M'Callum which was situated in Scotland, and that an effectual discharge could only be granted by a party obtaining confirmation in this country as in right of Alexander.

A good deal of correspondence took place between the agents in Edinburgh of the parties in regard to this objection, and it was ultimately resolved that the question was one which required to be determined by the Court.

Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co., the agents in Edinburgh of the Connells, wrote to Mr. Bertram, the agent for Mr. Gordon, on 17th October 1836, thus: "With regard to the Cousins Cove balance, we understand you are to exhibit to us the proved will of Alexander M'Callum, and satisfy us that the office of executor passed from Neil M'Callum to Mr. Gordon his executor;" and in answer, Mr. Bertram, on 21st October 1836, wrote: "In reference to your communication of 17th instant, I have written to London for the proved will of Mr. Alexander M'Callum, and I have instructed my correspondent to obtain the opinion of Mr. Burge upon the question, as to whether the office of executor under that will passed from Neil M'Callum to Mr. Gordon, his executor;" [620] adding, "In the meantime it occurs to me that Messrs. Connell ought to consign the admitted balance upon Cousins Cove estate." The suggestion in the latter part of this letter was immediately noticed by Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co., thus:—"You state correctly what passed between us as to the mode of clearing away the difficulty regarding Mr. Gordon's title to discharge the Cousins Cove balance. The Messrs. Connell are ready to pay that balance the moment their professional advisers assure them they are safe to do so. In these circumstances, and as the only impediment is an objection to your client's title, which it is in your power to clear up within a few days, your suggestion as to consignment appears to us unusual; but if you insist on it, we shall communicate what you have stated to the Messrs. Connell."

An opinion was obtained, that Mr. Gordon, as the personal representative of Alexander, had in that character a title to those funds recovered by Neil and remitted to Scotland; but, secondly, that Mr. Gordon "would not be the legal representative of Alexander for the purpose of receiving and giving discharges for that part of Alexander's personal estate which was in Scotland, unless Alexander's will is also proved in Scotland." This opinion and other documents were communicated by Mr. Bertram to Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co. on 11th November 1836, and in reference thereto, in his letter of that date, he says:—"I trust that these documents, joined to what you already have in your possession, will remove all obstacle to the payment of the Cousins Cove estate money to Mr. Gordon's attorney."

Messrs. Connell refused to make payment to Mr. [621] Gordon of the balance due by them. In a letter of 19th November 1836, Mr. Bertram stated to Hunter, Campbell, and Co.:—"I must therefore take my own measures for immediately securing the debt, unless your clients will without further delay consign its amount. This I hope they will agree to, since they admit their liability for the debt, and consignment will save me the necessity of resorting to such steps as may be requisite for securing my clients. Upon its being made, I have no objection to discuss the question of title with you, either judicially or by reference." Thereafter, on 24th November 1836, Mr. Bertram writes:—"In your letter of yesterday, refusing to pay the Cousins Cove balance upon the title of Mr. Gordon, as executor of Neil M'Callum, you take no notice of my demand for consignment and of my offer, upon that being made, to discuss the question of title by reference. That demand and offer I now repeat, and in the meantime, to prevent delays, I have sent to Glasgow, for service on Messrs. Connell, the summons in the proper action to force consignment, and to bring all parties interested into the field. As the defenders have consented to dispense with the induciae, the summons will be ready to call next week, and I beg to intimate that upon its first appearance in the rolls, I shall move for consignment of the admitted balance, unless your clients shall previously comply with my demand. It is a very reasonable demand, as I ask them to do no more than to part with money which they admit to be not their own. Their compliance will prevent the necessity of my resorting to unpleasant measures. Of the validity of Mr. Gordon's title [622] I have not yet seen reason to change my opinion." And again, on 25th November 1836, Mr. Bertram writes:—"Your letter received this morning does not take any notice of the demand for consignment extra-judicially, and the offer in that case of a reference upon the question of title, which I made in my letter of 19th instant, and repeated in my letter of yesterday."

Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co., on 26th November 1836, in a letter to Mr. Bertram, stated:—"We beg to inform you that the Messrs. Connell have remitted to us the sum of £2639 14s. 4d., being the amount of the balance on the Cousins Cove account, with interest at four per cent. to yesterday. We have in the meantime lodged that sum in the British Linen Company, on a deposit-receipt in our name, which, as the Messrs. Connell's sole desire is to obtain a sufficient discharge of what they owe, we are ready to dispose of in any way that is consistent with their safety. From this date they shall be accountable only for bank interest on that sum. We have no objection, on your naming the clerk with whom you mean to lodge the multiplepointing, to place the deposit-receipt in his hands, indorsed by us, and with the following marking:—"This receipt contains the admitted balance on the Messrs. Connell's account for Cousins Cove estate, and is lodged with the clerk to be disposed of as the Lord Ordinary may appoint in multiplepointing Connell v. the Representatives of Alexander and Neil M'Callum."

The remittance to Hunter, Campbell, and Co. was entered in Messrs. Connell's cash-book thus:—

[623] "1836, Nov. 25. Cousins Cove Estate.—Remitted through British Linen Company to Hunter, Campbell, and Co., W.S., Edinburgh, to be disposed of by them in payment or consignment of balance due this estate      £2639 14 4"

And this entry in the cash-book was transferred to the ledger, the account of the Cousins Cove estate being debited with the amount thus:—

"1836, Nov. 25. To cash      £2639 14 4"

Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co. deposited the money in bank, taking a receipt for it in their own name in these terms:—

"British Linen Company's Office, Edinburgh, 26th Nov. 1836.

"£2639 14s. 4d.

"Received from Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co., W.S., Edinburgh, two thousand six hundred and thirty-nine pounds, 14s. 4d., which is this day placed to the credit of their deposit-account with the British Linen Company.

(Signed) Alex. Goodsir, Sec."

Mr. Bertram wrote, on the 29th November 1836,—“I am glad to find that the Messrs. Connell have at last done what I long since requested them to do, by consigning the money admitted by them to be due.”

A marking on the back of the deposit-receipt, as adjusted by Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co. and Mr. Bertram, was in these terms:—"This receipt contains the balance admitted by Messrs. Connell to be due on their account current for Cousins Cove estate, and is lodged in process of multiplepointing at their instance against the representatives of Alex. [624]-ander and Neil M'Callum, in order to be disposed of as the Court shall appoint. (Signed) Hunter, Campbell, and Co., W.S."

The deposit-receipt was placed in the hands of the clerk in Court to the process upon 30th November 1836.

Previous to the case appearing in the rolls of Court, Mr. Bertram, on 15th December 1836, intimated that it occurred to him, "that it will be proper to have the contents of the deposit-receipt which you lodged in the clerk's hands consigned judicially upon a receipt taken payable to the party or parties who may be preferred. I shall accordingly make a motion to that effect, upon the case appearing in the roll." Accordingly, when the cause did appear in the rolls, on the motion of Mr. Gordon's counsel, an interlocutor was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary (Corehouse) on the 21st December 1836: "Farther, appoints the pursuers to consign the admitted sum of £2639 14s. 4d., with bank interest thereon since 26th November last, in the bank of the British Linen Company, and that upon a receipt taken payable to such person or persons as shall be preferred thereto by the Lord Ordinary or the Court in the course of this process, and to lodge the same in the hands of the clerk; and for that purpose authorizes their agents, Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co., to get up from the clerk of process the receipts granted to them for the foresaid sum, of the above dates, and lodged in process, in order that they may obtain payment thereof; reserving to the pursuers to state in this process all objections competent to the title to discharge of the [625] party who may be preferred, with all answers to such objections."

Before the agents of Messrs. Connell could act on the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and within three days after its date, the estates of Messrs. Connell were sequestrated, in virtue of the Bankrupt Statute, 54 Geo. 3., c. 137; the money remaining with the British Linen Company, deposited in name of Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co., and the deposit-receipt was left in the hands of the clerk of court.

Henry Brock, accountant in Glasgow, as trustee on the sequestrated estate, craved leave to sist himself "as a party to the action, for the interest of the creditors of the raisers;" and the Lord Ordinary (Corehouse,) pronounced an interlocutor, (3d Feb. 1837,) holding him "sisted, as trustee foresaid, a party to this action, and allows the same to proceed accordingly."

Thereafter, an order was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, Cockburn, (before whom the cause then depended, in place of Lord Corehouse, removed to the Inner House,) appointing Mr. Brock "to give in a condescendence of the fund in medio by Tuesday next, with certification," to which answers were lodged for Mr. Gordon; and on those pleadings, as subsequently revised, the record was closed.

The Lord Ordinary (Cockburn) having heard parties upon the closed record, pronounced the following interlocutor, accompanied with the note thereto annexed, which explains the nature of the pleas of the parties respectively (31st May 1838):—"The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the record, prefers the claim of Henry Brock, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of Arthur and James Connell, to [626] the fund in medio, and decerns: Finds him entitled to expenses, appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged remits to the auditor to tax and report. (Signed) H. COCKBURN."

"Note.—Whatever difficulty there may be in this case, it is much more in the construction to be put upon the facts than in the legal rule.

"The general view of the facts, as the Lord Ordinary sees them, is this:—Messrs. Connell owed £2639 14s. 4d. to the estate of the deceased Alexander M'Callum. Payment of this was demanded by the claimant William Gordon, as his executor. The Connells did not dispute the debt, but they denied Gordon's right to receive, and consequently his power to discharge it. This point is not yet settled. In this situation, Gordon wished the money to be extra-judicially consigned, for this process of multiplepounding had not then been instituted. This proposal gave rise to a correspondence between the agents of these parties, the result of which was, that the Connells sent the money to their own agents in Edinburgh, and made an entry in their books, stating that the sum was to be disposed of by them (their agents) in payment 'or consignment of the balance due to this estate.' There are other entries made in order to square the books, and to account for the cash being no longer in the Connells hands, but nothing which alters the purpose for which they parted with it. The summons in this action being soon afterwards executed, the agents placed the bank receipt for the money in the hands of the clerk to the process, with a marking on its back, bearing:—'This receipt contains the balance admitted by the Messrs. [627] Connell to be due on their account current for Cousins Cove estate, and is lodged in process of multiplepointing at their instance against Alexander and Neil M'Callum, in order to be disposed of as the Court shall appoint.' In about three weeks after this, judicial consignment was ordered by the Lord Ordinary to be made by the Connells, the receipt to be taken, 'payable to such person or persons as shall be preferred by the Lord Ordinary or the Court; and reserving to the pursuers all objections to the title to discharge of the party who may be preferred.' Nothing was done in implement of this order, and three days thereafter the Messrs. Connell were sequestrated. The whole of these proceedings took place within sixty days of their bankruptcy.

"The money is now claimed by the trustee for the creditors, and he is opposed by Gordon, who claims it for the estate of Alexander M'Callum.

"The Lord Ordinary has preferred the trustee, and on one or other of these two grounds,—

"First, he is of opinion that the bankrupts were never divested of the money, and that, it being theirs when they were sequestrated, it belongs to their creditors. The true import of the arrangement, he thinks, was, that Gordon was distrustful of the safety of the money while in the bankrupts hands,—that they were distrustful of his title to receive it, and that in these circumstances it was put into a situation of safety for both, but that the voluntary consignment did not transfer the property, and was not meant to do so.

"The receipt (not the property or the right to it, but the mere receipt) was for a time in the hands of [628] the Connells agents, but for Connells behoof partly, and then went into the hands of the clerk, not as a completed conveyance to Gordon, or to any one, but for the security of the party who should ultimately be found to have right to it. There was no assignation intimated or unintimated; and, supposing that an indorsation would have been effectual, there was no indorsation. If there was a trust created in the persons of the agents or of the clerk, it was a trust, partly for the protection of what was understood to be still the truster's property, though subject to a claim, and rather than interpose a trustee to be a mere holder for that claimant, if it had been intended to complete his right as proprietor, payment would have been made to him at once in the ordinary way. In short, there is nothing here but what occurs in most cases of consignment, where the consignor, instead of being divested, rather marks, by the very act of only consigning, that though he may have quitted the possession, and fettered his power of administration, he has not ceased to have the property. Accordingly, on the one hand, some act remained to be performed by the bankrupts before the transference could be complete. Even the order for judicial consignment, which was given after all the other proceedings on which Gordon founds, was an order on the bankrupts. And, on the other hand, can it be said, that without any such additional act by the bankrupts, Gordon had actually obtained the right? If it had been he who had failed, could his creditors have claimed this money as already their debtors, while the doubt as to his title, on account of which it had been refused to be given him, was still as unsettled as ever? [629] Suppose that there had been no bankruptcy, and that Gordon's title had been found bad, would not the Connells have simply resumed possession of the money as their own? Would they have had to derive a new right to it by a conveyance from Gordon, who the consignment had made the owner, while the validity of his title was under discussion?

"The cases of Gray v. Ross, 16th January 1706, and of Baird, 4th January 1744, though not identical with this one in the circumstances, proceed on the principle that a deposit with a third party, for behoof of the person who should be ascertained to have the best right, did not divest the depositor.

"Second, If there was a completed transference it was in violation of the act 1696.

"The ground taken by Gordon at the debate was, that this was a payment in money, and in the common course of business, of a debt already due.

"The cases of Speir, 30th May 1827, and of Mitchell, 26th June 1834, enter deeply into this matter, and seem to furnish the legal rule. In the first it was found, 'that a payment in cash by a bankrupt, within sixty days from his bankruptcy, to an indorser of a bill accepted by him but not then due, as a provision for the said bill when it became due, is reducible under the act 1696, c. 5, independent of fraud at common law.' The case was decided on the distinction between a payment made in the ordinary way, as the immediate extinction of a debt, and as a mere preparation for paying a debt not yet actually exigible. The second went on exactly the same ground. A person, within sixty days of bankruptcy, sold a house and paid the price [630] into a bank where he had a cash credit. This was done by the hand of one of the cautioners, neither of whom, however, knew that the principal was embarrassed, and for the purpose of relieving them. The sale was found good to the purchaser, and the payment good to the bank; but quoad the cautioners against whom no claim had been yet made, it was decided that they would take no benefit by the transaction. As to them, it was not a proper payment of a present debt.

"Now, there was no present debt constituted here in favour of Gordon. The money was due, but it was not due to him. Accordingly what took place may have been an ordinary business arrangement, but it was not a payment. Hence it did not extinguish the debt. The Connells had got no discharge. If the money had perished in the hands of their agents, or of the bank, or of the process clerk, it would have perished to them. The arrangement amounted in effect as an intention merely to a provision for paying.

"It was argued for Gordon, that a voluntary consignment is not an infringement of the act 1696, and that this common judicial precaution would be useless if it were. It would not be useless; because its only object being to put disputed property into a position of safety, this end would be attained till the responsibility of a trustee made any other case unnecessary. The Lord Ordinary agrees that it is not struck at by the act, but only because it transfers no property. If, however, it does transfer property, then he thinks that the statute reaches it. He knows no authority or principle for giving one creditor a preference over the [631] rest, merely because, instead of making his demand, like them, extra-judicially, he chooses to do it by an action, and because, in that action, an honest defender is willing, for his own credit, or his adversary's comfort, to throw the money into court, reserving his objections to the adversary's title to receive it."

The respondent having presented a reclaiming note to the First Division of the Court of Session against this interlocutor, their Lordships (14th Nov. 1838) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having advised this reclaiming note, and heard counsel for the parties, alter the interlocutor reclaimed against, and find that the sum of £2639 14s. 4d. sterling, in dispute, contained in the deposit-receipt, No. 4 of process, forms no part of the sequestrated estate of the raisers of this process, and is not claimable by the trustee upon that estate in competition with the party in right of the deceased Neil M'Callum or Alexander M'Callum, and repel the claim and pleas maintained by the said trustee: Find that the said sum, as the fund or part of the fund in medio in this process, belongs to such of the defenders or others as shall be preferred thereto in the competition; and with these findings, remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed farther in the cause: Find the compeerer, Henry Brock, the trustee on the said estate, liable in expenses; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same, when lodged, to the auditor, to be taxed."

The trustee, having petitioned the Court to grant authority to present an appeal against this interlocutory judgment, leave was granted in December 1838.

[632] At this stage Mr. Gordon died. The respondent, Mrs. Margaret Isabella M'Callum or Webster, who is the only child of Alexander M'Callum, as well as the residuary legatee of her uncle, Neil M'Callum, obtained a decree-dative as executrix-dative qua residuary legatee of the said Neil M'Callum, ad omnia et quoad non executi, and thereupon she and her husband, for his interest, lodged, 19th January 1839, in process, a minute craving that they should be sisted as claimants in room of Mr. Gordon. An interlocutor was accordingly pronounced to that effect.

Connells trustee appealed.

Appellants.—The interlocutor appealed from was objectionable, while on both grounds the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was well founded in the legal conclusions deducible from the facts of the case. (1.) The question whether there was a complete transfer of the fund, so as to be beyond the reach of Messrs. Connell or the trustee, would depend not merely on the terms of the correspondence, but on the views which the parties took of that correspondence at the time. Now Bertram's own misgivings on the subject showed that he did not act as if the money was safely consigned in court beyond the power of the consignors or the diligence of their creditors. His letter of the 15th December 1836 admits distinctly that there was no consignment at that date, and that the money was not then taken out of the order and disposition of the Connells. If the Connells were divested of the fund by the mere remittance to their own agents in Edinburgh, in whom was the fund vested? Not in the hands of the respondent,—not even [633] in manibus of the court, like a consigned fund awaiting the order of the judge. If the money had been lost on whom would the loss have fallen? Not on the respondent, who had no control over the fund, and who had not even got consignment. There was no transfer of the money; indeed Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co. had no authority to transfer the money. [Lord Chancellor.—It is nowhere made part of the appellants' case that Hunter, Campbell, and Co. had no authority.] It was beyond their authority; and the point is now open under the third plea in law in these words: "There is no ground, in the circumstances of the case, for maintaining that the bankrupts were divested of their right to the sum contained in the deposit-receipt," etc. And on the facts, the legal title would be held, either in Scotch or English law, to be in the Connells. [Lord Chancellor.—But look at Hunter, Campbell, and Co.'s letter of the 26th November 1836.] The money was intercepted however before consignment, by the sequestration of the parties ordered to make consignment, for at the date of the sequestration there had been merely an order to consign; so that there was no consignment, either judicial or extra-judicial. Gray v. Lord Ross, 16th January 1706 (Mor. 7724); Baird v. Murray, 4th January 1744 (Mor. 7738).

(2.) Supposing that there was a transference of the fund, so as to prevent its acquisition by the appellant for behoof of the general creditors in the same direct manner as if it had been still in bonis of the bankrupts at the date of the sequestration, the transaction by which such transference was effected was reducible under the act 1696, c. 5. On the eve of bankruptcy [634] no act can be done so as to alter the condition of the creditors, who as a body are supposed to be in right of the fund from the time of constructive bankruptcy (2 Bell, Com. 205-208). By the act 1696, c. 5, all voluntary deeds, by which, directly or indirectly, the bankrupt gives over his effects to one creditor preferably to others, within sixty days before his bankruptcy, whether in satisfaction of his debt or merely in farther security, are declared null and void; and according to the construction adopted by the Court the deeds struck at are not those merely for the completion of which written conveyances are necessary, but all acts whatsoever subject to the known exception of payments in cash in the ordinary course of business, although no writing had intervened or been necessary. (See the cases cited in 2 Bell, 211; Forbes, 27th January 1715, Mor. 1124, 2 Bell, 212; M Math v. M'Kellar's Trustees, 1st March 1791, Bell's Cases, 22; President Campbell's opinion, p. 39; Moncreiff v. Cockburn's Creditors, 8th February 1694, 1 Fount., 596.) Regard ought specially to be had to the two recent cases noticed by the Lord Ordinary, Speir v. Dunlop, 30th May 1827 (4 S. and D. 92, and 5 S. and D. 680), remitted back by the House of Lords (2 Wils. and Shaw, 253) for reconsideration where the Court (Fac. Coll. 30th May 1827, p. 516) reduced the transaction as falling within the act 1696, the doctrine established being that if an ultroneous payment be made as a security against a debt to become due at a subsequent period, the transaction was reducible, and the case of Mitchell v. Rodger, 26th June 1834 (12 S. and D. 802), where the decision in Speir v. Dunlop was recognized. Now, in the present case, there had been nothing done by the bankrupts beyond a deposit-[635]-tation in the hands of a third party to provide for payment of a debt in their estimation not yet exigible by the creditor, and there merely had followed a change in the mere depositary of the bank receipt. But there had been no consignment by judicial authority, but merely extra-judicial consignment, and not compulsory, and therefore the transaction was within the statute. The respondents could not show that there had been any pressure on the Connells for payment; there had been therefore no staying-off of pressure. Nothing had been got by hastening the action, as Messrs. Connell merely remitted the money to their agents from propriety and delicacy towards all parties.

Respondents.—There were two questions: 1. Whether the fund was subject to the order and disposition of the Connells at the date of the bankruptcy; and, 2. Supposing it was not so whether the payment was struck at by the act 1696, c. 5. The facts as to the situation of parties are not disputed. There had been no refusal to pay on the ground that the money was not due; but merely a delay caused from doubts raised as to the necessity of confirmation by Neil M'Callum's executor in Scotland; a ground taken, it might be remarked, more than sixty days before the bankruptcy. On that point, it might be observed in passing, there was no necessity for such confirmation as the case of Frith v. Buchanan, Hamilton, and Co. (15 D., B., and M., 729), in reference to the statute 4 Geo. 4, c. 98, vesting moveable estate in the next of kin, ipso jure, without confirmation, established. But the multiplepounding was necessary, in order to [636] effect a judicial discharge for the party; and the money was remitted to await the decree in that action. It had been said that Hunter, Campbell, and Co. exceeded their powers, and therefore that the money must still be held as not having passed from the Connells; but that point was not raised, as a Noble Lord had remarked, and the third plea did not embrace it. Besides, this new plea was excluded, for it had been assumed by the appellants throughout their case that Hunter, Campbell, and Co. did act with authority; and in any view the authority to pay or consign was clear from the correspondence,—the money having been sent to Edinburgh in answer to a demand of consignment. Then, as to the effect of the receipt by the clerk of the Court;—there was no Accountant General in Scotland; and when money was paid in to await the decree of the Court, the practice was, if there was unwillingness, to take an order of Court on the party to consign, or if there was desire on one part and willingness on the other, then voluntary consignment was equivalent, and so say the Lords Gillies and Corehouse (1 D., B., and M., new series, p. 6). Holding this to have been judicial consignment,—and the appellants admit that the transfer was complete,—if there was judicial consignment, which there certainly was, (there having been consignment by consent, the clearest proof of the fact,) the asking of the order for consignment was a mere additional precaution,—a change in the depository, and dispensing with Hunter, Campbell, and Co. as the interposed party, and merely matter of arrangement. It was to be observed, that the interlocutor ordering consignment of the receipt was by [637] Lord Corehouse, (who held in the Inner House that there was judicial consignment of the fund,) and not by Lord Cockburn, who held an opposite opinion.

In Scotland risk was no criterion of property. Property is not transferred, though it may be at the risk of the buyer. So property sold remains at the risk of the buyer, but is not his till delivery (Gordon, 4 Bro. Supp.; Robertson v. Creditors of Mathieson, 1st Feb. 1738, Mor. 3077). A sounder criterion of risk is, whether the creditors could have arrested. The Connells could not; neither would an arrestment by their creditors have been effectual (Gordon v. Hughes and Dunbar, 11th June 1824, 2 Sh. App. 310; Sourer v. Smith, Mor. 744; Stalker, Mor. 745). The trustee had no better right to the fund than either the Connells or their creditors; so that upon either criterion the ground taken was untenable.

(2.) The transaction was not reducible under the act 1696, c. 5. The best answer to the remark, that the judges below had not heard this point, was the fact that the report bears that counsel for the trustee of the Connells were heard on both points. 1, This had not been a voluntary act; 2, payment had been demanded before the sixty days; 3, the interlocutor, finding the holder of the fund liable in once and single payment, discharged the Connells; and, 4, the obligation existed before the decree; so that is not a voluntary act which a party is compellable to do in performance of a legal obligation. But whether it was voluntary or not it was the payment of a debt. Payments in cash are not struck at by the act, and consignment is defined by Erskine (B. iii. tit. 4, s. 5) as in the judgment of law equivalent to [638] payment. Again, whatever the transaction be called, whether payment or otherwise, it was a payment in the ordinary course of business, and so not struck at (Dundas, 2d June 1808, F. C.). The appellant had rejected the ground on which the Lord Ordinary put the case, which was, that though there was consignment there had not been payment. It was now said, there had neither been consignment nor payment; but merely security till consignment was forced. [Knight Bruce.—Yes.] But then the Court, disagreeing with the Lord Ordinary, held that there had been consignment; and so the Lord Ordinary's view that the fund was in medio failed.

Lord Chancellor.—In this case the first division of the Court of Session, by an unanimous judgment, differed from the Lord Ordinary, and altered his interlocutor. From respect for the opinion of the Lord Ordinary I thought it right to examine carefully all the circumstances of the case and all the authorities referred to. Although

I did not upon the argument at the bar entertain any doubt of the correctness of the judgment of the Court, this investigation has only confirmed that opinion.

Messrs. Connell of Glasgow had been employed by Neil M'Callum, in the course of which employment a large sum became due from them to him, which was paid to William Gordon his executor, and is not now in question. But he having directed them to keep separate accounts of the transactions respecting a West India property called Cousins Cove estate, to which it is said that Alexander M'Callum, to whom Neil was [639] executor, had been entitled as mortgagee, they (Messrs. Connell) questioned the authority of Mr. Gordon, as executor of Neil M'Callum, to demand payment of the balance of that account, contending that they could not safely pay to a personal representative of Alexander; and on this the doubt arose, although, as all their dealings had been with Neil M'Callum, it is difficult to understand the ground; but it is not necessary to consider that question. Mr. Gordon demanded payment; Messrs. Connell admitted the debt; but, having raised this objection, Mr. Bertram, Mr. Gordon's agent, in his letter of the 21st October 1836, after informing them that he had written to London on the subject, observes that it occurred to him that Messrs. Connell ought in the meantime to consign the admitted balance upon the Cousins Cove estate. On the 19th November Mr. Bertram again writes that measures will be immediately taken for recovering the debt unless Messrs. Connell consign the amount. On the 21st November Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co., the agents of Messrs. Connell, request Mr. Bertram to pause before taking the steps pointed out; and on the 23d they decline to pay Mr. Gordon, and warn him against any steps of diligence. On the 24th Mr. Bertram informed the agents that he had given directions to commence the proper action to enforce consignment, and that he should proceed unless they complied with his demand of consignment; and on the 25th renewed his demand for consignment extra-judicially. On the 26th Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co. informed Mr. Bertram that Messrs. Connell had remitted the balance to them, and that they had lodged it in the British Linen Company's bank, on a deposit-receipt, in their own names, and that [640] they were ready to dispose of it in any way consistent with the safety of Messrs. Connell, and that they had no objection to place the deposit-receipt in the hands of the clerk to be named in the action of multiplepoinding, with a marking that it would be disposed of as the Lord Ordinary should appoint, and giving notice that bank interest only would be paid from that time.

On the 29th November Mr. Bertram, in answer to that proposal, said that he was glad that Messrs. Connell had at last done what he had so long requested them to do, by consigning the money. The money was placed by the British Linen Company to the credit of Hunter, Campbell, and Co., and a receipt given in their name, which they, according to their undertaking, deposited with the clerk in the action, with this indorsement: "This receipt contains the balance admitted by Messrs. Connell to be due on their account current for Cousins Cove estate, and is lodged in the process of multiplepoinding at their instance against the representatives of Alexander and Neil M'Callum, in order to be disposed of as the court shall appoint."

On the 15th December Mr. Bertram proposed that the contents of the deposit-receipt lodged in the clerk's hands should be consigned judicially upon a receipt taken payable to the parties who might be preferred, and stating that he should make a motion to that effect; and accordingly, on the 21st December, an interlocutor was pronounced appointing the pursuers to consign the admitted balance, with bank interest from the time of the deposit, and that upon a receipt taken payable to such person or persons as should be preferred by the court in the course of the process, and to lodge the [641] same in the hands of the clerk; and for that purpose the Lord Ordinary authorized the agents, Messrs. Hunter, Campbell, and Co., to get up from the clerk to the process the receipt granted to them, and lodged in process, in order that they might change the deposit, reserving to the pursuers to state all objections to the title of Gordon to discharge.

Three days after this, that is on 24th December, the estates of Messrs. Connell were sequestrated. The Lord Ordinary thought that the trustee on their estate was entitled to this sum; but the Inner House were of opinion that it formed no part of the sequestrated estate.

Some question was raised at the bar as to the authority of Hunter, Campbell, and Co. so to deal with this fund, but I find no ground for any such question. In the appellants' case it is stated that Messrs. Connell entered this remittance in their books in these words:—"25th Nov. Cousins Cove estate. Remitted the British Linen Company to Hunter and Co., to be disposed of by them in payment or consignment of balance due to this estate;" and it is stated that Hunter, Campbell, and Co. were to dispose of the sum in payment or consignment of the balance when they were satisfied that it could be disposed of in a way consistent with the perfect safety of their clients. What Hunter, Campbell, and Co. did was clearly within this authority. The question therefore is, whether by the law of Scotland in a case in which a debtor pressed by one claiming as his creditor, and threatened with legal proceedings, but questioning the title of the claimant to give a discharge for the admitted debt, agrees to consign the amount and actually remits it to his agents, who, with [642] full authority for that purpose, agree with the creditors to pay the amount to whomsoever the court in a suit then commenced shall find it due, and against which agents, before sequestration, an order of court is made directing them to pay to whomsoever the court should find it due, the sum so remitted shall upon a subsequent sequestration against the debtor be held to be part of his estate. The debtors pay the money to their own agents it is true, but with authority to pay or consign in satisfaction or security for the debt in any manner they may think safe. They accordingly do extra-judicially consign it in security of the debt; and before sequestration of the debtor the agents are judicially ordered to part with all control over it by giving the control to the officer of court to abide the adjudication between the parties claiming, in which adjudication the Connells had no interest.

The facts of the case exclude all suspicion of fraud or undue preference. To bring a case within the act 1696 there must be a voluntary payment. The case of Speir v. Dunlop (5 S. and D. 680) was relied upon by the appellant, but in that case there was no demand, no pressure, and security was given for a debt not due. As to the case of Mitchell v. Rodger (12 S., D., and B., 802), it was a case of fraudulent preference in a failing debtor in favour of a friend, who had become surety for him. Neither of these transactions were in the ordinary course of business, whereas the transaction in question is admitted to have been so. There was pressure by the creditor, and a consignment made upon his proposal, and after it was made he accepts it as a consignment, and deals with the party to [643] whom it was made, after which it would I apprehend have been impossible for him to raise any question as to the consignment being payment, so far as the debtor was concerned; but beyond this, the party to whom the consignment is made, with the full authority of the debtor, enters fresh into a personal obligation to pay to whomsoever might be found entitled, and afterwards submits, and is subjected to a judicial order, to part with all control over the money, for the purpose of placing it under the exclusive control of the Court.

I have not particularly adverted to the position of the money having been, at the time of the arrangement made, in the hands of the British Linen Company under this receipt, because I consider it as put into the hands of Hunter, Campbell, and Co., who, in fact, had the control over it; which is the most favourable view of the case for the appellants. If their instructions had been to pay and not to consign, no question could have arisen; and why is not consignment to be equally protected as payment? The authorities (Ersk. b. 4, tit. 3, sect. 5) in the law of Scotland clearly show that consignment is held equivalent to payment. There is a total absence of all evidence of fraud or undue preference;—so that the only just conclusion to be arrived at is, that this was a payment admitted to be in the ordinary course of business, and in the only mode in which payment could be made when doubts existed as to the legal title of the claimant to recover payment of an admitted debt. If this judgment be not according to the law of Scotland, then, although a debtor may pay a debt within the sixty days, he cannot under any circumstances make consignment to secure [644] it, however pressed by his creditors, and however impossible it may be to make actual payment with safety to himself.

I have no doubt as to the propriety of advising your Lordships to affirm the interlocutory judgment appealed from, with costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutors therein complained of be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellants do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is also further ordered, That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

[645] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

(Ex parte.)

JAMES CHARLES MACRAE, Appellant.*—Sir W. Follett—Sandford; MARIA LE MAISTRE MACRAE or HYNDMAN, and Husband, Respondent [27th June 1839].

[Mews' Dig. iv. 1135; x. 267. S.C. sub nom. Macrae v. Hyndman, 6 Cl. and F. 212, q.v.; 3 Jur. 571.]

Outlawry—Entail—Trust.—A party executed a disposition of his heritable property ex facie absolute, but which the disponees afterwards declared by a separate deed was held in trust for the grantor, his heirs and disponees. He was afterwards cited to appear before the Court of Justiciary for murder alleged to have been committed previous to the date of said disposition; and, on his not appearing, sentence of fugitation passed, and denunciation followed thereon, which was recorded. Some years afterwards, when still unrelaxed, he executed a deed, directing his said trustees to execute a strict entail of his property in favour of certain parties, which was accordingly done, and after his death recorded by the trustees. In a challenge of the entail by the heir at law,—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that the entail, and subsequent registration thereof, were valid and effectual, in respect that a sentence of outlawry does not deprive a party of the right of absolute disposal of the fee of his property.

The late James Macrae, esq., of Holmains, was, on 26th May 1790, cited edictally, on criminal letters raised against him at the instance of his Majesty's [646] advocate, for his Majesty's interest, to appear before the High Court of Justiciary of Scotland on the 26th July then next, to answer for the murder of Sir George Ramsay of Bamff, bart., whom he had shot in a duel upon the 13th of April 1790, and who died in consequence on the 16th of the same month. The will of the criminal letters commanded the messenger to charge the party complained of to come and find caution, "under pain of rebellion and putting him to the horn;" and on his failing to do so, "to denounce him our rebel, and put him to the horn, escheat and inbruing all his moveable goods and gear to our use for his contempt and disobedience." Having failed to appear, the usual sentence of fugitation was pronounced against him on the 26th of July 1790. The sentence was in these terms:—"The Lords Commissioners of Justiciary decern and adjudge the said James Macrae to be an outlaw and fugitive from his Majesty's laws, and ordain him to be put to his Majesty's horn, and all his moveable goods and gear to be escheat and inbrought to his Majesty's use, for his contempt and disobedience in not appearing the day and place, in the hour of cause, to have underlied the law for the crime of murder," etc.

On the day following that on which the aforesaid sentence was pronounced, letters of denunciation were raised against Mr. Macrae. These letters, which bore the signet of the High Court of Justiciary, commanded the messenger to denounce him, rebel, etc., "for his being an outlaw and fugitive from our laws for the crime aforesaid." These letters were put in execution on the 28th and registered on the 29th of July 1790.

Previously to the citation on the criminal letters, that [647] is to say, on the 8th May 1790, Mr. Macrae had executed an absolute conveyance of his estate of Holmains in favour of Lord Glencairn and Mr. Alexander Young and the survivor of them, and their heirs and assignees, heritably and irredeemably, with an assignation to the rents falling due from and after Whitsunday 1789. Upon the precept contained in the above conveyance base infetment was taken on 15th May 1790, in favour of the disponees, and duly recorded. After the death of Lord Glencairn, Mr. Young, the survivor, executed on 10th April 1793 an absolute conveyance of the same estate in favour of Messrs. Duncombe, Pettwood, and Le Maistre, and the survivors or survivor of them and their assignees. The last-named gentlemen executed in the same year, 1793, a deed of declaration of trust whereby they declared that the said estate was vested in them "in trust only for the use and behoof of the said James Macrae, his heirs and disponees, and for the proper support and maintenance of his family, but in no shape for our own use and benefit or the use and behoof of any of us," etc. "And further, we hereby bind and oblige ourselves to denude of this trust whenever so required by the said James Macrae, esq., and his heirs or disponees, and to dispose and reconvey the said lands, and to the said James Macrae himself, or any other person or persons having right from him to the same." After this trust Mr. Macrae executed several settlements in favour of his son and daughter, which, however, he afterwards revoked (6th May 1807) by a deed or mandate to his trustees, whereby he authorized them to make and execute a strict entail of the estate of Holmains in favour of his son James Charles Macrae (the appellant) and the heirs [648] whomsoever of his body, whom failing, to his only daughter Mrs. Hyndman (the respondent), with other substitutions, and binding himself and his heirs to warrant such deed of entail in the most ample manner. The same deed also contained a nomination of the trustees and one Mr. Jack as tutors and curators to his children failing their mother.

These trustees accordingly, on 7th and 10th March 1809, executed a deed of strict entail of the said estate, in favour of the appellant and the other heirs therein named. An annuity was reserved for Mr. Macrae during his life, and a provision of £5000 which he left to the respondent, and declared to be a real burden affecting the entailed lands. The entail contained a revocation of the previous dispositions; it being declared however, that the same became effectual if the entail should be found ineffectual. On 13th May 1809 infetment on this entail was taken in favour of the appellant.

Mr. Macrae died unrelaxed on 16th January 1820, leaving his son, the appellant, then at the age of twenty-nine years, and the respondent, Mrs. Hyndman, his only daughter, who was born in 1800, then still a minor.

In May 1820 the trustees petitioned the Court for authority to record the entail, which was accordingly done. On his father's death the appellant entered into possession of the estate, which he held for some years, under the entail; but in June 1831 he raised an action of reduction, concluding for reduction of the entail and of the previous deeds as the deeds and warrant on which it proceeded.

Mrs. Hyndman the respondent resisted the reduction.

The pleas maintained by the parties respectively upon [649] the validity of the deed of entail were (as stated on the record) in these terms:—

1. The late Mr. Macrae having been outlawed by sentence of the Court of Justiciary, and this sentence of outlawry and fugitation having been followed up by letters of denunciation at the instance of both the public and private prosecutors, and these letters having been duly executed and recorded, he became civilius mortuus, and lost the benefit of the law of the country, to which he was declared a fugitive and a rebel. 2. An outlaw, in the circumstances stated, having lost and forfeited his legal person, can do no act, directly nor indirectly, by which the right of his heirs in his heritable property can be injured or affected; and he can grant no mandate to a third party to execute or subscribe any deed which he had not the legal power of executing himself. 3. The criminal proceedings against the late Mr. Macrae, on account of the murder of Sir George Ramsay of Bamff, deprived him of all right in and to his heritable estate in Scotland; and the different deeds executed by him were invalid, to the effect of depriving his heirs of the right which had opened to them so long as the sentence of outlawry was unrecalled. 4. The trust deed executed in favour of Lord Glencairn and Mr. Young, being executed subsequent to the crime of which the late Mr. Macrae was accused, and in consequence of which he was declared an outlaw and a fugitive, could not have the effect of preserving to him a right to the estate of Holmains, or of validating the deeds subsequently executed by his directions with regard to the fee of that estate. 5. Where a property is disposed in trust for the benefit of an individual and his heirs, the trustees are merely the representatives of those individuals as their separate rights emerge. 6. The plea of homologation does not apply to this deed of entail now under reduction, in the circumstances of the case (Stat. 1592, c. 109, 128; Ersk. b. ii. tit. 5. s. 57; Stair, b. iv. tit. 47, s. 10, 11; 2 Bank. 257, vol. iii. p. 100; 4 Blackst. Com. 319; Coutts v. Durie, 30th Nov. 1791, Mor. 4775; Davidson v. Kidd, 20th Dec. 1797; Birrell v. Birrell, 14th Dec. 1825, Fac. Coll.; Angus v. Angus, 6th Dec. 1825, Fac. Coll.; Dick v. Gillies, 4th July 1828, Fac. Coll.; Gardner v. Gardner, 3d Dec. 1830, Fac. Coll.; and Colquhoun v. Colquhoun, 16th Dec. 1828, Fac. Coll., and cases therein cited).

1. The deed of entail under reduction is ex facie a formal and effectual entail. 2. The sentence of outlawry against Mr. Macrae did not in any way affect his right to the fee of the estate. It merely operated as a forfeiture of his moveables, and of his liferent interest in his heritable estate. Besides, Mr. Macrae having, before he was cited on the criminal letters, conveyed his estate to Lord Glencairn and Mr. Young, and having been feudally divested of the fee prior to the outlawry, it would not have been competent at any rate to object to the subsequent deeds which are under reduction, on the ground that they are struck at by the outlawry. 3. The entail has been homologated by the pursuer.—Mackenzie, 4th December 1767 (Dict. 5665). 4. It is jus tertii to the pursuer to found upon the supposed infringement of the rights of the Crown.

The Lord Ordinary (9th March 1833) ordered cases; and thereafter (19th Nov. 1833) his Lordship, upon advising the cases, made avizandum to the court, adding the following note:—"It would be proper to report this case to the court, on account of its peculiarity and admitted novelty. But the Lord Ordinary, though he has carefully considered the argument, [651] both in a very full hearing and in the revised cases, thinks it proper to report the cause without at present expressing any opinion; because it will be seen that he was the counsel who was privately consulted by the pursuer in 1820, and that something in the argument turns on the nature and effect of that consultation. The only observation he has to make is, that, when it is ascertained that the sentence of the Justiciary was followed by denunciation of the deceased as an outlaw, duly recorded, if the case of the defenders were to depend entirely on the proposition in law anxiously and confidently maintained by them in this case, that such an outlaw is under no other or different disability for the performance of legal acts, than that which attaches to a person denounced on letters of horning for a civil debt, he should think that it involved a question of very great importance. He is not at present prepared to assent to the doctrine. But the case may not, and probably does not, depend on that point.

"(Signed) J. W. M."

The First Division of the Court, upon advising the cause, intimated an opinion that in the special circumstances no homologation of the entail had taken place; but in regard to the effect of the sentence of outlawry and the recorded denunciation, their Lordships differed equally in opinion, and a hearing in their Lordships' presence was ordered.

Before the cause was disposed of, a supplementary reduction was raised, in order to set aside the registration of the entail and the order on which it proceeded. The record in that action was laid before the court along with the original cause, but the actions were not conjoined.

[652] The Lords of the First Division (4th February 1834) having resumed consideration of the cause, ordered supplementary cases, which were advised on 9th July 1834, at which time Lord Mackenzie had become a judge of that division in room of Lord Craigie deceased. Their Lordships being then again equally divided, the cause was appointed to be argued by one counsel of a side, after which the whole pleadings were laid before the other judges, under one interlocutor, in these terms: "Remit to the Lords of the Second Division and permanent Lords Ordinary, and request their Lordships' opinions, either severally or collectively, on the question, Whether the deed of entail executed by Mr. Duncombe and others by mandate of 6th May 1807 from the late Mr. Macrae, then under sentence of outlawry and fugitation by the High Court of Justiciary, for failing to appear to answer to an indictment for murder, be liable to reduction at the instance of his son, the pursuer, his heir at law?"

Written opinions by the other judges having been returned,* the cause was finally advised (22d November 1836) by the Lords of the First Division, who, in both actions, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the defences, assoilzie the defenders from the whole conclusions of the libel, and decern, and find no expenses due to either party?"

The pursuer appealed.

The cause was heard ex parte, no case having been lodged for the defenders.

[653] Appellant.—In the original action.—The ground taken by the Court below, that sentence of outlawry did not affect the civil rights of a party to a greater extent, denunciation following, than diligence of horning for not paying a debt, was ill founded. 1. Outlawry for crimes existed prior to denunciation or horning; 2. Denunciation, as introduced by statute, was limited in its effects to the penalties of escheat, and no severe personal disabilities followed; and, 3. The effects of outlawry for crime continued the same as they had always been, while the effects of civil rebellion were at an end. Outlawry, when considered in reference to its origin and consequences, and the authority from which it emanated, clearly avoided the freedom of the outlaw;—an immediate and complete loss of all personal rights and privileges of the law followed. The outlaw amittit legem terrae, and could not hold land, nor sue or defend in a civil or criminal action, nor give evidence, or act as a juryman (Reg. Maj., c. 12; Quon. Attach., c. 18; Balfour's Prac. 515; 1 M'Kenzie, 177; 1567, c. 33; Lowthian's Forms, p. 144; 2 Hume, Cr. 262, 2d edit., and p. 280, 3d edit.; Stair, b. ii. tit. 4. s. 61., b. iv. tit. 47. s. 10., and b. iii. tit. 3. s. 26; Instit., lib. i. tit. 1. s. 20; Stair, b. iv. tit. 9. s. 1; Balfour, 483; M'Ken. Observ., p. 131, Dirleton v. Rebellion; Ersk. b. ii. tit. 5. s. 66; Bank. ii. 427; Alison's Prac. of Crim. Law, 350). These consequences affect his right to make an entail; for the statute 1685, c. 22, specially declares, that it shall be lawful to his Majesty's "subjects" to tailzie their lands, etc., thus bestowing a special and statutory power to execute a peculiar species of conveyance. The outlaw could not have enforced the obligations in the trust deed. The title on this entail had hitherto been on the precept in the disposition by the trustees. But suppose the title had been to be completed by resignation, could the Crown have been required to grant a charter upon [654] the resignation of the outlaw or his attorney. It had been urged below that the fee of the estate still remained subject to be disposed of by the outlaw; but the authorities show that the fee recognised into the hands of the superior was only reclaimable by the heir upon the outlaw's death. The term "life-rent escheat" is only meant to show that the property remained with the superior merely during the lifetime of the party outlawed. Another argument of the defendant had been that a party outlawed by a sentence of the Criminal Court was not to be considered in a worse situation than a civil debtor under the horn, some of whose deeds were sustained; the answer to which was, that the status of a criminal deprived him of all personal rights and privileges (stat. 1685, c. 22; Elch. Notes on Stair, p. 194; stat. 1612, c. 3.; 2 M'Ken. Works, 225; Ersk. b. ii. tit. 3. c. 16.; Craig, lib. ii. dig. 18. s. 31.; Balfour v. Brieves, p. 429. c. 48).

On the supplementary action, the mandate granted by Mr. Macrae, an outlaw, to make a deed of entail could give no authority to the parties in whose favour it was granted, his nominal trustees, to apply to the Court of Session for the recording of the deed of entail. The outlaw had no right to appear in the Court of Session himself, and could grant no mandate to a third party to appear for him. Besides, the mandate fell by the death of the granter, and so far as it derived efficacy from the granter, it fell by his death. The trust disposition was likewise at an end by the death of Mr. Macrae, and consequently the trustees had no right after his death to appear as such. The trustees were not authorized to apply to the Court by the heirs of entail for the registration of the deed, and having no interest under it, they [655] had no right to apply by petition to the Court of Session for its registration. The question upon this point had been fully discussed in the other case between the appellant and respondent, and he therefore begged leave to refer to that argument.

Lord Chancellor.—This case, which was heard ex parte, is one of great importance to the parties, and it raises a new question in the law of Scotland. The circumstance that it was only argued on one side, makes it the duty of the House to be very explicit and careful as to the course which your Lordships should pursue. Your Lordships have no information how it happens that the judgment of the Court below, in which fourteen judges (including Lord Craigie, who died before the final decree) of the Court of Session concurred, is not supported by the party in whose favour that judgment was pronounced. But there are interests to be protected, not confined to those who are the parties to this proceeding, but the interests of parties not yet in being, who may become entitled under the entail now in question. Care is also requisite not to lay down any rule of law which may operate upon other interests in other cases, by giving effect to that which is contended by the appellant to be the rule of law in Scotland in respect to the question here raised.

The facts, in so far as necessary to make my observations intelligible, are shortly these: In July 1790 a party, then fee-simple proprietor of an estate, being charged with the crime of murder, and not appearing, underwent a sentence of fugitation, and was put, according to the expression of the law of Scotland, to the horn, by which he incurred certain penalties, and was denounced [656] as an outlaw and fugitive. Previously, however, to the proceedings which gave rise to that process, and on the 8th of May of the same year, he had executed a disposition of his estate, of which he was absolute owner in fee, to certain persons in trust. He did not at that time execute any declaration of trust, but he parted with his legal title to the estate previous to the time when he incurred the disability arising from the sentence of fugitation by being put to the horn.

In the year 1793, after the criminal sentence of outlawry had been enforced, the trustees executed a declaration of trust, by which they declared that the property had been conveyed to them upon trust, to abide the disposition of the author of the deed of May 1790. At a subsequent period, under a mandate of the original owner of the estate, then labouring under such incapacity as was the consequence of the proceedings taken against him, an entail was executed, under which the defenders, as substitute heirs, claimed. The heir of entail, the eldest son, (the father, maker of the entail, being now dead,) claims the estate unfettered by such entail, in respect of his father's alleged incapacity at the time to exercise such an act of proprietorship.

When the cause was argued in the court below it was thought to involve principles of such importance and novelty that the whole judges gave their opinions upon the case. Thirteen judges gave a final opinion; but there was also Lord Craigie, who had been a judge in the earlier steps of the cause, but who had died before the final decision; and they all concurred, but not for the same reasons, that the pursuer had no title to the relief he prayed for.

Now it is to be observed, that, prior to any process taking place from which the incapacity of the maker of [657] this entail is to be inferred, he had parted with the legal right to the fee of the estate. It is also clear, from the very terms that are used, and from all the authorities cited, that the effect of what did take place was a forfeiture of all his goods and moveables; and, in addition to this, there is, undoubtedly, not properly a forfeiture, but an escheat of the life estate;—the life-rent escheat, as it is called, not going to the Crown as a forfeiture, but going to the superior of the fee, on strictly feudal grounds:—the party fugitate or outlawed being incapable to render the services of a vassal, the overlord is considered entitled to adopt some other person in the outlaw's place during the life of the outlaw.

So far there is no dispute as to the rule of law in Scotland. The appellant, however, contends that beyond this there is a forfeiture of the fee itself, and hence that his father had actually, by force of the sentence, been divested of his fee; and of course, if he had been divested of his fee, and of all interest therein, then he could not have done that which was the apparent effect of the deed which he executed. After looking into all the authorities cited in the printed papers, and at the bar, in support of the proposition that the effect of these proceedings was a forfeiture of the fee, it appears to me that there is no doubt whatever, that that proposition cannot be maintained. All the authorities cited prove that a life-rent escheat only takes place, and that the fee remains in the outlaw. In this proposition all the judges concur; and there are several admitted incidents to this state of the property in Scotland, which show that that of necessity must be the effect of the operation of the outlawry, [658] and that it does leave the fee in the outlaw. After the death of the outlaw it is admitted that the heir may proceed to complete his title by service to the outlaw. It is also admitted, on the part of the appellant, and cases referred to do establish, that after this life-rent escheat has taken place, which according to the doctrine of the appellant would divest the outlaw of the fee, if that outlaw, being an outlaw only by process of fugitation, afterwards commits treason, he forfeits the fee; that is to say, he forfeits what was left in him notwithstanding the life-rent escheat. If by prior proceedings the fee had gone out of him, there would be no possibility of a subsequent conviction of treason operating as a forfeiture of the fee. But it is not in dispute that that is the effect of a conviction for treason subsequently to the taking effect of the life-rent escheat.

It is also an admitted proposition, supported also by authority, that notwithstanding the life-rent escheat the outlaw is competent to give effect to onerous burdens upon his estate. It is also assumed that the estate remains in him, otherwise, if the estate had gone out of him, whatever might have been the right of the creditors, he the outlaw would not have had it in his power to give effect to any interests that might have operation against the fee itself.

I apprehend therefore, that your Lordships can entertain no doubt as to the correctness of the unanimous opinion of the fourteen judges, that notwithstanding the outlawry and the life-rent escheat, the fee remains in the outlaw.

But then, it was said, that although that be so, yet inasmuch as he is what the law calls civiliter mortuus, or in other words amissit legem, he has lost all the [659] advantage and privilege which the law could confer upon him, and that therefore, he is not competent to deal with that property which it is clear remained in him. Now Baron Hume and Mr. Alison enumerate the consequences of outlawry and being put to the horn, but neither of these authors on the criminal law of Scotland specify, among these, an incapacity to dispose of what remains vested in the outlaw. It is perfectly true, that the personal incapacity which he has incurred prevents him from appearing in any court of justice, or doing any thing which requires the interposition of a court of justice in his behalf, but there is no authority to show that he cannot execute a valid deed respecting that which by law is left in him.

Now, in this case nothing was necessary towards completing the title, so that no feudal objection exists to the deed subsequently executed. He does not appear in any court or require the assistance of judicial authority. The trustees were legal owners; and the only question is, whether, as between the author of the trust and the heir, the former can, as against the heir, effectually destine the fee. That there is estate sufficient to be so dealt with is beyond all question, and accordingly the power of the trustees is equally clear.

The distinction betwixt the effect of diligence by horning in civil process and outlawry criminally was much discussed; but it is admitted that putting to the horn in civil process does not produce this incapacity; and yet outlawry is not in Scotland as in England in criminal cases equivalent to conviction, but both in civil and in criminal cases it is only a process for the purpose of compelling appearance. To me it seems needless to inquire how far these two processes are now the same. Many alterations [660] have been introduced by the special statute, but no authority has been adduced to show that as to this point the outlawry in criminal cases differs from the same proceeding in civil diligence.

The judges below agree that the entail was good, and that it was not competent to the appellant to get quit of it. Of the thirteen judges who gave their opinions at the last decision of the case all agreed that the fee remained in the outlaw; nine (Lords Justice Clerk, Balgray, Gillies, Meadowbank, M'Kenzie, Medwyn, Corehouse, Fullerton, and Jeffrey) of them being of opinion that the outlaw had full dominion over the fee; four (Lords President, Glenlee, Moncreiff, and Cockburn) thought that in this case he had properly and effectually exercised that dominion, upon the ground that the property was in trust, and therefore that it did not require the interposition of a court for the purpose of giving effect to the disposition of the property. Nine of the judges were of opinion that there was no difference between the powers in criminal and in civil cases.

What your Lordships have now to consider is not whether the several opinions entertained by the learned judges be correct or not, the sole question being whether the appellant has made out a case showing satisfactorily that the opinion of all the judges in the Court of Session was wrong, because, whatever grounds those learned judges may have had for the conclusion to which they came, the question is whether your Lordships have before you such grounds as will satisfy you that that judgment ought to be reversed. Without going through the nice distinctions which have occupied so much discussion below, there are two grounds on which it appears to me that the judgment of the Court below is [661] right. First of all, I consider it quite clear that notwithstanding what has taken place the fee remains in the outlaw, and that his personal disability has not been proved to apply to directing a trust previously vested in trustees. That exhausts the questions as they exist under the first appeal.

The second case in which an appeal has been presented was a suit for the purpose of reducing and getting rid of that which was done with the estate by the trustees under the mandate from the outlaw. Now if the appellant is wrong on the merits, if the entail be good as against him, he has no interest in the second question, inasmuch as the entail being valid, it is immaterial as between the heir and the maker of it, whether the recording was valid; an unrecorded entail being effectual inter hæredes, although not betwixt them, as with third parties, onerous creditors. But it appears to me that there is no ground whatever for the objection to the recording. The trustees are the parties who appear as owners of the estate; the outlaw does not appear; he is no party to the proceedings; the trustees are indeed acting under his mandate executing a duty he requires them to perform; but for all feudal purposes they are the owners of the estate, and so dealing with it. No irregularity is pointed out, and no case has been made to show that any of the proceedings have been illegal so far as the trustees are concerned.

If therefore your Lordships concur in the opinion I have expressed, that the entail itself was good, and that the heir was barred of his right, as fee-simple proprietor, by the entail so carried into effect by the trustees under the mandate of the outlaw, your Lordships will have no difficulty in concurring with the judgment of the Court [662] of Session, that no objection can be made by the heir against the recording of the entail.

If there had been more difficulty in the case, and if, upon the papers before you and the arguments at the bar, real doubt had arisen as to the propriety of the judgment below, no doubt your Lordships would have regretted that you had to come to an adjudication upon the case without the benefit of hearing the argument for the defenders. But from the appellant's own case, as made by himself, and the authorities he has been compelled to refer to, and from that glimmering only of the defenders' case which is to be seen in the papers of the appellant, who refers only to the arguments on the other side with the view of repelling them, I entertain no doubt that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutor therein complained of be and the same is hereby affirmed.

ARCHIBALD GRAHAME, Solicitor.

[663] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

WILLIAM DUNLOP and Company, Appellants.*—Sir William Follett; GEORGE ANTHONY LAMBERT and Others, Respondents.—Attorney General (Campbell)—James Anderson [16th July 1839].

[Mews' Dig. iii. 197; xiii. 552. Cited in Colonial Insurance Co. of New Zealand, v. Adelaide M. I. Co., 1886, 12 A.C. 139; and see S.C. 6 Cl. and F. 600.]

Carrier—Contract—Risk.—In an action by consignors for value of a puncheon of whiskey thrown overboard, and lost, against ship owners, who by bill of lading acknowledged the shipment of the goods in good order and condition, "to be delivered in the like good order at Newcastle," dangers and accidents of the sea excepted, and which bill of lading the consignors transmitted to the consignee, with an invoice of the price, including the amount of freight and of the insurance paid by consignors, and charged against the consignee,—the consignors libelled a contract by the ship owners to deliver the goods at Newcastle, and also an agreement by the consignors to be answerable to the consignee for the safe delivery of the goods. The judge at the trial directed the jury in point of law, "That as it appeared that the pursuers at the time of furnishing the spirits in question had sent an invoice thereof to the purchaser, bearing that the same had been insured, and that the freight thereof and insurance were charged against the said purchaser in the invoice, the pursuers were not entitled in law or interest to recover the value of the said puncheon from the defenders."—Held (reversing interlocutor of the Court of [664] Session, which disallowed an exception to said direction,) that said direction was in point of law not correct in the mode in which it left the case with the jury,—in respect that it withdrew from their consideration the fact whether the goods had been delivered to the carriers on the risk of the consignors or of the consignee, and the question whether there was a special contract between the consignors and consignee sufficient to enable the consignors to recover in the action.

On the 31st August 1833 the appellants, who are wholesale spirit merchants, sent to the agents at Leith of the respondents, who are ship owners, a puncheon of spirits, to be carried to the purchaser, Mathew Robson, near Newcastle, and a bill of lading was granted by the respondents' agents to the appellants in these terms:—

"Mr. Mathew Robson, Collier Row, by Houghton-le-Spring, W.D. No. 1369, 105 gs. care of Mr. Lattimer, Newcastle.

To be taken out in running days after ship's arrival, or to pay guineas per day demurrage.

in Leith, 31st August 1833.

Shipped by William Dunlop & Co., in good order and condition, in and upon the good ship Ardincaple, whereof Macleod is master for the present voyage, and now lying in the port of Leith, and bound for Newcastle, one puncheon of spirits, bung-full, with excise permit, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and to be delivered in the like good order, and well conditioned, at the foresaid port of Newcastle, (all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatsoever nature and kind, excepted,) unto Mr. Mathew Robson, Collier Row, by Houghton-le-Spring, or to his assigns, freight for the said goods being paid by William Dunlop & Co. at prime and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to two [665] bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, one of which being accomplished, the other to stand void. Dated (Signed) Laing and Sword, Agents."

The appellants transmitted to Robson, along with the bill of lading, an invoice, and a letter (in part), in the following words:—

Edinburgh, 31st August 1833.

"Mr. Mathew Robson,

Edinburgh, 31st August 1833.

"Mr. Mat. Robson,

"We hope the above will reach you in time and give satisfaction. We reckon the quality very fine, and we trust this will be the introduction to many good transactions between us both. For amount, we enclose our draft at three months, payable in London, which please return us accepted and domiciled on approval of the shipment. The spirits will be in Newcastle on Monday morning if all is well, and your farther orders will very much oblige yours respectfully,

"WM. DUNLOP &amp; Co."

In the manifest of the cargo of the Ardincaple, there was the following entry:—
"Consignee, Mathew Robson; residence, Newcastle; goods, marks, etc., one puncheon [666] whiskey, freight paid, 10s.; amount total invoice, £75 17s."

The goods having been lost, and not delivered, the appellants brought an action against the respondents for the value thereof; and (by their amended summons) libelled, "that upon the 31st day of August last the pursuers shipped on board the steam ship or vessel called the Ardincaple of Newcastle, then lying at the port of Leith, and bound for Newcastle, one puncheon of spirits, bung-full, with excise permit, marked W. D., No. 1369, 105 ga.; addressed to Mr. Mathew Robson, Collier Row, by Houghtoun-le-Spring, care of Mr. Lattimer, Newcastle, to be delivered in good order and well-conditioned, at the aforesaid port of Newcastle, as addressed, conform to memorandum, receipt, or bill of lading granted by Messrs Laing and Sword, agents at Leith for the owners of the said steam ship or vessel, bearing date the said 31st day of August last, and acknowledging that the freight for the said goods was paid, to be produced in process, and here referred to, and held as repeated brevitatis causa; the pursuers at the same time having undertaken by their agreement, and being answerable to the said Mathew Robson for the safe delivery of the said puncheon;" and the conclusion was for payment of the value of the goods to the appellants.

The respondents, among other defences, objected to the title or interest of the appellants to sue for and recover the amount (the said defence being designated preliminary). The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, disposing of the preliminary character of the said defence:—

"20th June 1835.—Lord Fullerton. Having heard [667] parties' procurators, finds that the averments of the pursuers are relevant to support their title and interest to insist in the present action, and therefore repels the preliminary defences as urged in bar of further procedure in the action, and appoints issues to be prepared in common form upon the matter in dispute."

The cause then went to trial on the following issues:

"1. Whether on or about the 31st day of August 1833 the pursuers shipped a puncheon of spirits on board the Ardincaple of Newcastle, a vessel belonging to the defenders, for the purpose of being conveyed to Newcastle, and delivered to Mathew Robson, Collier Row, Houghton-le-Spring, care of Mr. Lattimer, Newcastle? And 2. Whether the defenders wrongfully failed to deliver the said puncheon to the said Mathew Robson, and are indebted and resting owing to the pursuers in the sum of £75 17s. or any part thereof, with interest thereon, as the value of the said puncheon of spirits."

The case came on for trial before the Lord President and a jury, on 21st March 1837. The appellants, among other evidence, adduced the deposition of Robson, who stated that he believed that the loss of the said puncheon was sustained by Messrs. Dunlop.

The respondents led no proof, and admitted the shipment, the loss and non-delivery, and amount of the claim, as stated.

The judge directed the jury that "the pursuers appeared to be entitled to a verdict upon the first issue, and that the only question in dispute related to the second issue; and did direct the said jury in point of law, that as it appeared that the pursuers, at the time of furnishing the puncheon of spirits in question, [668] has sent an invoice thereof to Mathew Robson, the purchaser, bearing that the same had been insured, and that the freight thereof and insurance were charged against the said Mathew Robson in the said invoice, the pursuers were not entitled in law or interest to recover the value of the said puncheon from the defenders."

The appellants took an exception to this direction. The jury then returned the following verdict:—"We find, on the first issue, that the defenders (respondents) were liable for the loss of the puncheon of whiskey, their servants having placed it on deck, without authority from the shippers.

"We therefore find, on the second issue, that the defenders (respondents) wrongfully failed to deliver the puncheon to Mathew Robson; they not having stowed it in the hold, as they were bound to do, prevented his recourse on the underwriters.

"On the last point of the second issue, we find that the defenders (respondents) are not liable to the pursuers (appellants) for the value of the spirits, because they were not, at the time of the loss, the rightful owners of the goods in question, their invoice shewing that their right in the whiskey ceased at the time of shipment."

The bill of exceptions was afterwards heard before the court, (along with a separate motion by the appellants for a new trial), the pursuers maintaining for argument in support of their exception,—1st, that the respondents' plea was excluded by the previous interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; and 2d, that the objection was not well founded in itself.

The court pronounced the following interlocutor, [669] disallowing the bill of exceptions, and refusing to grant a new trial:—"Edinburgh, 30th June 1837.—The Lords, after hearing counsel for the parties, disallow the bill of exceptions in this case; refuse the motion for a rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted; Find the defenders (respondents) entitled to expenses since the date of trial; appoint an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same to the auditor to be taxed and to report."

The court subsequently pronounced judgment, and awarded expenses, by the following interlocutor:—"Edinburgh, 6th July 1837.—The Lords having heard parties on the motion of the defenders (respondents), apply the verdict, assolkie the defenders, find expenses due, subject to modification, appoint an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same to the auditor to be taxed and to report."

Dunlop and Co. appealed.

It has become unnecessary to repeat the arguments adduced, and authorities founded on, by the appellants and respondents respectively, in so far as they bear upon the judgment, the same having been fully explained by the Lord Chancellor in moving the judgment of the House of Lords.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this case of Dunlop and Co. v. Lambert is an appeal from an interlocutor of the Court of Session disallowing a bill of exceptions taken to the direction of the Lord President on the trial of an issue between the parties in the cause. The case arose out of the firm of Dunlop and Co. having sent a [670] puncheon of spirits to their correspondent at Newcastle shipped on board a steam vessel. It appears that the steam vessel in its passage was overtaken by violent storms, and the puncheon of spirits not having been taken below, but left on the deck, it became necessary for the safety of the vessel to throw it overboard. An action was brought by the consignors, Dunlop and Co., against the owners of the vessel, to recover the value of the puncheon of spirits so lost.

The summons stated the case in these terms:—"That upon the 31st day of August the pursuers shipped on board the steam vessel, then lying at Leith, one puncheon of spirits, bung-full, with excise permit, marked W. D., No. 1369, 105 gallons, addressed to Mr. Mathew Robson, Collier Row, by Houghton-le-Spring, care of Mr. Lattimer, Newcastle, to be delivered in good order and well-conditioned at the aforesaid port of Newcastle, as addressed, conform to memorandum, receipt, or bills of lading granted by Messrs. Laing and Sword, agents at Leith for the owners of the said steam ship or vessel, bearing date the said 31st day of August last, and acknowledging that the freight for the said goods were paid, to be produced in process and here referred to; the pursuers at the same time having undertaken by their agreement, and being answerable to the said Mathew Robson for the safe delivery of the said puncheon."

My Lords, in the progress of the cause certain issues were directed, which issues were in these terms: "First, Whether on or about the 31st day of August 1833 the pursuers shipped a puncheon of spirits on board the Ardincaple, a vessel belonging to [671] the defenders, for the purpose of being conveyed to Newcastle, and delivered to Mathew Robson, Collier Row, Houghton-le-Spring, care of Mr. Lattimer, Newcastle? And, secondly, whether the defenders wrongfully failed to deliver the said puncheon to the said Mathew Robson, and are indebted and resting owing to the pursuers in the sum of £75 17s. or any part thereof, with interest thereon, as the value of the said puncheon of spirits?"

One question raised upon the appeal was, how far the liability of the defenders to the pursuers was put in issue by the mode in which these issues were directed, it being stated that it had been made a matter of defence that the pursuers were not the right parties, and that that question was not intended to be included in the trial of the issue; certainly, that point was raised upon the pleadings, and I apprehend it is equally clear that the point was left open upon the issues. The second issue was, "Whether the defenders wrongfully failed to deliver the said puncheon to the said Mathew Robson, and are indebted and resting owing to the pursuers in the sum of £75 17s. or any part thereof." It is quite obvious that if it was not intended to leave that question of the legal liability open it would not have been laid in those terms; it would have been sufficient to direct a trial of the first issue, whether the pursuers had shipped a puncheon of spirits on board the vessel, and whether it was lost by the defenders having wrongfully failed to deliver the said puncheon of spirits; but the latter part of it, whether the defenders were indebted and resting owing to the pursuers in the sum of £75 17s. or any part thereof, with interest thereon, as the value of the said [672] puncheon of spirits, necessarily involves the question, whether the liability belonged to the pursuers or to the person to whom the spirits had been consigned.

My Lords, at the trial the deposition of Robson, the consignee, was adduced; it stated "that he gave a bill for £75 17s., the value of the spirits. The bill was renewed in consequence of another puncheon being sent a month later; that deponent desired Mr. Dunlop to insure the same, and to charge the expenses of that and the freight and the invoice to deponent; that the said puncheon was to be safely delivered on the quay at Newcastle before deponent was to consider it his property; deponent has not received a farthing for the loss." Then he states "that he made an affidavit that the puncheon was ordered from Messrs. Dunlop, and lost at sea; that deponent got a letter from Newcastle from the agents of the Ardincaple there, stating that he had to make an affidavit before a magistrate that the puncheon that was lost was his." There is also in evidence the fact that the bill of lading was in these terms: "Shipped by William Dunlop and Co., in good order and condition, in and upon the good ship Ardincaple, whereof M'Leod is master for the present voyage, and now lying in the port of Leith and bound for Newcastle, one puncheon of spirits, bung-full, with excise permit, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and to be delivered in the like good order and well-conditioned at the aforesaid port of Newcastle, (all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatsoever nature and kind, excepted,) unto Mr. Mathew Robson, Collier Row, by Houghton-le-Spring, or to his assigns, freight for the said goods [673] being paid by William Dunlop and Co. at prime and average accustomed."

The invoice stated the property in these terms: "One puncheon of spirits," giving the description, "£73 19s.; to freight paid to Newcastle, 10s., insurance, half per cent., 18s.; puncheon itself, £1; making £75 17s." That was accompanied by a letter written by Dunlop and Co. to Robson, in these terms: "Owing to our young friend John Dunlop having met with a rather serious accident by a fall from or a crush by a gig, in the country, where he is still, not being in a state to be removed for a day or two, the above has been too long in being forwarded, as your friend's letter was locked up in his desk, and we did not know till last night by a note from him that it was to be forwarded at all; we hope it will reach you in time and give satisfaction; we reckon the quality very fine, and we trust this will be the introduction to many good transactions between us both ; for amount we enclose our draft at three months payable in London ;" the draft being £75 17s. ; and in the manifest of the cargo entered " Consignee, Mathew Robson ; one puncheon whiskey, freight paid, 10s. ; letter written, 8th October ; £75 17s."

My Lords, on the trial of these issues before the Lord President, Robson's deposition on oath, which had been taken under a commission, was, along with other evidence, submitted to the jury ; after which the Lord President directed the jury in these terms : " The Lord President observed that under the admissions made by the defenders counsel the pursuers appeared to be entitled to a verdict upon the first issue, and that the only question in dispute related to the second issue ; [674] did direct the said jury, in point of law, that as it appeared that the pursuers, at the time of furnishing the puncheon of spirits in question, had sent an invoice thereof to Mathew Robson, the purchaser, bearing that the same had been insured, and that the freight thereof and insurance were charged against the said Mathew Robson in the said invoice, the pursuers were not entitled in law or interest to recover the value of the said puncheon from the defenders." The pursuers excepted to that direction, and it was brought under the consideration of the First Division of the Court of Session ; and the judges in that division, by a majority, (Lords President, Gillies, and M'Kenzie), (one, Lord Corehouse, of the judges being of a different opinion,) approved of the summing up and direction of the Lord President, disallowed the bill of exceptions, and the direction of the Lord President therefore was affirmed, and the new trial refused. From that judgment an appeal has been brought to your Lordships house ; and the question is,—whether, in point of law, that summing up and direction of the Lord President is maintainable, namely, whether it be law in Scotland,—the law of Scotland being in this respect the same as the law of this country,—in a question between a carrier and the person to whom the carrier is responsible, in the event of property being lost, whether it be true in law, that the sending an invoice to the consignee, by which it appeared that the property had been insured and the freight paid by the consignor, and the amount charged by the consignor to the consignee, deprived the consignor of the power of suing, and of an interest or right to recover the value of the property. My Lords, it is [675] perfectly true, generally speaking, without regard to any special circumstances which may arise, that the delivery by the consignor to the carrier is a delivery to the consignee, and that the risk is the risk of the consignee. If a party directs property to be sent by a particular carrier no doubt he becomes his agent, and the decisions go to this,—that if, without designating the particular carrier, he directs that it shall be sent in the ordinary course, the delivery by the consignor to the carrier relieves him from all responsibility, and the delivery to the carrier is considered as a delivery to the consignee.

On reference, however, to the authorities it will be found that although that is the general inference, and where nothing particular passes, that it is universally true, it is capable of variations. If a particular contract be proved between the consignor and the consignee,—and it does not follow that the circumstance of the freight and the insurance being paid by the one or the other is to be considered a conclusive evidence of the ownership,—as notwithstanding the ordinary rule, of course there may be special contracts ;—where the party undertaking to consign undertakes to deliver at a particular place, and if he undertakes to deliver at a particular place, the property, till it reaches that place, and is delivered according to the contract, is at the risk of the person consigning ; so although the consignor may follow the directions of the consignee, and deliver the property to be conveyed, either by a particular carrier or in the ordinary course of business, still the consignor may make such a contract with the carrier as will make the carrier liable to him. There are, therefore, an infinite variety of circumstances which may occur in which the ordinary rule will turn out not to be the rule to regulate [676] the parties. But the Lord President laid down that the jury must take it as a rule, admitting of no exception, that because the consignee was charged with the freight and insurance, that was not only a circumstance to be taken into consideration by the jury, but was, in point of fact, a circumstance that withdrew from the consideration of the jury the question of what was the particular transaction between the parties, for his Lordship says he directed the jury in point of law that the consignor was not, under such circumstances, entitled to recover. That circumstance, and that circumstance alone, was sufficient to shut out any contract from the case; and the jury did accordingly find a verdict for the defenders on that particular issue, negating the right of the pursuers to recover the value of the property in question.

My Lords, a reference to the authorities cited in the argument shows that no such rule of law exists, and that that circumstance is not conclusive. That is the only circumstance your Lordships have to consider. The Lord President directed the jury that that fact was conclusive,—so conclusive as to withdraw from their consideration other circumstances which might have been material to be considered, for instance, how far Robson's evidence was evidence which they ought to believe. In order to show how utterly impossible it is that that rule should be conclusive, your Lordships will permit me to observe that where a person desirous of having goods sent to him orders them from a distance, he necessarily must have added to the price not only the expense of the carriage but the risk of the carriage, for the owner of the goods will not deliver those goods at Newcastle at the same price at which he would deliver them at Edinburgh; there is the market price or the [677] shop price, the price which the vendor of the goods expects to receive, and which, at all events, he expects to receive; if any person comes to his warehouse at Edinburgh, and purchases goods, he charges the price of course at which he is willing to sell his goods, but if the party buying lives at a distance, there must be, in addition to the price of the goods, the price of the carriage,—that must be paid by somebody,—and there must also be the insurance if the party is to be protected against loss; so that it comes to the same thing, both to the consignor and the consignee, whether the consignor sells at the shop price, leaving the consignee to pay the freight and insurance, or whether the consignor sells at the shop price with the addition of the expense of the freight and insurance. In both cases the same sum will be paid by the party receiving the goods; and the vendor of the goods will have to receive the same sum of money as the price of the article he sells. Now, all that the invoice proves is, that the sum total to be paid by the consignee was the shop price, £73 19s., and the cost of the freight and insurance.

My Lords, this does not rest on general principles only, for it has been the subject of several adjudicated cases. I would again call your Lordships attention to the summons, which states two grounds: first, the special contract with the carrier, by which he agreed to deliver at Newcastle; and then it states the fact, that, as between the consignors and the consignee, the consignors were under an undertaking to deliver the spirits at Newcastle. If the latter fact had been proved there could not have been any question that the consignee had nothing to do with the goods until they arrived at Newcastle, and were actually delivered to him there; and if [678] that contract existed it ought to have been admitted to proof. Possibly it might not have been proved to the satisfaction of the jury, but it appears that the Lord President withdrew that question from the jury, and did not leave it to them to say whether Robson was to be believed or not, but finding on the invoice that the consignors had paid the freight and insurance, and charged them to Robson, the consignee, who no doubt was the person on whom those charges must ultimately fall, as in one way or other they must be added to the price of the goods before he could see what they had cost him, his Lordship directed the jury in point of law that they must find for the defenders.

My Lords, in order to prove that notwithstanding the ordinary right of the consignee to bring an action against the carrier for the loss of the goods he has undertaken to convey,—that notwithstanding that being the general rule, the right of action and the liability may be varied by special contract entered into between the consignor and the consignee, and that the payment of insurance by the one or the other is not conclusive evidence, I would refer to three or four cases in which that doctrine is very clearly established.

The first case in point of date, my Lords, is Davis and Jordan v. James, in 5 Burrow, 2680, in which the statement was that the vendors the manufacturers had delivered goods to a carrier, who undertook to carry for a certain price, and to deliver at a certain time. The action was brought, in consequence of the goods being lost, by the consignor, and it was contended that the consignee was the party who ought to bring the action. Lord Mansfield says, "there was neither law nor conscience in the objection. The vesting of the property may differ according to the circumstances of cases, but it does not enter into the present question. This is an action upon the agreement between the plaintiffs and the carrier; the plaintiffs were to pay him, therefore the action is properly brought by the persons who agreed with him and were to pay him." In this case there is no doubt that the consignors were the persons to pay. The bill of lading itself states that Dunlop and Co., the consignors, had paid, and the contract was that they should deliver the goods at Newcastle.

My Lords, the next case in point of date is the case of Moore v. Wilson, 1 Term Reports, 659; the action was by the consignor; the declaration stated, that the defendant undertook to carry the goods "for a certain hire and reward, to be paid by the plaintiff," which the defendant's counsel contended did not prove the declaration. That agreed with the view of Mr. Justice Buller, who nonsuited the plaintiff, whereupon a motion for a new trial was made, and Mr. Justice Buller said he had mistaken the law, for "that whatever might be the contract between the vendor and the vendee, the agreement for the carriage was between the carrier and the vendor, the latter of whom was by law liable."

A case was referred to, Dawes v. Peck, in 8 Term Reports, 330, in support of the law as laid down by the Lord President. In that case the consignee had directed the goods to be sent by a particular carrier; and the court, holding that the consignor, by delivering the goods to the carrier so designated, had parted with the property, held that he could not maintain an action.

The same doctrine was laid down in another case, where there was a mere delivery to a carrier without any particular contract between either the consignor and [680] the consignee, or between the consignor and the carrier. In Dulton v. Solomons, in 3 Bosanquet and Puller, at page 584, Lord Alvanley, C. J., says, "if a tradesman order goods to be sent by a carrier, though he does not name any particular carrier, the moment the goods are delivered to the carrier it operates as a delivery to the purchaser;—the whole property immediately vests in him, he alone can bring an action for any injury done to the goods," which, no doubt, is the rule in those cases where there are no particular circumstances proved, or any particular contract in evidence between the plaintiff and defendant. In Sergeant v. Morris, in 3 Barnewell and Alderson, 277, goods being shipped, under a contract to deliver them in the consignor's name to the consignee, and it appearing that they were at the consignor's risk, it was held that the consignor might sue although the consignee had insured the goods. That is exactly the converse; ordinarily speaking, the consignee would be the person to bring the action; there the consignor brought the action, and it was held that he was right in bringing the action, because he undertook by contract that he would deliver the goods to the consignee at a particular place, but the consignee had insured. Now here, according to the Lord President, that fact would have been put aside, and the party insuring would have been the party to bring the action, but the reverse was held in that case, and though the consignee had insured, it was held that the consignor was the right person to bring the action.

In Brown v. Hodgson, in 2 Campbell's Nisi Prius Cases, page 36, the bill of lading stated that the goods were shipped by order and on account of the consignee; Lord Ellenborough held that the consignor could not in [681] that case bring an action, because upon the evidence it appeared that he had nothing to do with them; the bill of lading stated the contract with the carrier to deliver the goods at a certain place to the consignee, and stated that the goods had been shipped for and on account of the consignee. The production of that letter, unexplained by any other evidence, was considered by Lord Ellenborough conclusive that the consignor had parted with all the property in the goods, and that the consignee alone could bring an action.

But in the same volume, 2 Campbell's Nisi Prius Cases, page 639, in King v. Meredith, where the action was by the consignor against the consignee, for the price of the goods lost in the carriage, it appeared that the consignor was to pay the carriage, and it was objected that the goods were therefore at his risk, so that he could not maintain an action against the consignee. It was said he could not maintain the action because his paying the carriage was conclusive that the goods were at his risk. Mr. Justice Lawrence says, "The mode in which the carrier was to be paid makes no difference. The moment the spirits were delivered to him the property vested in the defendant; the plaintiffs, by paying the carrier, did not become insurers of the spirits while in the hands of the carrier." There, again, is a fact which, according to the law as laid down by the Lord President, would have been conclusive, but in that case the court assumed that the right might be in one party, where the other party had paid the freight.

There is a case very strongly applicable to the present, the case of Joseph v. Knox, in 3 Campbell's Nisi Prius Cases, 320; that was an action against the owner of a ship, on a bill of lading signed by the master, [682] for not carrying goods from London to Surinam. The bill of lading stated that the goods were shipped by the plaintiffs, that they were to be delivered in Surinam to Levy Davids or his assignees, and that the freight was paid in London. The goods consisted chiefly of butter, which the plaintiffs had received from merchants at Amsterdam to be forwarded to Levy Davids in Surinam, and which, in answer to a bill in equity, they swore they believed to be his property. For the defendant it was insisted that this action could not be maintained by Joseph and Co., who had no interest in the goods; they were merely the conduit through which the goods were to be transmitted from the merchants at Amsterdam to Davids at Surinam. The property being in Davids, the consignee, he alone was injured by the nondelivery of the goods, and he alone could sue to recover their value. It has often been decided that an action against a common carrier for the loss of goods must be brought by the purchaser, who ought to receive them, and not by the vendor, who had delivered them to the carrier. There the vendor delivers them merely as the agent of the purchaser, and on that ground can maintain no action respecting them. Lord Ellenborough laid down this as the law:—"I am of opinion that this action well lies; there is a privity of contract established between these parties by means of the bill of lading. That states that the goods were shipped by the plaintiffs, and that the freight of them was paid by the plaintiffs in London; to the plaintiffs, therefore, from whom the consideration moves, and to whom the promise is made, the defendant is liable for the nondelivery of the goods. After such a bill of lading [683] has been signed by his agent he cannot say to the shippers they have no interest in the goods, and are not demnified by his breach of contract. I think the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the value of the goods, and they will hold the sum recovered as trustees for the real owner."

The same question arose between other parties in a similar case (Van Omeron v. Dowick, 3 Camp. 322), and Lord Ellenborough again laid down the same doctrine.

These authorities, therefore, my Lords, established these propositions: that although, generally speaking, where there is a delivery to a carrier to deliver to a consignee, the consignee is the proper person to bring the action against the carrier if they should be lost; yet the consignor may have a right to sue if he made a special contract with the carrier, and the carrier has agreed to take the goods from the consignor and to deliver them to any particular person at a particular place, which special contract supersedes the necessity of showing ownership in the goods; and by authority of the case of Davis v. James (5 Burr. 2680), and the last case of Joseph v. Knox (3 Camp. 320), that the consignor is enabled to maintain an action, though the goods may be the goods of the consignee.

But the authorities also go to this: that although ordinarily speaking the consignee would be the party to bring the action, yet that the consignor also is entitled where there is a contract to deliver at a particular place, if the risk is in the consignor; and therefore the circumstance of the paying freight or the paying insurance, though it is a circumstance to be taken into consideration, as it is not conclusive on the question [684] of property, so it is not conclusive of the right to sue. The Lord President laid down that, in his opinion, it was conclusive, and therefore he shut out the proof of the fact. I think, therefore, that there are two objections to the mode in which the Lord President left the case to the jury; namely, that he withdrew from their consideration that which ought to have been submitted to their consideration,—I mean the fact whether the goods had been delivered to the carrier on the risk of the consignor or of the consignee; and the question whether there was a special contract between the consignor and the consignee, which in its circumstances would have been sufficient to enable the pursuers to recover in the action. It is not necessary for your Lordships to inquire in what form that ought to be left to the jury, the questions on the bill of exceptions being whether the direction of the judge was in point of law correct. I am of opinion that it was not correct in the mode in which it was left to the jury, and that your Lordships ought to reverse the interlocutor disallowing the bill of exceptions, and direct that a new trial be granted.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said interlocutors complained of in the said appeal be and the same are hereby reversed: And it is further ordered, That the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, with directions to allow the bill of exceptions, and to grant a new trial, and to determine all questions of expenses between the parties in the said Court of Session, and to proceed otherwise in the said cause as shall be just, and consistent with this judgment.

[685] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

ALEXANDER PEARSON and WILLIAM ROBERTSON, Appellants.*—Pemberton—John Stuart; Miss JANE CASAMAJOR and others, Respondents.—Attorney General (Campbell)—Lord Advocate (Rutherford) [18th July 1839].

[Mews' Dig. i. 319; xv. 981. Same view taken by Lord Campbell in Wordsworth v. Wordsworth, 1848, 1 H.L.C., at p. 156. But per contra long list of authorities collected in Wms. Exors., 9th ed. vol. 2, 1330; and see Corneck v. Wadman, 1868, L.R. 7 Eq. 80; Marriott v. Abell, 1869, ib. 478].

Et à contra.

Legacy—Testament—Vesting.—A testator, by a trust disposition and settlement, directed his trustees, after payment of his debts and the expenses of the trust, 3dly, to pay a legacy of £500 to his sister Mrs. A.; 4thly, to pay annuities of £400, £400, and £200, to his other three sisters, during their respective lives, which several annuities were appointed to be paid half-yearly during the lives of his said sisters respectively; and in the event that after payment of his debts and obligations due at his death, payment of the expenses attendant on the execution of the trust, and of the £500 to his said sister Mrs. A., the residue of the proceeds of his funds and estate should not be sufficient for yielding the foresaid annuities thereby settled on his said sisters, then it was his meaning and intention that the said residue, whatever it might be, should be vested and laid out, and the interests or dividends arising therefrom be paid unto and divided among his said three sisters, Mrs. F., Mrs. P., and Mrs. B., during their respective lives, in the same proportions, and exactly in the same terms, in every respect, as therein pointed out, with respect to the full annuities of £400, £400, and £200; and 5thly, in the event of there being any of the proceeds of his said funds and estate remaining, after setting apart capital sums sufficient to yield the three annuities of £400, £400, and £200, then his said trustee should pay such [686] surplus, together with the capital sums so to be set apart for answering the foresaid annuities, as and when such capital sums should become tangible by the deaths of the said annuitants respectively, or in the event of there being no surplus, then the capital sums, whatever their amount might be, so to be vested and laid out as aforesaid, as and when such capital sums should become tangible as aforesaid, to and among Mary, Helen, Alexander, and Mary Ann, children of Mrs. P., and to three daughters of Mrs. B., equally among them, share and share alike, and the survivors or survivor of them, and that at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after their respectively attaining majority or being married, whichever of these events should first happen, or as soon after the first of these events as the said capital sums so to be set apart should become tangible, by and through the deaths of the said several annuitants respectively, declaring, that until such several shares became payable, the interest or dividends of each share should be payable to the above-named persons respectively, for their maintenance and education, with full power to advance the whole or part of the share of A. P. for his outfit; and in the event of the deaths of any one or more of the said seven residuary legatees, before the term of payment (one or more, as the case might be,) of their shares as aforesaid, but that such deceasers should leave issue in life, and in life at the time that their father or mother would have been entitled to have received payment of their shares had they survived, the share of such deceasing parent should belong and be paid to and among their issue respectively, and that at the periods at which deceasing parent would have received the same had they been in life,—the trustees to regulate themselves accordingly, power being given to them to secure the shares falling to the seven legatees, so as all or any one or more of them shall only be entitled to draw the interest or dividends of their respective shares during their several lives, and the capitals of their shares shall in that case descend to their respective heirs, etc.; and 6thly, in the event that the residue of his funds, after payment of the £500 to his sister Mrs. A., should amount to the sum of [687] £15,000 sterling or upwards, to pay out of such residue £1000 sterling to each of George and Thomas P., sons of Mrs. P.; but if such residue should be under £15,000, and should not be less than the sum of £8000, then the said George and Thomas P. should only be entitled to £500 each; but if such residue should not amount to the said sum of £8000, then the said George and Thomas P. should not be entitled to receive any thing, the above-mentioned eventual legacies being to be payable to the said George and Thomas P. at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after his death, with interest from said term of payment till paid. The testator was survived by his sisters Mrs. F. and Mrs. P., but not by Mrs. B. He was survived also by five of the legatees, including A. P. Mrs. F., one of the annuitants, died, predeceased by A. P. and M. P. A. P. had attained majority, and executed a general settlement in favour of Mrs. F. The free residue of the testator's estate exceeded £15,000, but the payment of the annuities before Mrs. F.'s death exhausted the annual income of it. In an action of multiplepounding for fixing the interests of the several parties,—Held, 1. (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session, which affirmed a finding by the Lord Ordinary,) “that the shares of the residue, so far as the same consisted of capital sums set apart for answering the said annuities, provided to the said A. P. and M. P. by the fifth purpose of the trust, whereby the residue was appointed to be paid to the seven individuals therein named, share and share alike, and the ‘survivors or survivor’ of them, under the conditions farther therein expressed, were not so vested in the said A. P. and M. P. as to enable them effectually to dispose thereof.” Per L. C. There is sufficient upon the face of the trust deed to show that the term “survivor” does not refer to the period of the testator's own death, but that it refers to the period at which these sums would become tangible, and that would lead to an affirmance of the said finding. Held, 2. (varying the interlocutor of the Court of Session, and remitting, with a declaration,) that the legacies to G. P. and T. P. by the sixth purpose of the deed declared [688] were payable to them at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the testator's death; and that the sum applicable to the payment of the aforesaid annuities was the residue of the said trust fund, after deducting as well the testator's debts and obligations, the expenses of the trust, and the legacy of £500 to Mrs. A., as the said two legacies payable to G. P. and T. P.

By a trust disposition and settlement, dated 16th April 1810, Alexander Porterfield esq., of Porterfield, now deceased, disposed to and in favour of Alexander Pearson esq. (the appellant), and of Frederick Fotheringham esq., now deceased, his whole estate, real and personal, in trust, for the following, among other, purposes; after disposing of his whole property and paying his debts: Thirdly, to make payment of a legacy of £500 to his sister Mrs. Camilla Porterfield or Alexander, wife of Boyd Alexander esq., of Southbar. Fourthly, to pay the following annuities to his sisters after named, during their respective lives, viz. to Mrs. Christian Porterfield or Fotheringham an annuity of £400; to Mrs. Ann Porterfield or Paterson, wife of Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Paterson, residing in Charlotte Square, Edinburgh, a like annuity of £400; to Mrs. Margaret Porterfield or Buchanan an annuity of £200, and this over and above and in addition to the annuity already settled on the said Mrs. Margaret Porterfield or Buchanan by him, which several annuities thereby provided the said Alexander Porterfield directed and appointed his said trustees to pay to his said sisters, during all the days of their respective lives, and that half-yearly, commencing payment thereof at the second term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which should happen after his death, for the year preceding such first terms of payment, and continuing payment thereafter at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas as [689] aforesaid, during the lives of his said sisters respectively; and for the better fulfilment of this purpose, he thereby directed his said trustees to vest and lay out capital sums for answering the foresaid respective annuities on any security or securities which they might think proper, either personal, heritable, or in the public funds, and to take said securities in such terms as they might think best adapted for fulfilling the foresaid purpose; and in the event that after payment of the said Alexander Porterfield's debts, and fulfilment of the obligations in which he might stand bound at the time of his death, payment of the expenses attendant on the execution of the trust and of the £500 to his said sister Mrs. Alexander, the residue of the proceeds of his funds and estate should not be sufficient for yielding the foresaid annuities thereby settled on his said sisters,—then it was his meaning and intention that the said residue, whatever it might be, should be vested and laid out, and the interest or dividends arising therefrom be paid unto and divided among his said three sisters, Mrs. Fotheringham, Mrs. Paterson, and Mrs. Buchanan, during their respective lives, in the same proportions and exactly in the same terms, in every respect, as before pointed out with respect to the full annuities of £400, £400, and £200; and he thereby directed his said trustees to regulate themselves accordingly. The fifth purpose of the trust was:—"In the event of there being any of the proceeds of my said funds and estate remaining, after setting apart capital sums sufficient to yield the three annuities of £400, £400, and £200, as above specified, then I hereby direct my said trustees or trustee to pay such surplus, together with the capital sums so to be set apart for answering the foresaid annuities, as and [690] when such capital sums become tangible by the deaths of the said annuitants respectively, or, in the event of there being no surplus, then the capital sums, whatever their amount may be, so to be vested and laid out as aforesaid, as and when such capital sums shall become tangible, as aforesaid, to and among Mary Paterson, Helen Paterson, Alexander Paterson, and Mary Ann Paterson, all children procreated of the marriage between the said Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Paterson and Mrs. Ann Porterfield or Paterson, Buchanan, Buchanan, and Buchanan, all daughters of the said Mrs. Margaret Porterfield or Buchanan, equally among the said Mary, Helen, Alexander, and Mary Ann Patersons,

, and Buchanans, share and share alike, and the survivors or survivor of them, and that at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after their respectively attaining majority or being married, whichever of these events shall first happen, (under the declaration however after mentioned,) or as soon after the first of said events as the said capital sums so to be set apart for answering the foresaid annuities shall become tangible, by and through the deaths of the said several annuitants respectively; hereby declaring, that until such several shares become payable the interest or dividends of each share shall be payable to the above-named persons respectively, for their maintenance and education; but I hereby give full power to my said trustees or trustee to advance the whole or any part of the principal sum falling to the share of the said Alexander Paterson, if they or he shall judge it necessary for his outfit or establishment in the world; hereby further declaring, [691] that in the event of the deaths of any one or more of the said Mary, Helen, Alexander, and Mary Ann Patersons, or

, and Buchanans, before the term of payment (one or more, as the case may be,) of their shares, as aforesaid, but that such deceasers shall leave lawful issue of their bodies in life, and which issue shall be in life at the time their father or mother would have been entitled to have received payment of their shares had they survived, the share of such deceasing parent shall belong to and be paid to and among their issue respectively, and that at the periods at which such deceasing parents would have received the same had they been in life. But farther, it is hereby expressly provided and declared, and I do hereby direct and appoint my said trustees or trustee to regulate themselves accordingly, that it shall be completely in the power of my said trustees or trustee, if they or he shall think it proper so to do, to settle and secure the shares falling to all or any one or more of the said Mary, Helen, and Mary Ann Patersons, and

, and Buchanans, so as all or any or more of them shall only be entitled to draw the interest or dividends of their respective shares during their several lives, and the capitals of their shares shall, in this case, fall and descend to their respective heirs, executors, or assignees." By the sixth purpose of the trust the trustees are directed, in the event of the residue of his funds and estate, after payment and fulfilment of debts and obligations, and of the legacy of £500 to Mrs. Alexander, amounting to upwards of £15,000, to pay out of such residue the sum of £1000 to each of George and [692] Thomas Patersons, sons of Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Paterson; but if such residue should be under £15,000, and not less than £8000, these two legacies were to be reduced to £500 each; while, if the said residue should not amount to £8000, the said George and Thomas Patersons were not to be entitled to receive any legacies at all; and which legacies were to be payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the testator's death, and to bear interest from the said term of payment till paid.

The testator died in the year 1815. Two of the three annuitants, Mrs. Fotheringham and Mrs. Paterson, survived him. Of the seven residuary legatees five survived him, of whom Alexander Paterson was one. Alexander Paterson attained majority in 1818, and died in 1820, leaving a settlement of his whole property in favour of Mrs. Fotheringham and husband, and the survivor of them. At that time both the annuitants were alive, but one of them, Mrs. Fotheringham, died in 1834; the other annuitant, Mrs. Paterson, still survives. Upon Mrs. Fotheringham's death Mr. Pearson (one of appellants), as trustee of Mr. Porterfield, raised an action of multiplepoinding and exoneration, in which several parties claimed. But the principal question related to the disposal of the capital sum that was disengaged by the death of Mrs. Fotheringham. Mrs. Fotheringham's trustees (Messrs. Pearson and Robertson the appellants) claimed to be ranked,—1, for arrears of annuity due to that lady at her death, and, 2, for Alexander Paterson's share of the fund, on the plea that his share had vested in him previous to his death, and was bequeathable by will. On the other hand, Miss Casamajor and other legatees (respondents) re-[693]-sisted the second part of that claim on the ground that the legacy to Alexander Paterson had not vested. The respondents objected also to the first part of that claim that Mrs. Fotheringham's trustees had no right to the annuity subsequent to the last term before her death.

Mrs. Fotheringham's trustees and Mrs. Paterson, two of the annuitants, further maintained that in ascertaining the amount of the income of the trust estate falling to the annuitants, the interest of the two legacies to George and Thomas Paterson ought not to be deducted from that income, but that the said two legacies, with interest due at the death of the annuitants, ought to be taken from the capital of the residue.

The questions raised upon the construction of the trust disposition are explained and disposed of in the following interlocutor (3d June 1836) by the Lord Ordinary, and in the relative note:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the closed record, and heard parties procurators thereon, and made avizandum, Finds, primo, that as the trust deed, in the fourth article of the purposes thereof, expressly ordains the trustees to pay the annuities thereby provided to the three parties named, commencing the first payment at the second term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the testator's death, and as the only event provided for, whereby the amount of those annuities was to be diminished, is expressly the event, that after payment of the testator's debts and obligations, the expenses of the trust, and one legacy of £500 to Mrs. Alexander, 'the residue of the proceeds of my funds and estate shall not be sufficient for yielding the foresaid annuities hereby settled on my foresaid sisters,' the said annuitants were entitled to receive, [694] and the trustees were bound to pay, the full annuities so provided to them during their lives respectively, so far as the residue, after those deductions, were sufficient for the purpose; and finds, that their claim to such annuities cannot be diminished or affected by the subsequent provision of the two legacies to George and Thomas Patersons, by the sixth purpose of the said trust, or by the interests accruing on those provisions: Finds, secundo, that the annuitants were entitled to a full year's annuity at the second term after the testator's death, it being expressly provided that the annuities shall then be paid 'for the year preceding such term of payment:' Finds, tertio, that it has been sufficiently proved, and is now admitted, that Alexander Paterson, to whom a share of the residue of the estate was provided, survived the years of majority; and finds that Mary Paterson, another of the residuary legatees, was married to the claimant, James Archibald Casamajor, many years ago; but finds it admitted that both these parties predeceased Mrs. Fotheringham, the annuitant, who died on the 31st March 1834: Finds, quarto, that the shares of the residue of the estate, so far as the same consisted of capital sums set apart for answering the said annuities, provided to the said Mary and Alexander Patersons by the fifth article of the purposes declared, whereby the said residue was appointed to be paid to the seven individuals therein named, share and share alike, 'and the survivors or survivor of them,' under the conditions farther therein expressed, were not so vested in the said Mary and Alexander Patersons, as to enable them effectually to dispose thereof: Finds that the children of the said Mary Paterson, who were in [695] life at the death of Mrs. Fotheringham, are entitled, as conditional institutes, to succeed to the share appointed in the first instance to be paid to her, according to the express provision to that effect; and finds, that in the event which has occurred, the share provided to Alexander Paterson must fall to 'the survivors' of the seven legatees named, who were in life at Mrs. Fotheringham's death, together with the children of Mary Paterson, surviving, to the extent of one portion thereof, in the place of Mary Paterson herself, as conditional institutes: Therefore ranks and prefers the claimants, the trustees of Mrs. Fotheringham, in terms of the first article of their claim, reserving all questions as to the amount of such arrears of annuities; but repels the second claim made for them: Ranks and prefers the claimant Mr. Casamajor, as administrator-in-law for his children Jane, Mary, and Elizabeth, and their attorney and mandatories, in terms of the second alternative in the second article of his claim; but repels the claim made in his own right; and in respect that the claim made to a share of the legacy left to George Paterson was abandoned at the debate, as it had become known since the record was made up, that George Paterson had left a deed of settlement, repels the first article of Mr. Casamajor's claim: Ranks and prefers the claimant Mr. Rynd, according to the second article of her claim; but supersedes consideration of her first claim, with reference to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of the 24th March last: Ranks and prefers Mr. Alexander Pearson, as trustee under the marriage settlement of Mrs. Helen Paterson or Bligh, in terms of his claim: Ranks and prefers Mr. Pearson, in like [696] manner, as trustee in the marriage settlement of Mrs. Ann Paterson or Shephard, in terms of his claim: Ranks and prefers the claimant Mrs. Ann Porterfield or Paterson, and her husband and mandatories, in terms of her claim; reserving all questions as to the amount of such arrears of annuities; finds no expenses due to any party; and appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that the points remaining for consideration may be disposed of, and the multipole pinding finally extricated, on the principles of this interlocutor.*

(Signed) JAMES W. MONCREIFF."

* "Note.—This cause is certainly one of great difficulty, in two points, but especially in that which stands fourth in the findings of the above interlocutor. The first point presents a considerable perplexity, by the apparent contradiction between the fourth and sixth heads of the trust purposes. But after much consideration, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the provision of the annuities must take effect according to its terms, which are quite clear, unambiguous, and unqualified, except by the clauses of that provision itself. The sixth provision of the conditional legacies

[697] Against this interlocutor reclaiming notes were presented to the Court by several parties. The appellants [698] reclaimed against the interlocutor in so far as it found that the share of the trust estate, left to the late Alex-[699]-ander Paterson, was not so vested in him previous to his death as to enable him effectually to dispose to George and Thomas Patersons, however it may seem to interfere with the investment of the funds for securing the annuities, contains no declaration that the annuities shall be at all diminished on account of those legacies. Although, therefore, it may be difficult to explain under what views it was that the testator regulated those legacies by the amounts of residue stated, the Lord Ordinary is satisfied that there is no such distinct expression of will to alter or restrain the provision of the annuities, as can be held legally to produce that effect. The ultimate question here is not at all between the annuitants and the legatees, George and Thomas, but solely between the residuary legatees and the annuitants. There is no doubt that the special legacies must be paid, because the free residue did exceed £15,000, and they must, of course, bear interest from the term of payment. The real question is, whether the interest of those legacies is to be held as a burden diminishing the annuities, or as a burden diminishing the ultimate residue to remain for the residuary legatees. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that neither by the terms of the deed, nor by any presumption as to the probable intention of the testator, can it be held that the burden was meant to affect the annuities which were made a primary purpose of the trust. It is entirely a question of intention. But the provision of the annuities being the first in order, and from its nature, presumed to be of first importance in the testator's mind, and the words being clear, the Lord Ordinary thinks that nothing but the most express words in a later part of the deed could be held to take away a right so explicitly given.

"There seems to be no doubt on the point which stands second in the interlocutor, that the annuitants were entitled to a full year's annuity at the second term after the testator's death. It is much the same as if he had ordered a half-year's annuity to be paid at the first term after his death. The point seemed to be conceded.

"The third finding merely comprehends certain points of fact, necessary for raising the fourth question. But it was certainly admitted in the debate, that the fact of Alexander Paterson having survived majority was sufficiently proved.

"That fourth question is the great difficulty in the case. It is purely a question of intention. Some aid may, indeed, be obtained from the decided cases. But when they have been all considered, it still becomes necessary to return to the deed itself, and to weigh every word of the remarkable clauses in this destination of the residue of the estate.

"If there had been a surplus after securing the annuities, there is no doubt that it must have become payable to each of the nominatim legatees who survived the testator, if they also attained marriage or majority. But though this circumstance creates a peculiarity in this trust, if the shares of the capital sums invested for the annuities must be dealt with in a different manner, it does not appear to the Lord Ordinary that it goes a great way to solve the question here in controversy. The case of a surplus is a very simple case; and it could scarcely come to any other result, unless it were supposable that it might be a question, whether even marriage or majority was necessary to vest the right? But while the terms of the deed would probably exclude this last construction, the question as to the capital sums which were to be locked up evidently stands on a separate footing, in so far as a separate and independent quality or condition necessarily came to be added to the other suspensive declarations.

"The trustees are appointed to pay that part of the residue, 'as and when such capital sums become tangible by the deaths of the said annuitants respectively.' This means tangible to the trustees. When that event happens, they are to pay to the individuals named, 'and the survivors or survivor of them'—Survivors of what? If the deed had gone no farther, the words must either have meant survivors of the testator, or survivors of the event before mentioned. The subsequent clauses will not admit of the first construction; and it seems but reasonable to suppose, that at least 'survivors' of the event was included in the expression. But the clause goes on to fix the terms of payment, which are the first term after majority or marriage, thereof; [700] and in so far as it sustained the claims of the other residuary legatees to the share of the residue left to the said [701] Alexander Paterson, and found no expenses due. The respondents reclaimed against the interlocutor in so far as it was unfavourable to them. On advising these reclaiming notes, the Lords of the

'or as soon after the first of the said events as the capital sums shall become tangible' by the deaths of the annuitants respectively. Here it is distinctly contemplated, that the parties might be married or of age, while yet the shares could not be paid to them, the funds not being tangible. This last event, therefore, is a separate and necessary term or condition of the payment; and if it must be granted that the provision in favour of the survivors is a conditional institution, with reference to the terms of marriage or majority, it is very difficult indeed to say that it is not so in respect of the term before which no payment could be made to any one.

"The two clauses which follow, allowing the interest or dividends to be applied for the maintenance and education of the legatees until the shares become payable, and empowering the trustees to advance part of the principal sum to Alexander Paterson, if they should think it necessary, evidently have reference to this state of the case, that the funds had become tangible by the death of the annuitants, while yet some of the legatees were neither married nor of age; for it cannot be supposed that the trustees could exercise such a power, while the funds stood wholly invested, and required for the annuities. However useful in argument, therefore, these clauses might have been, if the question were, whether there could be a vesting before marriage or majority, they evidently do not apply to the event of the funds continuing locked up. And this leads inevitably to the inference, that the provision to the 'survivors' had a much more direct reference to the fact of the legatees being survivors of the one event essential to the payment, than to the terms of marriage or majority, afterwards mentioned.

"But the clause which appears to the Lord Ordinary to be of most importance, in connexion with the provision to 'survivors,' is that which declares, that in the event of the deaths of any of the individuals, 'before the term of payment (one or more, as the case may be,) of their shares as aforesaid, but that such deceasers shall leave lawful issue of their bodies in life, and which issue shall be in life at the time their father or mother would have been entitled to have received payment of their shares, had they survived,' the share shall belong, and be paid to such issue, 'and that at the periods at which such deceasing parents would have received the same had they been in life.' It is impossible to doubt, that in this clause the testator had in view all the events on which the payment was suspended, and specially the decease of the annuitants. The words 'one or more,' in the way they are placed, are very singular, and really must relate to the successive contingencies in the deaths of the annuitants. What is the substance of the provision? The effect of it will be best tried by looking to the case of Mary Paterson. The clause necessarily supposes marriage; so that that term of payment was necessarily past. Yet it is provided that in the event of any of the parties dying 'before the term of payment,' ('one or more'), leaving issue, which shall be in life at the time when their father or mother would have been entitled to receive payment, 'had they survived,' the share shall belong and be paid to such issue. The party being married, and leaving issue in life, even that issue shall not take, unless it be in life at the still postponed term at which the parents, if surviving, would have been entitled to payment. Then, who is to take if the issue survived the parent but was not in life when the money was payable? Plainly, not the parent who had predeceased the child, nor any one in that parent's right; and not the child's heir, seeing that it never was within the condition of the destination, not having been in life at the period fixed. In the case supposed, the share must evidently go to the 'survivors' of the other legatees.

"But take it in another way:—Mary Paterson dies, her children survive, and are in life when Mrs. Fotheringham's annuity ceases. Are they not conditional institutes? The very case stated is, that they were in life at the time when Mary would have been entitled to receive payment if she had survived; in which it is implied, that as she did not survive, she never was entitled to receive payment, and that it is in their own right as conditional institutes, and not as substitutes through her, that the children are entitled to take the share, and exclude the other survivors. The Lord

Second Division of the Court, of this date, pronounced the following interlocutor:—
 “16th December 1836. The Lords, having heard counsel for the parties, and advised the cause, adhere to the findings in the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor reclaimed against; recal the decernitures therein contained, hoc statu, and remit to his Lordship to apply these findings, and to proceed in the cause as to his Lordship shall seem just.”

Ordinary must confess, that he sees no other way in which the clause can be reasonably construed. It distinctly explains the meaning of ‘survivors’ in the previous clause, and renders it impossible to suppose that the testator considered the share as already vested in the married legatee, so as to enable him or her to defeat the right of the children.

“But, if the share was not vested in Mary Paterson, so as to enable her to exclude her own children, neither could it be vested either in her or in Alexander Paterson, to the effect of excluding, by deed, the conditional institution of the other legatees surviving, in the more general case of the party dying before the capital sums were tangible, and leaving no issue. The clause seems to demonstrate, that in the estimation of the testator, the term of payment to which the survivance peculiarly referred was the period when the capital sums might successively be set free; and therefore the Lord Ordinary is on the whole of opinion, that it is impossible to hold that there was any vested right to render a conveyance effectual by a party who did not survive that term.

“It must necessarily follow, from the view above taken of the clause as to the case of a legatee dying, but leaving issue, that such issue must be considered as in the same place in which the parent, if surviving, would have been, and so entitled as one survivor to a share of the legacy fallen by the death of Alexander Paterson.

“The Lord Ordinary will not enter minutely into the cases cited. The late case of Marjoribanks against Aikman, 18th February 1836, (14 D., B., and M., 521.) was much relied on. That was itself a very difficult case. The Lord Ordinary would have concurred in the judgment, though he must have also agreed with the Court in not adopting the test for such cases laid down in the note of the Lord Ordinary in that case. But the present is a far more special case, in which, however natural the leaning may be in favour of the vesting of such a legacy, he finds himself constrained, by what he thinks the evident intention of the testator, to hold that the right was not vested. The case of Smith against Leitch (4 S. and D. 659., new edit. 665.) is a very important case, though the report of it in the House of Lords (3 W. and S. 366.) is not quite satisfactory. But the judgment in that case would have been the other way if it had not been for the marked change in the form of expression in the destination to Andrew Leitch, from that which had been used in all the previous branches of the destination, and the omission in his case of the material words which distinctly qualified the right given in the others.

“The only other case to which the Lord Ordinary will refer (though a great many were quoted to him) is that of Wallace against Wallace, 28th January 1807, (Fac. Coll.) He certainly thinks that case of great importance, and it seems to him, when carefully considered, to afford a safe guide for the decision of this cause. There were two points in it, and the parties who maintain the vested right naturally refer to that which is reported second in order as the most important. That related to a simple legacy to Alexander Wallace, the deed providing that on the death of the longest liver of the testator and his wife, the trustees should pay that legacy to him. There was no destination over or ulterior, and the simple question was, whether that legacy had lapsed by Alexander Wallace predeceasing Mrs. Houston? It cannot be doubted that the judgment was right, which found that it had not lapsed. But it would have been a very different case even in that branch of it if there had been a farther, and, as in this case, nominatim institution or substitution of others, in case he did not survive the longest liver.

“But the first part of that case appears to be the most instructive for the present cause. That related to the residue of the estate, which was to be divided among the children of Alexander Wallace ‘that may be in life at the death of the longest liver of me and my said spouse;’ these sums being made payable also at marriage and majority, ‘whichever of these events shall first happen after the decease of the longest liver of me and my said spouse.’ Then there was a provision, that in the event of the death of any of the said children before their share became payable,

Mrs. Fotheringham's executors, Messrs. Pearson and Robertson, appealed against the above interlocutors in so far as the claim of the legatees to the share left to Alexander Paterson was sustained.

The Misses Casamaijor, Mrs. Rynd, and Mrs. Long Wellealey (legatees) entered a cross appeal against the [702] first finding in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary adhered to by the Court.

Appellants.—It is clear, from the structure and terms of the trust deed, that the intention of the testator was that Alexander Paterson, one of the nominatim residuary legatees, having survived the testator, and having also survived his own majority, there became vested in him a right to one-fifth part of the whole residue, including those portions of the residue which had been set apart to answer the annuities.

In the law of Scotland a fundamental distinction, in reference to the question of vesting, is to be found between legacies left to individuals called nominatim,—known to the testator as existing persons,—about whose identity there can be no doubt or uncertainty; and legacies left to persons called by mere description, as members of a class, nati or nascituri, whose very existence, number, and identity are contingent and uncertain, not only at the date of the testament, but also at the death of the testator. The certainty and complete ascertainment of the legatees which obtains in the former class, as opposed to the contingency and uncertainty as to the persons and number of the legatees which may exist in the latter, has given rise to very different, and indeed to contrary, rules of construction in regard to the vesting of the legacy, as applicable to these two classes of legacies.

The rules as to the vesting of legacies in nominatim legatees adopted by the law of Scotland from that of Rome are:—

1. A legacy, even when left to a nominatim legatee, does not vest until the death of the testator; and there-[703]fore, unless the legatee survive the testator, the legacy does not vest in him.

2. When a legacy is made payable to a nominatim legatee at a certain fixed period, however remote, or at a time that must arrive, although it is uncertain when,—the legacy is held to vest at the death of the testator (dies legati cedit), although the period of payment is postponed (sed not venit).

3. When a legacy is made payable to an individual on the occurrence of an event which is in its own nature uncertain, or on the arrival of a period which may never come at all,—the legacy does not vest, unless and until the condition is purified by the occurrence of the event, or the arrival of the period. (Dies incertus pro

it should accresce to the survivors equally. Nothing can be more like to the present case, except that the deed there did not contain the clause excepting from the right of the survivors the case of a child dying before the shares were payable, but leaving issue. But what was the question, and the ground of judgment? It was entirely on the implied condition, 'si sine liberis decesserit,' as qualifying the farther institution of the survivors. No one imagined or attempted to argue, that, independent of that special case of a child left, which stands on a peculiar presumption of equity, the share of the residue could have been held to be vested in the child predeceasing Mrs. Houston, to the effect of supporting a conveyance to a stranger. The whole pleadings and opinions assumed the reverse. But wherein does this case differ? Essentially in this only, that here the testator has so provided for that case of a child dying before the fund was set free, but leaving issue, as to shew that in actual intention he meant precisely what in Wallace's case was presumed on a known rule of law, with the additional circumstance of a positive exclusion of the child if not in life when the contingency emerged. No question, Mary Paterson's children must take, and any child of Alexander would have taken also. But does it follow, that either on general law, or on the provisions of this deed, there was a vesting in them to transmit the right, independent of the conditio si sine, etc. or the special provision of the testator? The Lord Ordinary thinks not.

"The case of Mirrlees, 17th May 1826, (Mirrlees v. Mathie, 17th May 1826, S. and D. 591, new ed. 599.) was not fairly tried on the material question, and at any rate was different in essential points, though bearing a resemblance to this case in some particulars.

J. W. M."

conditione habetur). But as soon as the condition is purified, the right vests, although the legatee may die before it be possible to obtain payment (Digest, lib. 36, tit. 2, l. 31; Codex, lib. 6, tit. 53, l. 3; Wallace v. Wallace, 28th Jan. 1807 (Mor. Dict., App. 6, voce Clause); Sess. Papers, Adv. Lib. 1806-7, II. 267; Semple, 15th Nov. 1792, Mor. 8108; Hume v. Hume, 28th Jan. 1807, not reported, but see Hume's MS. Notes; Leitch's Trustees v. Leitch and others, 2d June 1826, F.C. and 3 W. and S. 366-379; Mirrlees v. Mathie, 17th May 1826, F. C.; Smith v. M'Beth, 30th May 1834, F. C.; Aikman v. Marchbanks and Brockie, 18th Feb. 1836, F. C. and 14 D., B., and M., 521).

Where legatees are not mentioned nominatim, but are called as a class of persons who may or may not exist, or who may be more or fewer in number, the rule as to the vesting of the bequest in any of the contingent legatees is different from that which applies to nominatim legatees. The most extraordinary instance of this kind of legacies is where they are left to the children of an existing individual, or to the issue of a subsisting marriage. Where the children of an individual are called, there must exist an uncertainty as to the [704] number of the legatees until the death of the parent. Where the issue of a marriage are called, the same uncertainty must continue until the dissolution of the marriage. In both these cases, therefore, the presumption is, that the testator did not intend that the right should vest at all during the subsistence of the uncertainty. It very often happens that whilst a legacy or a residue is given to children, a liferent is given to the parent, by which the term of payment is postponed until the parent's death; and in this way the period of payment comes to coincide with the vesting of the right by the termination of the uncertainty as to the legatees. But this is merely an accidental coincidence. The coincidence does not take place where the issue of a marriage are called as legatees, and where a conjunct liferent is given to the spouses. In such a case the legacy vests on the death of either parent, although the period of payment does not arrive until the death of both (Glendinning and Ghaunt v. Walker and others, 30th Nov. 1825, Fac. Coll., and 4 S. and D. 237, new ed. p. 241; Dick v. Gillies, 4th July 1828, 6 S. and D. 1066, new ed.; Clavering v. Clavering, 12th Nov. 1833, (by the Lord Ordinary) rep. in 2 S. and M'L. 320 (note); Scougalls v. Birch or Walker, 9th July 1834, 12 D., B., and M., 910, affirmed on appeal, 2 S. and M'L. 305; Buchanan v. Downie, 12th Feb. 1830, F. C., and 8 S. D., and B., 516).

The cases now cited afford instances of a provision made under a trust deed to the children of a particular person, in which case the uncertainty as to the person and number of the beneficiaries, continues during the life of that parent. But cases sometimes occur where the beneficiaries are described as the children or the issue of a particular marriage. In such cases, the dissolution of the marriage, by the death of either of the parents, is the event which puts an end to the uncertainty. This, to be sure, may not be the term of payment, where a conjunct liferent is provided to the two [705] parents. But still, by the death of either parent, the children of the marriage are finally ascertained; there no longer remains any uncertainty as to the number or persons of the beneficiaries, nor any objection in principle to the vesting of the fee, under the burden of the surviving parent's liferent (Sivright v. Dallas, 27th Jan. 1824, Fac. Coll., and 2 S. and D. 643, new ed. 543).

Certain terms of payment are specified, viz. the marriage or majority of the legatees; but the period at which the legacy is to vest is nowhere expressly stated. The mere circumstance that the whole or a portion of the estate bequeathed is subject to the interest of an annuitant or liferenter in no respect affects its vesting according to law, although it may afford a very good reason why the testator should provide that the legacy should not be paid, even at the specified term of payment, if the fund from which it is to be paid is not at the term of payment released from the operation of the liferent. The testator has created a liferent over certain funds, the fee of which he has also disposed of; and as he has specified no period at which the fee is to vest in the party to whom it has been so disposed of, it is clear that it must legally vest in that party upon the death of the testator. The payment was necessarily postponed, not with reference to the circumstances of the legatee, but to the state of the property (Atkins v. Hiccocks, 1 Atky. 500). The class of legatees must answer the description at the time the gift was to take effect.

Where several legatees are called together, there is frequently a substitution of the survivor or the survivors. The effect of such a provision may be, either that the [706] survivors are to take after the original legatees, which is the case of proper substitution, or else that they are to take in case some of the original legatees fail without having taken at all, which is the case of conditional institution.

It may be well to consider the clause of destination which occurs in the present case, in both of these lights. There is here a destination in favour of seven individuals, "share and share alike, and the survivors or survivor of them." Now, if this provision in favour of the survivors or survivor be considered as a proper substitution, its effect merely was, that as each of the individual legatees died their right of legacy should pass by succession to the survivors, provided that no alterations had been made by the decessing legatee upon this order of succession. The survivors, being understood to take by succession, were of course liable to have that succession disappointed by the deed of the original legatee, in whom the right is supposed to have been previously vested. An instance of proper substitution occurred in the case of Duncan and others v. Miles and others, 27th June 1809 (Fac. Coll.). If, again, it be considered as a case of conditional institution, the condition was purified by the legatee's survivance of the testator.

By the application of these rules to the present case it follows that the legatees must survive the testator, but it is by no means necessary that they should survive the annuitants who are appointed to liferent certain parts of the residue. The existence of these annuitants may delay the payment of such parts of the residue as are employed to meet the annuities, but cannot prevent [707] the vesting of the legatees' right. The meaning of the term survivors or survivor is plainly the survivors or survivor of the testator. The surplus of the estate, after a sum is set apart for answering the annuities, clearly became vested in the legatees at the death of the testator, though the enjoyment thereof, except in so far as necessary for the maintenance of the legatees, might be postponed till their majority or marriage; and the same words cannot be read differently as to portions of the same fund. In Cripps v. Woolcott (4 Mad. 11), by Sir John Leach, words of survivorship were referred to the period of division and enjoyment, but there the meaning put on survivor is inconsistent with that in Doe v. Prigg, 8 Barn. and Cress. 231. (See judgment as delivered by Bayley, J. (8 B. and C. 235)), where it was held that the term "surviving" referred to the testator's death; the question being now sub judice in a case before the Lord Chancellor (Wordsworth v. Wood, (since decided,) 4th Dec. 1839); and see also Hill v. Chapman (1 Ves. jun. 405).

In the Cross Appeal.—The trustees of Mrs. Fotheringham, who there appeared as respondents, maintained, that it was clear from the terms of the sixth purpose of the trust, that the legacies to George and Thomas Paterson ought not to be deducted from the capital invested for answering the annuities. The whole residue of the estate, after payment of debts and other onerous obligations, "whatever it might be," was directed to be invested in payment of the annuitants, if there were not otherwise funds for the purpose; in short, with the exceptions above referred to, and the payment of the legacy to Mrs. Alexander, these annuities were to be at all events secured to the full extent of funds left by the [708] testator. These were clearly the primary objects and purposes of the trust; every subsequent bequest was plainly subsidiary thereto.

Respondents.—It being admitted that the will is to be construed according to the enixa voluntas of the testator, the clear inference is that Alexander Paterson's share did not vest, in respect he did not survive Mrs. Fotheringham. Till the death of the annuitants there was no vesting of the legacies, which therefore depended on contingencies; Alexander Paterson's share did not vest because the event of the fund being tangible had not arrived. When a trust is granted for the protection of the interest of various substitutes the deed subsists, and enures to the protection of all parties interested. The view of the appellants is sufficiently met by the authorities. The case of Wallace (Mor. App. voce Clause, No. 6) illustrates the effect of a destination of a residuary trust fund, after the death of a liferentrix, to a class of persons and the survivors of them, and shews that the survivance of such term of division and payment was a condition precedent of such right, even although it had been also qualified with an express declaration that the shares were to be payable to such persons on their respectively attaining majority or being married. See also Lawsons v. Stewart (2 W. and S. 625); Davidson v. Miln, 13th Feb. 1828

(6 S. and D. 536); Buchanan, 12th Feb. 1830 (8 S., D., and B., 516); Mowbray v. Scougall, 9th July 1834 (12 D., B., and M., 910); and in the House of Lords, 31st August 1835 (S.C. 2 S. and M'L. 305).

[709] But even although the right to a share of the fee or capital should be held to have vested in Alexander Paterson in his lifetime, yet that right could not be defeated by the gratuitous settlement on which the appellants founded. A right to two or more parties jointly, subject to a condition of accretion in favour of the survivor of them, communicates to each of the joint owners not only a qualified right to his or her own share, but a conditional right to the other shares,—not to be defeated gratuitously, while it remains in the possession of a trustee subject to its ultimate destination. Bissett, 26th Nov. 1799 (Mor. App. 1 voce Deathbed, No. 2); Seton, 6th March 1793 (Mor. 4219); Ersk. b. 3, tit. 8, s. 44, and the case there cited.

In the Cross Appeal.—According to the sixth purpose of the trust, the funds (the interest of which was to be paid to the annuitants) were to consist of the residue of the trust estate, after deducting the provisions to George and Thomas Paterson; the yearly sums which were divisible between the annuitants could not exceed the interest or dividends arising from such residue. The provisions to George and Thomas Paterson were expressly directed to be paid to them at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the testator's death, and to bear interest from the said term of payment till paid, and that not subject to any qualification whatever in favour of the annuitants.

Lord Chancellor (16th July).—My Lords, on one part of this case I confess I am surprised that such a decision should have been made; more especially when I find it must have been twice argued, first before the Lord Ordinary, [710] and afterwards before the Inner House; for it appears to me, though there is a little discrepancy between the two clauses, taking the whole instrument together there is not a foundation for the argument. The author of the deed directs certain sums to be invested for the payment of three annuities to his sisters, in the event that the residue of his funds and estate should be sufficient for that purpose, after payment of all the debts, fulfilment of all obligations in which he might stand bound at the time of his death, payment of the expenses attendant on the execution of the trust, and of £500 to his sister, Mrs. Alexander; but if the residue of his funds and estate shall not be sufficient for yielding the aforesaid annuities thereby settled on his sisters, they should be reduced accordingly, not enumerating in that list the deductions from the capital monies required for the purpose of paying portions of £1000 to George and Thomas Paterson. By a subsequent part of the same deed he directs the payment of £1000 to those two persons; and then he says, there shall be paid a certain sum after his death; “the remainder of the said residue being to be vested and laid out for yielding the said annuities hereby provided as aforesaid, the above-mentioned eventual legacies being to be paid to the said George and Thomas Paterson at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after my death, with interest from the said term of payment till paid.” He gives, therefore, £1000 each to those individuals, to be paid at a certain specified time after his own death, and he directs that the remainder of the residue shall be invested and laid out for yielding the annuities. He has omitted, undoubtedly, in the first enumeration, the deduction from the residue to realize these sums, though [711] he has fixed the precise period at which they are to be paid. The question being whether those sums are to be paid to the prejudice of the annuitants, the Court have held that the annuitants are to be paid in full, notwithstanding the express direction in the deed that these legacies are to be paid within a certain time after his death. It appears to me there is no room for dispute as to the necessity of giving effect to that direction; that exhausts one of the appeals. The judgment of this House must interpose to set that right. With regard to the other clauses, they are not consistent with each other; and I would, therefore, propose to your Lordships to reserve the consideration of the questions arising out of these till Thursday next, when your Lordships will have had an opportunity of looking more particularly into them.

Further consideration adjourned.

Lord Chancellor (18th July).—My Lords, this case was adjourned for the purpose of giving your Lordships an opportunity of looking over the deed on which the question arises. There were two appeals: one as to the payment of two sums of £1000 each, which by the judgment of the Court of Session it had been found were not payable, except subject to annuities. The note of the Lord Ordinary sets out the grounds on which he had come to that conclusion, stating that "The sixth provision of the conditional legacies to George and Thomas Paterson, however it may seem to interfere with the investment of the funds for securing the annuities contains no declaration that the annuities shall be at all diminished on account of those legacies. It is entirely a question of intention; but the provision of [712] the annuities being the first in order, and from its nature presumed to be of first importance in the testator's mind, and the words being clear, the Lord Ordinary thinks that nothing but the most express words in a later part of the deed could be held to take away a right so explicitly given."

The decision of the Lord Ordinary, therefore, agreeably with that of the Inner House, proceeds upon this, that there is nothing to shew that the annuities were to be diminished on account of the legacies, and that unless there are express words in the latter part of the deed, they will not have the effect of taking away the right that is expressly given in the early part of the deed. There are certain words contained in this deed which must by some accident have been overlooked. In the earlier part of the deed, after directing payment of his debts, and fulfilment of the obligations existing at the time of his death, payment of the expenses attendant on the execution of the trust and of £500 to his sister Mrs. Alexander, he directs that, in the event of the residue of the proceeds of his funds not being sufficient, the whole shall be invested in the annuities. There is, in that enumeration, no doubt, no mention of those legacies to George and Thomas Paterson; but he provides in what events the property he might leave to his legatees shall be payable. In the event of the residue being £15,000 or upwards, then he directs £1000 to be paid to each of George and Thomas Paterson. If it shall be under £15,000 and not less than £8000, then that George and Thomas Paterson shall only have £500 sterling each. The remainder of the said estate was to be vested and laid out for yielding the annuities as aforesaid. But if such residue shall not amount to £8000, then he says, [713] "It is my intention that the said George and Thomas Paterson shall not be entitled to receive any thing whatever under this deed; and I direct my said trustees and trustee to regulate themselves accordingly; the above-mentioned eventual legacies being to be payable to the said George and Thomas Paterson at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after my death, with interest from said term of payment till paid." There is a distinct period fixed at which those legacies shall be paid; and it is obvious that those legacies are to be paid even in the event of there not being sufficient to provide for the payment of those annuities and those sums without a diminution of the amount of the annuities. I apprehend, therefore, it is quite clear there is that which the Lord Ordinary says would be sufficient. There is evidently a statement in the latter part of the deed giving a construction which would be undoubtedly the proper construction if there had been such a provision in the other part of the deed; taking then the whole together, I apprehend there is no doubt that the decision of the court below is incorrect, and that these legacies of £1000 each are payable at the time therein directed, though that may interfere with the payment of the annuities.

The other question which arises is undoubtedly a question of much greater difficulty, turning entirely upon the construction of this instrument, and how the words "survivors or survivor" are to be understood to apply,—whether at the period of the testator's death, or at the several periods at which the several sums he has given by this instrument are to be payable, i.e. referring the payment of any surplus from the sums set apart to [714] answer the several annuities, together with these sums, to the periods at which the several annuitants might die, by which death the funds, according to the expression used in this deed, would be tangible.

My Lords, in a case of this kind, very little assistance is to be derived from reference to authorities, for though the general rules are very well understood, both in this country and in Scotland, yet when there are particular expressions used on the face of an instrument leading to the indication of intention, they must govern; the general rules apply only where there is no particular indication. The earlier judgments in this country, in cases where there is nothing to lead to the contrary conclusion as to the testator's intention, have a very strong tendency to refer the provision to the period of the testator's death. The later cases have very much departed from that rule, and notwithstanding the very strong opinion expressed by Sir John Leach in one of the cases referred to (ante, p. 707), it may be considered that the point is not now very clearly established as a distinct proposition; but that in the one class of cases or the other we must be regulated by the expressions used by the testator. Your Lordships must endeavour to collect the inference to be drawn from these expressions; it is impossible to reconcile all the expressions in this instrument.

The testator has given several annuities of £400, £400, and £200 to his three sisters, and he has directed his trustees to invest capital sufficient to secure those annuities. He has then provided for two events, that of there being more money belonging to his estate than sufficient for the purpose of securing the payment of the annuities; [715] and he has provided for another event, that of his estate not being adequate to provide for the payment of all those annuities. He directs that if the estate is not sufficient for the payment of all those annuities, then the annuities shall abate; but if there be more than sufficient, if there be a surplus, he directs that the surplus, together with the invested sums when tangible by the deaths of the said annuitants respectively, shall be paid by the trustees thus, "or in the event of there being no surplus, then the said invested sums, when tangible as aforesaid, shall be paid to 'seven persons,' share and share alike, and the survivors or survivor of them, and that at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after their respectively attaining twenty-one or being married."

Now, in speaking of the death of the annuitants, and the period therefore at which these various sums would become what he calls tangible, he refers to those periods as the periods at which the sums would be to be paid; he also refers to two other periods, at which he says they shall be paid, namely, when the legatees attained twenty-one or were married. It is obvious one of the periods referred to is when such invested sums should become tangible by the death of the annuitants, the other refers to the period at which the annuitants should respectively marry or attain twenty-one; and looking therefore at the subsequent clauses, the author of this instrument has given us this clue to his meaning, that in speaking of the periods of payment he speaks of the periods at which the property would become tangible, and also the periods at which the parties should die or attain twenty-one.

Then there are four provisions with reference to the [716] interests of those several legatees. The question will be, whether in directing those provisions there is any indication of intention sufficient to shew what he means by the words "the survivors or survivor of them,"—to what period they should apply. He provides first that the legatees should have maintenance payable out of their shares; secondly, there is a power to the trustees to advance to Alexander, who is one of the legatees, for his outfit and establishment, the whole or any part of the sum falling to his share. Now those two provisions evidently assume that the property, or some portion at least of the property, has become vested in enjoyment, or is capable of enjoyment by the intermediate interests being removed before the legatee attains majority or is married. It is not a fund of which any other persons could have the enjoyment; he must have meant maintenance out of a fund belonging to the legatee appropriated to the legatee, and he provides for the maintenance of the legatee for the period during which from personal inability he was not in the enjoyment of it, namely, before majority or marriage. When he authorizes the advance to Alexander of any part of the sum falling to him, he must mean the share which was his, subject to personal disability, in which case the trustees are authorized to advance to him any portion of the sum they might think proper. In the same way, in the third place, a power is given to the trustees to settle and secure the shares falling to all or any of the female legatees, so as to enable them to draw the interest of their shares during their lives, and the capital of their shares to go to their heirs and executors. It is not absolutely necessary that the property for that purpose should be in possession, because the settlement might be [717] made prospectively, in order to secure the share which might eventually become theirs. The great probability is, that if the question had arisen upon these provisions, it would have been considered that those were shares of what they were entitled to in possession, but with a power given to the trustees to intercept the actual enjoyment for the purpose of settling upon them for life, with remainder to those that might come after them.

But then, my Lords, comes the provision upon which the great question arises. It is provided, that if any of the legatees die before the term of payment (one or more, as the case may be) of these shares, leaving issue which shall be in life at the time the parent would have been entitled to have received payment of their shares had they survived, such issue shall take the parent's share at the time at which such deceasing parents would have been entitled to receive the same if they had been in life.

Now the way of trying the question upon this provision appears to me to be this:—suppose the shares were all vested at the time contended for by the appellants, namely, at the moment of the testator's death, and not, as contended for on the other hand, that the vesting was postponed during the continuance of the particular interests of the annuitants:—if the legacies vested, and the term of payment only was postponed, it is singular that a provision should be made for the children of those particular parties who would be provided for without it, because it would become the property of the parent, and the parent would of course have dominion over it, for the purpose of providing for his children.

But it is hardly necessary to reason upon the impro-[718]-bability of that being the testator's intention, because, though he has before expressed other periods of payment, namely, that the payment is to depend on attaining twenty-one or marriage, yet the payment even at these terms is to depend upon the sums becoming tangible by the death of the annuitants. When he therefore refers to the time at which the legatees are to be entitled to their legacies he refers expressly to the time at which the capital shall become tangible, the terms of payment referred to as "terms of payment (one or more) of their shares as aforesaid" are dependent entirely upon the fact of the funds having become tangible by the death of the annuitants. A legatee attaining twenty-one and marrying, would have no power over his legacy expectant upon the death of an annuitant, his or her death, before the death of the annuitants, would give the legacy to his or her children; if the legatee died before the annuitant, leaving a child, the legatee clearly would not take, the child is to come in his place. Nothing is more improbable than that the donor should intend to provide for the children of a legatee who should attain twenty-one, and marry, as against the parent, but it is very natural that he should wish to secure the legacy to the family of a legatee who should die before he became entitled, leaving children. It seems to me clear that the testator conceived that if the legatee should die before the funds became tangible, such funds would not belong to the legatee. He says, "the payment of the share which the father or mother would have become entitled to receive had they survived," and he gives it to such children only as shall be in life at those times; if the term "survivors" refers to the times at which the funds would become tangible, and therefore divisible, [719] the provision is natural and consistent, as it only secures to the family of each legatee dying before the time of payment, leaving issue, the benefit of the legacy against the other surviving legatees.

It is from this clause, and this clause only, it appears to me that the testator's intention may fairly be inferred; and it does appear to me that the provision in that clause in favour of children is not consistent with the vesting of the capital at the time of the testator's death; that the provisions are not consistent with what must have been his obvious wish if he had looked to the vesting of the capital either at that period or at the time when a legatee became of age or was married; that it can be reconciled only with his applying it to the survivorship, at the periods at which the funds constituting the capital might be relieved from the payment of the annuities. I think that your Lordships will come to the conclusion that there is sufficient upon the face of this instrument to shew that the term "survivor" does not refer to the period of his own death, but that it refers to the period at which those sums would become tangible: that would therefore lead to an affirmance of the interlocutor appealed against. With regard to the other question, the interlocutor brought before your Lordships by the cross appeal must be reversed. Your Lordships have not before you the means by which this can be set right here. I apprehend that the form of the order will be to affirm the interlocutors in the original appeal, and to vary them so far as relates to the legacies, declaring that those legacies were payable to George and Thomas Paterson, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the testator's death, and then to remit it to the Court below, to [720] carry into effect that order, because your Lordships have not the proceedings in that state before you which will enable you to settle the question finally. I understand that the cause is in that state which will enable the Court below to proceed upon that declaration.

Lord Advocate.—Certainly, my Lords.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said original petition and appeal be and the same is hereby dismissed this House; and that the said interlocutors, so far as complained of in the said original appeal, be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered and adjudged, That the part of the said interlocutors which is complained of in the said cross appeal be varied, by omitting so much thereof as finds that the claim to such annuities cannot be diminished or affected by the subsequent provision of the two legacies to George and Thomas Patersons by the sixth purpose of the said trust, or by the interests accruing on those provisions: And it is declared, That the legacies of one thousand pounds sterling to each of the said George and Thomas Patersons (under the trust disposition and settlement of Alexander Porterfield esquire) were payable to the said George and Thomas Patersons at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the said testator; and that the sum applicable to the payment of the annuities payable under the said trust disposition and settlement was the residue of the said trust fund, after deducting as well the testator's debts and obligations, the expenses of the trust, and the legacy of five hundred pounds to Mrs. Alexander, as the said two legacies payable to the said George and Thomas Patersons: And it is further ordered, That the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be just, and consistent with this declaration and judgment.

[721]      APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

MALCOLM STEWART, Esq., of Atholl Bank, Appellant.—Lord Advocate (Rutherford—James Anderson; WILLIAM GLOAG, Esq., residing in Perth, Manager, and Others, the Ordinary Directors, of the County and City of Perth Fire Insurance Company of Scotland, for themselves, and for behoof the said Company and whole individual Members thereof, Respondents.—Pemberton—A. McNeill [25th July 1839].

[Mews' Dig. i. 331; xi. 829.]

Advocation—Amendment of the Libel—Practice.—An insurance company raised an action against one of their former partners and directors to have him ordained to concur in signing a discharge of an heritable debt which stood in his name; an extended deed of discharge was produced along with the summons, and the conclusion of the libel was to ordain the defender "to grant, execute, and deliver to the pursuers the aforesaid discharge and renunciation, to be produced at calling hereof;" the defender stated objections to signing the deed in the shape it then stood; the pursuers craved leave to amend the summons by inserting the words "or such valid and sufficient discharge and renunciation of the said debts as the debtor therein is bound to receive;" the defender opposed the amendment, and the sheriff found the proposal incompetent, "because changing and extending the nature [722] and conclusions of the libel." The record was closed, and the sheriff found that the defender was not bound to execute the deed libelled on and produced, but suggested alterations which he, the sheriff, thought necessary; and a new deed accordingly altered, having been lodged in process, the sheriff "decerned the defender to subscribe the amended deed of discharge," which the defender refused to do, and advocated; the pursuers did not advocate on the ground of refusal to allow the amendment, neither did they propose to open up the record, and state an additional plea in law on that point: Held (reversing the judgment of the court, but affirming the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary) that the defender was not bound to sign the only deed which he was called upon by the summons to subscribe.

Observed, per L. C.—(1.) In courts of equity, under a prayer for general relief, the court is at liberty to give relief consistently with the case stated, but there the court never give relief inconsistent with the case stated; and if the case stated had been that of the delivery of a particular instrument, and the demand of the execution of that particular instrument, and it turned out that the defender was not bound to execute that instrument, no court would think of directing the execution, not of the deed itself, but of some other deed which the court should take upon itself to frame and tender to the party. (2.) It is well understood now, and settled to be the practice in England, that when a judgment has been pronounced, and one party complains and brings the judgment under review by a regular course of appeal to a superior court, the other party, if he has any thing to allege against the judgment, is at liberty to state his objections to the judgment in the same proceeding. It is a constant rule in chancery, that if a party appeals against part of an order, the appeal is open as to the rest; and that is the whole effect of the Scotch case of Cunningham v. Duncan, 17th July 1837 (2 Sh. and M'Lean, 984), and the judgment in that case did not go the length of letting in the parties to amend in the superior court.

[723] The action commenced by an ordinary summons before the sheriff of Perth, at the instance of Mr. Gloag and other directors of the Perth Fire Insurance Company, against the defender Mr. Stewart, dated the 26th of May 1835, and which set forth, that by the thirty-fifth article of the copartnery of the said County and City of Perth Fire Insurance Company, it is stipulated, "That all dispositions, assignments, securities, and other writings whatsoever to be executed in favour of the company shall be taken to and in name of the manager and the three junior ordinary directors, or those standing at the bottom of the list of such directors for the time, or such other three of the ordinary directors as the directors or major number of them may appoint, and to the survivors or survivor of them, and their or his assignees; but in trust always for themselves and the whole other partners of the company, future as well as present; and which trustees and their foresaids, in whose favour such securities and writings shall be taken and conceived, shall be bound at any time when required to denude themselves by habile conveyances of the said trust property, but that always at the expense of the company, and to convey the same to such person or persons, and upon such terms, and under such conditions and declarations, as shall be appointed by the directors, with warrantance from their own facts and deeds; and all dispositions, assignments, renunciations, bonds, contracts, submissions, and other deeds whatsoever to be executed by the company shall in like manner be signed and executed by the manager and the said three ordinary directors at the bottom of the list for the time being as aforesaid, or [724] such other three of the ordinary directors for the time as the directors or majority of them may appoint, unless the same shall happen to relate to any of the subjects or matters vested in trust, as above written, in which case the said deeds to be executed by the company shall be signed and executed by the proper trustees, but always under the control and superintendence of the directors as aforesaid." That the defender was a partner of said company, and on 21st March 1832 was elected director, and acted as such; he was one of the three junior ordinary directors during the remainder of the year 1832, and was present at a meeting of the ordinary directors, on 7th May 1832, at which he was elected preses, and as such subscribed the minute of the meeting, when it was agreed to advance a sum of £1400 sterling upon an assignment of a security held over the lands and estate of Kinloch, the property of John Campbell esq., and it was then agreed that the manager should advance the said sum as soon as the necessary assignation could be prepared; that the sum was, in terms of said minute, advanced by assignation dated 15th May 1832, which, in terms of the company's contract, was taken to the manager, and two other parties and the defender, as the three junior ordinary directors, and to the survivors or survivor of them, and their or his assignees, in trust always for themselves and the whole other partners of the company, future as well as present; that the said John Campbell intimated his intention to pay off the said debt to the manager of said company, and a discharge and renunciation was prepared by the agent of Mr. Campbell, and subscribed by the said William Gloag as manager and the two other directors, and on the 28th day of December 1834 it was intimated [725] that Mr. Campbell's agent was ready to pay the amount of the said heritable debt, and interest due thereon, on receiving the discharge and renunciation; "but in consequence of the said defender refusing to execute the said discharge and renunciation unless certain clauses were inserted therein, to which the agent for Mr. Campbell would not agree, the pursuers have been unable to obtain a settlement of the said debt and interest; therefore the said defender ought and should be decerned and ordained to grant, execute, and deliver to the pursuers the fore-said discharge and renunciation, to be produced at calling hereof."

In defence it was admitted that the defender was at one time a shareholder and a director of the company, but that he had ceased to hold shares therein. His objections to sign the deed were thus stated:—

"Subsequent to the period when the defender's connexion with the company so terminated, and, as he thinks, about the time mentioned in the summons, the agent of the pursuers presented to him the discharge and renunciation libelled, requiring him to subscribe the same as a director of said company. This deed proceeds in name of Mr. Gloag, the present pursuer, as manager of the company, and Mr. Robert Bisset, writer in Perth, Malcolm Stewart esquire, of Atholl Bank, and George Lawson Cornfute, manufacturer in Perth, three of the ordinary directors of the said company, for themselves and the whole other partners of the said company, future as well as present; and the defender, in an after part of the deed, as trustee or director and for [726] behoof of said company, is made to exoner and discharge the debtor in the bond, and to bind himself, and the whole partners of the company, in absolute warrandice of the discharge; the defender refused and still refuses to subscribe this deed, because it sets forth, on the face of it, a positive falsehood. It proposes to make the defender a party to it in a false and fraudulent character, namely, as a director of the company, while in point of fact, he is no director, having long ago ceased to be so, and notified this to the public through the medium of the local newspapers;" and it was pleaded that the conclusion of the action being, that the defender should be ordained to execute a particular deed in the character of a director of the Perth Fire Insurance Company, but the defender not being, in point of fact, either a director, shareholder, or in any way connected with the company, such conclusion is incompetent, because the defender cannot be compelled to assume and act in a false and fictitious character, or to execute any deed at variance with the fact, or write himself down a director, while he is neither a director nor a shareholder of the said company; and that the defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

Upon advising the case afterwards, with replies for the pursuers and duplies for the defender, the sheriff, on 25th September 1835, ordered the parties to state, within a certain period, whether they were willing to hold their pleadings as containing their full and final statement of facts. Against this interlocutor the pursuers reclaimed, craving, before closing the record, to be allowed to amend their libel in certain terms; [727] the sheriff substitute, by interlocutor of 18th November 1835, found, "that the same is incompetent, because changing and extending the nature and conclusions of the libel, and refuses the motion to amend." *

* "Note.—The conclusions of a summons may be restricted by a minute, without any amendment, because that the greater comprehends the less. But it is incompetent to change the nature of the action, or to extend its conclusions. In this case the conclusions are specific to compel the defender to execute a certain deed, and the amendment craved is to generalize the conclusions, so as to embrace any deed necessary for the end sought. Although such amendment cannot, on correct principles, be permitted, perhaps it is unnecessary, because when the deed libelled is objected

Thereafter the record was closed, and the following interlocutor pronounced: "Perth, 16th December 1835. Having advised the closed record, before answer, appoints the pursuers, between and the 23d current, to produce the original assignation of date 15th May 1832, or certified copy thereof." And the assignation ordered by the last-quoted interlocutor having been produced, the sheriff substitute (23d December 1835) found, "that the defender, having admittedly accepted the office of one of the directors of the pursuers' company, is bound at common law, and under the rules of the company, to execute all writings necessary for the ordinary management of the business of the company, and specially for the [728] transfer and discharge of all such securities as may have been taken in name of the said defender as one of the said company directors, and, as such, one of the trustees for the company; but finds that the defender, as admittedly no longer a partner, nor of consequence a director, in the said company, is not bound to subscribe any deed or writing as may be inconsistent with the said last-mentioned fact, and which, in any way, recognizes him as being, at the time of subscribing the same, a partner in the said company; therefore, requires the pursuers to delete from the discharge, No. 3 of process, the words 'three of the ordinary directors of the said company, for ourselves and the whole other partners of the said company, future as well as present,' which words are in the preamble in the said deed, and are unnecessary as well as inconsistent with fact; requires the pursuers farther to introduce after the words 'to and in favour of,' which occur on the first line of the fourth page of the said deed, the words as they stand in this dispositive clause of the disposition and assignation, No. 13 of process, as follows, 'We the said William Gloag, manager of the said company, etc., and to and in favour of us the said Robert Bisset, Malcolm Stewart, and George Lawson Cornfute, three of the then ordinary directors of the said company,' and thereon deleting the words, 'us, as managers, and' on the first line of the said fourth page; farther, requires the pursuers to delete the words 'and directors foresaid' on the margin of page fifth, and the word 'other' on the seventeenth line from the top, and the words 'ourselves and' on the fourth, and the word 'other' on the [729] third line from the foot of the sixth page of the said discharge, these words being all unnecessary, and of doubtful consistency with the fact that the said defender is not now a partner of the said company: Appoints the said deed, as so amended, to be of new engrossed and produced in process, and thereupon decerns the defender to subscribe the same, reserving consideration of the farther conclusions of the summons, and decerns." To which interlocutor the sheriff substitute (10th February 1836) adhered.* to by the defender, on certain technical grounds, there appears no incompetency in the court making such alterations on the deed as may obviate these objections, and decerning for execution of the deed so amended. No change would be made on the action, but this result would arise from the defence, and the court would decern in terms of the libel as modified by the defence. Is it not the recognized rule of law that where the nomination does not specially stipulate to the contrary a majority of the trustees possess the whole powers of the trust? Stair, b. i. tit. 12, sect. 13; 12th June 1824, Campbell v. M'Intyre. In the case, 15th February 1827, Lord Lynedoch, (affirmed) the deed declared three to be a quorum, to which number the trustees were reduced."

* "Note.—The defender's case has been pled with remarkable ability in the reclaiming petition, remarkable the more that a very trifling question has been raised into one of importance. It is permitted to explain the conclusions of a summons by the narrative. The narrative of the summons in this action clearly shows that all that was sought at the hands of this defender was a valid discharge of a certain heritable security, in the constitution of which the defender's name was assumed as one of the trustees for the creditors in the debt. The conclusion, no doubt, bears reference to a certain writing produced as the discharge sought at the defender's hands, and there is no question but that the conclusion might have been framed in more general terms. The defence was that the defender was not bound to subscribe the discharge in the precise words used in the writing put in. But if the objectionable words were removed there existed no other legal defence against becoming a party to the deed. The court has adopted the defence, and ordered the objectionable words to be expunged, and the deed, as so expunged, to be subscribed. The defender

[730] And again, (25th March 1836,) having advised with the sheriff, adhered, the sheriff adding the following note, "This case is attended with very considerable difficulty; it involves an important point in regard to the forms of process, and the sheriff does not think that there are sufficient grounds to warrant an alteration in the judgment appealed from."

The pursuers then produced a discharge and renunciation, with alterations as appointed by the sheriff substitute, and craved that the defender might be ordained to subscribe the same, when the sheriff substitute (25th May 1836) "allowed the defender to see the extended discharge, and to state any special objections against his being ordained to subscribe the same between and the 7th day of June next." On 24th June the sheriff substitute, "on the defender's failure to state any special objections to the amended deed of discharge, decerns the defender to subscribe the same."

[731] To which interlocutor the sheriff substitute (13th July 1836) adhered,* and the sheriff, on appeal, adhered.

Stewart advocated to the Court of Session, and gave in a note of additional pleas in law, in these terms:—1. The advocator, having ceased to be a director or a partner of the County and City of Perth Fire Insurance Company, was not bound to execute the deed libelled on. 2. The record having been closed on a summons which concluded specifically to have the advocator ordained to execute the discharge libelled and produced with it, and the sheriff having found that the advocator was not bound to execute that deed, the advocator ought to have been assoilzied or the action dismissed. 3. It was incompetent for the sheriff to order a new deed to be prepared, or the old one remodelled, under the conclusions of the respondents' summons, and the narrative on which they proceeded, more especially as the grantee of the now pleads that the action must fall, because the deed which he is decerned to execute is no longer the deed embraced by the conclusions of the summons. With the most scrupulous observance of form, there exists a clear and obvious distinction between the substance of a deed and its mere materials. The deed wanted, and concluded for, is substantially the discharge of a certain bond, and nothing but that discharge has been decerned for, although it may be that the discharge may not be on precisely the same paper,—but even this may be effected,—and although a few words are expunged. Suppose a summons brought to compel the execution of a certain conveyance, and that there, as here, the proposed disposition is concluded for specially conform to the same produced. Suppose farther, that the defender objects that the deed so produced binds him in absolute warrandice, and that he is liable only in the restricted warrandice from fact and deed. Suppose the court sustains the defence, and ordains the deed to be corrected, so as to obviate the objection, and then decerns the same to be executed, would the defender be heard in his plea, that the pursuer must be nonsuited, because he had not succeeded in compelling the defender to execute the identical deed produced in its every word? This case is not so strong as the one supposed, because in this case no one obligation is changed, but merely the defender's designation altered from a present to a former manager of the company. With regard to the defender's plea, that the deed only negatively shows that he has ceased to be interested in the company, the answer is, that the positive evidence of that fact is in his public announcement to that effect, and there is nothing in the deed which can, by any torture of argument, be made to prove a reassumption of liabilities. His continued obligation to extricate the company from the securities contracted in his name exists both at common law and under the contract. Of course no decision can be given in this case as between the company and the debtor in the bond. If the latter refuses to pay on an ample discharge he must just take the consequences. He cannot interpose himself in the question between the company and the defender."

* "Note.—The question urged in the first branch of the petition has been long since determined by final judgments. The defender is not entitled to his expenses, seeing that he has been unsuccessful in his defence that no alteration could be permitted on the deeds of discharge as originally produced. Expenses have not been given against him, because that he has been assoilzied from the claim of interest up to the date when the deed has been finally approved."

deed by whom it was prepared was no party to the action. 4. Although the advocator might be obliged to concur, along with the existing directors, in executing a discharge and renunciation, setting forth the res verae gestae, he was not bound to appear actively, and undertake obligations on himself individually or the company collectively; and he was entitled, before being dragged into court or called upon to subscribe the deed, to revise it for his own safety and interest; and the [732] whole tenor of the deed sought to be executed was adverse to or inconsistent with the advocator's true condition and capacity. 5. At all events there were no termini habiles in the action brought by the respondents, to adjust the character and terms of the deed which the advocator was bound to concur in, or the grantee bound to accept.

Gloag, in his note of additional pleas in law, pleaded:—1. The advocator having, as director and trustee for the County and City of Perth Fire Insurance Company, held an heritable security in trust for the company, was bound to become a party to any deed necessary for enabling the company to receive payment of the sum so secured. 2. The advocator having absolutely refused to become a party to the execution of any such deed, upon the sole ground of his having ceased to be a shareholder in the company, and therefore not under any obligation to execute any such deed, an action became necessary with a view to compel his concurrence. 3. The only tenable objection made by the advocator to the execution of the necessary deed being that it was prepared upon the erroneous assumption that he was an actual director and partner at the time, and that objection having been removed by an alteration of the deed, and the withdrawal of the objectionable expressions, the advocator had not the slightest shadow of a pretext for withholding his subscription to the deed. 4. For the like reasons the advocator had no just interest in bringing or in insisting in the present advocacy, in respect that the only objections which were tenable against the subscription of the deed have been completely obviated, and that [733] there truly exists no disputable matter for a decision of the court between the parties.

The parties having respectively lodged their notes of additional pleas, and being satisfied with the record as made up in the inferior court, the Lord Ordinary, Corehouse, before whom the cause originally came, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"23d December 1836. The Lord Ordinary, in respect the record as closed in the inferior Court is not objected to, and the parties having each given in additional pleas in law, holds the record as closed in this court, and appoints parties to debate."

No renewal of the proposal to amend their summons was made by the (respondents) pursuers.

Lord Corehouse having been moved to the Inner House the cause came to depend before Lord Cockburn, as Ordinary, and his Lordship, on hearing parties, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"8th June 1837. The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, sustains the reasons of advocacy, advocates the cause, recalls the interlocutors of the sheriff; finds that the advocator was not bound to sign the only deed which he was called upon by the summons to subscribe; sustains this defence, assoilzies the defender, and decerns; finds him entitled to expenses incurred by him in this and in the inferior court, and remits to the auditor to tax the account thereof, and to report." And added this note:—"The original pursuers should, in prudence, have concluded generally against the defender for the execution of any proper discharge. But, instead of this, they exhibit a specific deed, already extended, and subscribed by other parties, and conclude solely [734] for the execution by the defender of this particular instrument. Perceiving that the defender had an invincible objection to sign this as it stood, they apply to the sheriff for leave to generalize the conclusion; but this the sheriff refuses, and the interlocutor containing the refusal has been allowed to become final. Yet the sheriff, by the interlocutors in question, directs the defender to set his name, not to the specific deed concluded for, but to a different deed, containing most material additions and alterations, which, in effect, just amount to the very clauses which it had been fixed could not be introduced under the summons."

The respondents reclaimed.

On advising the cause, the First Division pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Edinburgh, 21st November 1837. The Lords having considered (see their Lordships opinions in 16 D., B., and M., 91) this reclaiming note, and heard counsel for the parties, alter the interlocutor reclaimed against, repel the reasons of advocacy, and remit to the sheriff simpliciter, and decern: Find no expenses due to either party."

Stewart appealed.

Appellant.—The summons concludes for one thing, the judgment orders something different to be done; the deed, as altered, is made quite different from what the appellant was asked to sign,—so far different indeed as to involve him in liabilities with other parties; and so conscious were the respondents of the incompetency of [735] this, that they proposed to extend the grounds of their action by amending the libel. Yet the sheriff and court erroneously, under an action which did not conclude for that, ordained the appellant to subscribe the deed. The Lord Ordinary's view of the matter is the correct one. There are objections to the deed proposed to be signed, particularly in the clause of warrandice; but the question is, whether under this unamended action the appellant can be required to sign it. After closing the record in the Court of Session it was no longer competent to ask to amend the libel; the party must, under 6 Geo. 4, c. 120, abandon his action if insufficient. A deed newly engrossed, and to be executed of new, was produced, under the judgment of the sheriff; therefore it was not a deed that under this summons the appellant could be required to execute. The appellant was not bound to state any other objections to the action.

There were no other parties than the appellant and respondents to this action; the grantee, Mr. Campbell, was not made a party to it. The only issue raised by the summons was whether the deed, as proposed and prepared by the grantee's agent, should be forced upon the appellant for signature. That was given up; but without any alteration on the action, the appellant was asked to sign another deed, involving him in obligations which he did not choose to undertake. Although the deed is not set forth in terms in the summons, it has been held in the Court of Session that by simply referring in the summons to a deed to be produced it is sufficient. [Lord Chancellor.—This is important, because if the deed were set forth in the summons the [736] alterations proposed on the deed might be held to be amendments.]

A party is not entitled to bring forward new grounds of action not in his summons (Shaw's Digest, p. 207, Forbes v. Livingstone, 16th Feb. 1832, affirmed 8th July 1834; Rollo v. Campbell, 12th Jan. 1831, 9 S., D., N., and B., 260; Webster, 1st March 1823, 2 S. and D. 229, new ed.; Blincow's Trustees, 22d Jan. 1831, 9 S., D., N., and B., 317; Hyslop, 16th June 1824, 2 Sh. App. 451; M'Brien, 22d March 1826, 2 W. and S. 66; Clerk, 1 Murray, 195, 10th July 1817; and see also Lord Corehouse's opinion in the present Case, 16 D., B., and M., 91).

In Cunningham v. Duncan (House of Lords, 17th July 1837, 2 Sh. and M'Lean, 984), referred to by the respondents, there was acquiescence by the parties to the action as it stood, but reference may be made to the Lord President's opinion in Gifford v. Trail, 8th July, 7 S. and D. 854, who holds that the nature of the action is to be gathered only from the conclusions of the summons, by which the judgment is alone to be regulated.

Even where the variance lies not in the thing claimed, but in the reason for claiming it, the pursuer will not be entitled to succeed in that action. A party who concludes for payment of a sum of money as due by a bond, will not be entitled to a decree for the sum on showing that it was due under a bill. This has been frequently found. Thus, in the case of Dickie, the rubric is, "A pursuer is not entitled, without an amendment of the libel, to set forth new grounds of action in the condescendence." Much more inflexible is the rule in regard to the conclusion. A new ratio may be introduced by amendment, but in the general case a new conclusion cannot, because that would be altering [737] the basis of the action. Vide also Peacock, 26th November 1821; Jackson, 9th December 1825; Still's Trustees, 12th November 1829; Stirling, 4th March 1830; and Waldie, 2d December 1830. In all these cases the court applied the rule that a pursuer could not found on grounds of action not contained in the summons.

Now, to oblige the appellant to sign the newly engrossed deed would be to make him do what is quite out of the conclusion of the summons, and involving obligations which, at the proper stage, he will show he is not at law, independently of this matter of form, bound to undertake.

The argument of the respondents upon the point of still allowing the amendment leads to important consequences, because if they did not ask the Court of Session to allow amendments, how can they ask this House to do so? [Lord Chancellor.—In such a state of matters this House is accustomed to reverse the interlocutor, and remit to the court, when the parties may ask and the court do what is thought necessary.] The advocacy touched only the merits, not the interlocutor refusing the amendment; then there is a new closing of record in the Court of Session, which clearly shut out the amendment, no such amendment having been proposed.

Besides, there can be no amendment of the libel after the record is closed; see 6 Geo. 4, c. 120 (Judicature Act), confirmed by the case of Wilson, 11th July 1826 (Shaw's Digest, voce "Process," p. 371, sec. 5, and references).

[738] Respondents.—It is always important to keep in view Lord Eldon's (Lord Kinoulv v. Gray, 1st March 1805; House of Lords) opinion in Lord Lynedoch's case as to interfering with decisions on points of practice, and also what was observed by Lord Brougham in The Magistrates of Annan v. Farish (14th July 1837, 2 Sh. and M'Lean, 930). There is no doubt that, if the amendment had been or were still admitted, decree might be given conform to the amended action. Although no counter advocacy was brought, the amendment was not the less competent in the Court of Session, as is clear, for though Lord M'Kenzie's opinion inclined to there being no necessity for a second advocacy, the case of Cunningham v. Duncan (2 Sh. and M'Lean, 984) settled what Lord M'Kenzie held not fixed law,—that the advocacy brings up the whole cause. Here the amendment was tendered before the record was closed; and thus it was competent to the sheriff or to the superior courts to allow it to be received. There can be no ground then for dismissing an action which may be competently amended. The respondents admit that they can ask nothing but what is within the summons. [Lord Chancellor.—Can he amend now, the record being closed?] Although by 6 Geo. 4, c. 120, amendment cannot be allowed, yet when an amendment has been tendered before the record was closed, and refused by the judge, a superior court may remit to the sheriff to open up the record to allow the amendment.

The deeds were to be prepared by the directors, and executed by the parties. After repeated applications in vain, the action was raised; the appellant did not refuse [739] to sign a discharge, but objected only to particular parts of the deed as framed, because he says, "it sets forth a falsehood," he not being a director, as set forth on the deed. Liberty was refused to amend, because the sheriff thought it unnecessary; so it was not to be expected that the interlocutor so refusing would be carried to review by the respondents. [Lord Chancellor.—They do not seem to have the prayer for general relief in Scotland.] The words "to add and eik" were used in defences; and to "do otherwise as to your Lordships shall think proper," in petitions, confine the parties within the conclusions or substantial prayer of the application. But farther, the appellant now admits he is bound to execute a discharge though not under this action. The respondents do not ask for general relief, nor indeed for more than is concluded for in the summons; but they are entitled to that, under such modifications as the appellant by his defence called for as necessary. The court merely adopted the appellant's own defence, and suggests under what alterations he ought to sign the deed.

The appellant's defences and pleas in the sheriff court shew that his defence was exclusively confined to the deed setting forth erroneously that he was then a director. The deed which the party is now required to sign imports no higher obligation than is contained in the first deed. Instead of giving the respondents more it gives them less, if possible, than they ask. Instead of individual warrandice, as required in the first deed, mere general warrandice is introduced into the second. Besides no plea upon the ground was taken by the appellant.

[740] Lord Chancellor (23d July).—My Lords, in this case one cannot but regret (whether the cause of regret is to be attributed to the parties on the one side or the other is of very little consequence) the great expense which has been incurred; but it involves a question of some importance with regard to the practice of the court, and nothing would be more unsafe than to permit our judgment to be influenced by the litigious conduct of either party, and so lead to a decision which may prove very prejudicial to the general practice of the court below.

My Lords, certainly the summons is addressed to no particular instrument; the pursuer alleges that a certain instrument had been prepared, "that the said John Campbell, intending to pay off the said heritable debt, intimated this to the manager of the said company, and a discharge and renunciation was prepared by the agent of the said John Campbell, and was subscribed by the said William Gloag as manager, and the said Robert Bisset and George Lawson Cornfute, on these dates; and on the 28th day of December last it was intimated that Mr. Campbell's agent was ready to pay the amount of the said heritable debt and interest due thereon, on receiving the discharge and renunciation, but in consequence of the said defender refusing to execute the said discharge and renunciation unless certain clauses were inserted therein, to which the agent of Mr. Campbell would not agree, the pursuers have been unable to obtain a settlement of the said debt and interest. Therefore the said defender ought and should be decerned and ordained to grant, [741] execute, and deliver to the pursuers the foresaid discharge and renunciation, to be produced at calling hereof."

Therefore the whole suit is founded upon this, that a certain instrument had been prepared which the pursuers alleged the defender ought to have executed. They do not ask that he may perform any other duty, or that he may execute any other deed, but they state a certain deed to be produced, and that he ought to be called upon to execute that deed, and the whole of the pleadings proceed upon that supposition. His defence is grounded on the fact, not that he is not bound to give any discharge, but that he is not bound to give a discharge in the terms in which it had been tendered. Thus the contest between the parties is, whether he is bound to execute that deed. The pursuers seem to have been aware of that in bringing before the court a case entitling them to what they ask, and that no doubt was the ground of the application to amend their summons; and accordingly they made an application in due time, the record not being closed, to be permitted to amend. The sheriff was of opinion that ought not to be granted. He "finds that the same is incompetent, because changing and extending the nature and conclusions of the libel: Refuses the motion to amend, reserving all questions of expenses to the final issue."

Now whether the sheriff was right or wrong in that opinion I apprehend is not a question which your Lordships are now called upon to consider at all; but I cannot but observe, as applicable to this part of the case, that what the sheriff ultimately did is not very consistent with the reasons he assigns for refusing per-[742]-mission to amend. For he goes on to say, "The conclusions of a summons may be restricted by a minute without any amendment, because there the greater comprehends the less; but it is incompetent to change the nature of the action, or to extend its conclusions. In this case the conclusions are specific, to compel the defender to execute a certain deed, and the amendment craved is to generalize the conclusions so as to embrace any deed necessary for the end sought."

Those are all very intelligible reasons. The ground upon which the sheriff came to the conclusion that he ought not to give leave to amend does seem a very odd result of that reasoning; that because it so altered the nature of the action that he could not be permitted to amend he might still have the power of giving the relief which was asked without any amendment at all. If that be to generalize it will be to do more than the summons prayed, and if it be the acknowledged rule that the court cannot give more than the summons prays, where a specific thing is prayed, then all the reasons which he suggests against the application to amend, one would suppose would have been applicable to the question which he afterwards decides, namely, whether on such a record he could grant the relief prayed.

The whole of the subsequent proceedings seem to have arisen from the suggestion which the sheriff made. He goes on to say, "Although such amendment cannot, on correct principles, be permitted, perhaps it is unnecessary, because, when the deed libelled is objected to by the defender on certain technical grounds, there appears no incompetency in the court making [743] such alterations on the deed as may obviate these objections, and decerning for execution of the deed so amended. No change would be made on the action, but this result would arise from the defence, and the court would decern in terms of the libel as modified by the defence. Is it not the recognized rule of law, that, where the nomination does not specially stipulate to the contrary, a majority of the trustees possess the whole powers of the trust?"

My Lords, on that the record was closed, and there was no complaint made on the part of the pursuers against the sheriff refusing liberty to amend. Then, on the matter coming on again before the sheriff, on the 23d of December, this interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having resumed consideration of this process, finds that the defender, having admittedly accepted the office of one of the directors of the pursuers' company, is bound at common law, and under the rules of the company, to execute all writings necessary for the ordinary management of the business of the company, and specially for the transfer and discharge of all such securities as may have been taken in name of the said defender, as one of the said company directors, and as such one of the trustees for the company; but finds that the defender, as admittedly no longer a partner, nor, of consequence, a director in the said company, is not bound to subscribe any deed or writing as may be inconsistent with the said last-mentioned fact, and which in any way recognizes him as being, at the time of subscribing the same, a partner in the said company." That was, according to the fact in issue between the parties, the pursuers and [744] defender, a distinct adjudication in favour of the defender, the sole question between the parties being, whether the deed tendered was such a deed as the defender was bound to execute; there is therefore, looking at the proceedings, looking at the matters in issue, looking at that which alone was the matter in contest, an adjudication that the defender was not bound to execute that deed so prepared and tendered.

Then what is there in issue between the parties as to what deed he shall execute? This refusal to execute any deed was nowhere brought into question; but, without any discussion between the parties, without any opportunity of raising any points, at least on the pleadings, as to whether any particular instrument should be executed or not, without any opportunity to take objections, after the whole proceedings were closed, and the case was in a situation for judgment, the sheriff "requires the pursuers to delete from the discharge, No. 3 of process, the words" he mentions. He then goes on, and gives directions as to the alterations to be made, not in this deed, but describing what sort of deed he is of opinion ought to be the deed executed by the defender; and "appoints the said deed, as so amended, to be new engrossed, and produced in process, and thereupon decerns the defender to subscribe the same, reserving consideration of the further conclusions of the summons, and decerns."

My Lords, there have been cases referred to for the pursuers which I must have an opportunity of minutely examining before I finally dispose of this case; but I have had no case referred to in which it has been held to be competent to a court in a suit of this sort, raising a particular question between the parties as to a par-[745]-ticular act to be done by one of them, which was claimed to be done by the pursuers, and resisted on particular grounds by the defender,—in which it has been thought competent to a court to adjudicate that the defender was quite right in the resistance he made to the execution of a particular instrument tendered, but the court still went on to direct that another deed should be prepared, and that he should execute the deed so prepared. Non constat, with respect to the deed directed by the sheriff to be prepared and submitted to the defender, that he would not have resisted the execution of it; but the matter was never submitted to his consideration, therefore he never had an opportunity of acquiescing in or resisting such application.

My Lords, this case was brought by advocacy before the Court of Session, and the Lord Ordinary took precisely that view of it. Still there was no advocacy against the refusal of the sheriff, and for liberty to amend. The cause was brought up entirely on the last interlocutor; and the practice of the court gave the party an opportunity still of putting new matter in issue, if he had thought proper to make an application for the purpose. But on the 23d December 1836 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor: "In respect the record, as closed in the inferior court, is not objected to, and the parties having each given in additional pleas in law, holds the record as closed in this court, and appoints parties to debate."

Now, what advantage might have been afforded, if such opportunity had been taken, in the advocacy, it is not necessary now to consider, because it is conceded on all hands that the act of parliament is imperative on that point, that after the record is closed [746] there can be no question of amendment. But the record might be closed adversely, the sheriff having refused the parties liberty to amend; the record being closed might be the consequence of his so refusing to allow the party to amend against whom that decision was made, namely, the pursuers; and if the pursuers thought proper to quarrel with the decision of the sheriff, inasmuch as the application was made before it was closed, it might be considered that they had a right to bring the decision of the sheriff under review, inasmuch as they were right in insisting that they ought to be at liberty to amend, and the subsequent interlocutor would be erroneous in having proceeded on an erroneous refusal of the pursuers to amend; but here they come into the Court of Session and make no such application, and the record is again closed in the Court of Session, and if they had the power of so doing, no application is made to amend, nor is that part of the proceeding of the sheriff brought under consideration.

The case of Cunningham v. Duncan (2 Sh. and M'Lean, 984) has not gone the length of letting in the parties to amend. It is well understood now, and decided to be the practice here, that where a judgment has been pronounced, and one party complains of the same, and brings it under review by a regular course of appeal to a superior court, the other party, if he has any thing to allege against the judgment, is at liberty to state all legal competent objections to the judgment in the same proceeding, so that the expense of double proceedings or of a cross appeal is saved by the adoption of that rule. It is a constant rule in the Court of Chancery, that if a party [747] appeals against part of an order, the appeal is open as to the rest; and a very convenient rule that is; it saves great expense. That is the whole effect of the decision in Cunningham's case.

Now, here is an interlocutor not brought under review; the others are; and there is an appeal against the decision on the merits. I cannot but consider that your lordships will ultimately come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was the correct one, and that the alteration of it in the Inner House cannot be supported; that there is no reason for altering the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, so far as it disposed of the record. When it came before the Lord Ordinary he pronounced this interlocutor: "Sustains the reasons of advocacy; advocates the cause; recalls the interlocutor of the sheriff; finds that the advocator was not bound to sign the only deed which he was called upon by the summons to subscribe; sustains this defence, assoilzies the defender, and decerns; finds him entitled to expenses incurred by him in this and in the inferior court."

On the case coming before the Inner House the court simply remitted it to the sheriff; but the reasons given by the learned judges on which they founded their opinion seem to have proceeded very much on the supposition that there ought to have been liberty to amend. Now, it does not appear to me that that opinion was well founded, or that they were correct in thinking there ought to have been liberty to amend, and that therefore it was competent to the court to adjudicate on the merits as if there had been liberty to amend. On the contrary, if it were necessary to amend in order to come to that conclusion, that would [748] be a strong reason against coming to the conclusion. But it comes simply to this, whether on such a record, without reference to the question of amendment, it was competent to the court to adjudicate such relief. It would be very inconvenient if such were the practice, because no man can know what he is called upon to resist. He is called on to do a particular act, and the court holds he is not bound to do that act. That is the whole suit; the whole contest. The court says, We are of opinion that you were right in resisting it; it was quite competent for you to refuse to execute that deed; but we are of opinion that you ought to have executed some other deed containing some other provision.

But the question is not whether the alterations were right or wrong. In one view of the case they might become material. If it were competent for the court to go into that question at all, then the particular alterations would be material to be considered; but if the court did not adjudicate on any thing but the particular deed, then it would be immaterial whether the alterations were more or less material, or such as the defender had a right to insist upon, because the objection would not be to the interlocutor, but to the jurisdiction of the court to deal with that subject matter at all.

There were some decisions referred to by the appellant, for the purpose of showing the extent to which it is competent for the court to go in cases where the court has thought it not competent to go beyond that which the pursuers have asked. I do not find the cases referred to on the other side lead to the conclusion which the learned judges of the Inner House seem to have come to; but as it is a point of practice of the court, [749] and a point on which this House is unwilling to interfere,—inasmuch as those who are in the daily habit of practising in those courts are much more competent to decide what that practice is, than it is possible your Lordships can be on a case of appeal,—it appears to me to be a case that requires great caution and consideration to be exercised before your Lordships would differ in opinion from a judgment pronounced on argument in the court below. But if, on reference to the authorities, it appears that that which has been done by the court below has been contrary to the practice, it will become the duty of your Lordships, if there has been any such departure, to keep that practice within its proper limits; because nothing can be more injurious to pleading in general than the introduction of a laxity of practice, in consequence of an opinion applying to the circumstances of a particular case. It is that which courts in this country are very cautious in permitting; and it is now a very wholesome rule to keep the practice within the limits which the ordinary rules prescribe, and not to make exceptions to it, on account of feelings that exist because one party or another may be thought to be improperly litigious. It is much to be regretted that this expense has been incurred by these parties, between whom there is scarcely any thing in question; still it is your Lordships' duty to look to the general question, and the effect of the general practice. There are two or three cases which bear on this subject, which I shall be glad to have an opportunity of looking at, and for that purpose I would propose to your Lordships that the further consideration of this case be postponed.

[750] Lord Chancellor (25th July).—My Lords, this is a case which I approach with considerable anxiety, as it involves a question of practice on which I have the misfortune of not coming to the same conclusion to which the court below has come. And undoubtedly, my Lords, I feel extremely reluctant to interfere with a judgment of the Court of Session, inasmuch as the learned judges who have decided are in the constant habit of considering these questions in their own court, and their minds must be more familiar with the practice which ought to regulate their proceedings than it is possible for your Lordships to be; but this, my Lords, appears to me to fall within the exception which has been recognized in the observations of Lord Eldon and other members of this House, when adverting to the danger of reversing interlocutors turning on points of practice. I find it impossible to ascertain the grounds on which the judgment of the court below can stand.

My Lords, the proceeding was for the purpose of compelling a party to execute a discharge of an heritable debt by subscribing a particular deed. The directors of the company had come under an obligation to do that which was necessary to enable the company to carry on their concern. The appellant ceased to be a director; the nature of the transaction made it necessary that a deed should be executed, and he, being a director at the time the transaction took place, was one of the necessary parties to that deed; and the deed having been prepared and approved by the party who had been dealing with the company, the appellant, having been a director, was called upon to execute the deed; he declined, whereupon the company instituted [751] proceedings against him, and, at the conclusion of the summons, stated these facts:—They stated that the deed was prepared; that the deed was approved by the borrower; that what they asked was, “that the defender should be decerned and ordained to grant, execute, and deliver to the pursuers the foresaid discharge and renunciation, to be produced at calling thereof.” He alleged an objection to the deed so prepared, and stated grounds on which he was not compellable to execute, not any deed, but the deed so prepared. The whole cause turned upon that ground, whether that deed was such as the defender was bound to execute. So satisfied were the pursuers in the course of the cause that that was the issue, that they felt no hesitation in coming to the hearing of the cause, praying nothing else against the defender but that he might execute that particular deed.

The cause came on first before the sheriff, and then they applied for liberty to amend their summons, and to plead generally that he should execute that deed, or some other deed for the purpose of operating as a discharge and renunciation of the said debt. The sheriff thereupon disposed of the cause in the manner already stated.

The whole question then, my Lords, was disposed of; there was nothing that was asked by the pursuers but what was disposed of by the finding of the 23d December 1835; the whole suit appears to be at an end; the pursuers having unfortunately limited their demand to call upon the defender to execute that deed, they could have no redress against him for not executing some deed, which, so far as appears, he had never refused to execute. The sheriff [752] before had refused to permit an amendment because it extended the object of the suit; but strange as it may appear, in a case where amendments were rejected because they purported to extend the object of the suit, such suit, without any amendment, was considered competent to enable the defender to do that which, according to the decision of the sheriff on the motion to amend, was felt to be subject to objection, as being beyond the object of the suit; and yet the sheriff goes on, and says, "therefore requires the pursuers to delete from the discharge" such and such words; so that, after finding he is not bound to execute the deed tendered, and that the pleadings cannot be altered so as to comprehend another deed, because it would change and extend the nature and conclusions of the libel, he goes on, and enumerates the objections to the deed, with respect to which there is nothing to be found on the pleadings, except that the defender insists on particular circumstances as furnishing reasons for objecting to the particular deed, and another stating the particulars in which he is of opinion the deed ought to be corrected, he directs the deed, so amended, "to be newly engrossed, and produced in process, and thereupon decerns the defender to subscribe the same;" that is to say, the deed tendered is not a proper deed to be executed; but in this proceeding, which had for its object only to compel the execution of a particular deed, you shall be directed to execute some other deed, though that is so foreign to the purpose, and much larger than the object of the suit instituted for the purpose of procuring his signature to a particular deed.

My Lords, this case, according to the usual practice, having been afterwards brought before the Court of [753] Session, the Lord Ordinary altered the interlocutor of the sheriff, but the Court recalled his Lordship's interlocutor; and in that shape it comes before your Lordships.

Now, this being a question of practice, however unwilling your Lordships may be to meddle with the decisions of the Court of Session in matters of that kind, and your Lordships are always very slow to interfere with the course of practice of courts of a peculiar jurisdiction having their own rules, the case being brought to your Lordships' bar it is our duty to deal with it, and it so happens that not one case can be found that justifies or approaches this case in its principle; on the other hand, several cases are cited, which though they do not correspond exactly in their facts, go a great way to shew that the practice of the Court of Session is much more reasonable than it would be supposed to be according to this decision. I will only call your Lordships' attention to three or four of the cases to which reference has been made by the counsel. They all go to the full extent for which they are cited.

The first is, Dickie v. Gutzmer, 6 Shaw and Dunlop, p. 637. The case was of this nature:—The libel stated the liability; the defender having raised a defence, the pursuer by his condescendence stated a new case, leading however to the same liabilities. The question was, whether he was justified in the mode by which he attempted to come to his conclusion; and the court said the pursuer was not at liberty to go out of his libel, and to state a totally different ground of action on his condescendence. The only competent remedy would be an amendment of the summons.

[754] The case of Williamson v. Jackson, on the 9th December 1825 (4 S. and D. 292, new ed. 296), was an action on a bill alleged in the summons to have been drawn by A. B. The defender alleged that the signature of the drawer was not that of A. B.; but it purported in the title of the bill to be drawn by A. B. Upon this the pursuer offered to prove that the signature was by the son of A. B., by his desire, and in the presence of the acceptor. It was held that it was not competent, with a view to support the allegation of a liability by the personal signature of the party, to allege that which was the same thing in effect,—the signature by another person, with his concurrence.

The case of Still's trustees, on the 12th of November 1829 (8 S., D., and B., 9), was an action by an outgoing tenant against an incoming tenant, to compel him to take the crops, alleging a verbal agreement with him so to do. The defender denied that there had been any such agreement. In reply to which the pursuer alleged, that in the lease he had taken from the lessor he had bound himself so to do. It was held that the pursuer was not at liberty, having put his claim on the personal liability of the incoming tenant, to support his case by a covenant in a lease with the landlord in a totally different form from what he had stated in his pleadings.

In the case of Kerr, on the 10th of July 1827 (5 S. and D. 926, new ed. 860), an action for the delivery up of a bill alleged in the summons to have been obtained from the pursuer by fraud, the case was attempted to be supported by the allegation that it had not been obtained by fraud, but was actually [755] a forged bill. It was held that the party was not enabled to go into proof of that, because it was not consistent with the case he had himself stated.

There is another case referred to in the printed papers, which appears to me also to be of considerable importance on this question; the case of Forbes v. Livingston, the judgment in which case was affirmed in this House, 8th July 1834. The summons in that action concluded to have it found that certain lands were comprehended within and were parts and pertinents of the pursuer's estate, and that the defender had no right to them. The defender also brought a counter-action of declarator, concluding to have it found that the disputed lands were his property, and that the pursuer had no right to them. There was an adverse claim therefore by the pursuer and by the defender, each claiming the lands. It turned out in the course of the action, that the pursuer in the first summons discovered that he had made an error, and that the lands were not exclusively his, nor exclusively the property of the parties with whom he was contending, but that they were what is called runrig lands, or mutual property. The objection there was the other way. He had made out a case; but as that case was not consistent with the claim in his summons, inasmuch as he had claimed the lands exclusively as his, it was held that he could not support his action. The Lord Ordinary having sustained his right to the extent to which he had proved it, the Court of Session, on the ground that the decree was not warranted by the conclusion, altered the interlocutor; and this is stated to be the reason of the judgment:—"In respect that [756] there appears not to be sufficient evidence to warrant the finding of the interlocutor, and that the said findings are not applicable to the conclusions of the summons in the conjoined actions;" and that judgment was affirmed on appeal. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Brougham, C.) of that day observed, he had very little doubt whatever as to the judgment to be given.

All these cases, though none of them are cases exactly similar to the present in their circumstances, clearly apply to the present, and they establish that the courts of Scotland require that there should be consistency between that which is asked and that which the court shall ultimately decree. It is very proper it should be so, and I should very much regret to find the practice of the Courts of Scotland different from that which exists here. Here there is no question that the party would be immediately nonsuited if, proceeding upon one ground, it turned out that he could claim only on another. There is a mode of proceeding in courts of equity whereby, under what we call a prayer for general relief, the court is at liberty to give relief consistently with the case stated; but there the court never give relief inconsistent with the case stated, and if the case stated had been that of the delivery of a particular instrument, and the demand of the execution of that particular instrument, and it turned out that the defendant was not bound to execute that instrument, no court would think of directing the execution, not of the deed itself, but of some other deed which the court should take upon itself to frame and tender to the party.

[757] On the other hand, if the complaint had been that he refused to execute the deed tendered, and that he refused to execute any deed, that might have given the court jurisdiction; but if it had been confined in its terms to the complaint that he had not executed a particular deed, no court would take the course adopted in this proceeding, because he had refused to execute the deed itself, of proceeding to alter the instrument, and of decreeing that he should be ordered to execute the deed so altered.

Under these circumstances, my Lords, I cannot but think it would be very unsafe if your Lordships were to affirm the interlocutor appealed from; for that would be binding upon your Lordships and the court, and would necessarily lead to the greatest possible laxity in future proceedings, which could not but produce great injury to the public. I cannot but think that in coming to their conclusions the court were a little too much influenced by the litigious conduct of the defender. I have nothing to say in favour of his conduct; he appears to have given a great deal of unnecessary trouble, and occasioned a great deal of unnecessary expense, in refusing to do that which in some form or other he was bound to do. I very much regret that, according to the course your Lordships are bound to pursue, you are putting the company to additional expense; but they will have their remedy in a proceeding properly framed for that purpose, if the appellant should be advised, or without advice should think proper, to continue the conduct which he has hitherto pursued. The result will be to reverse the interlocutor appealed from, and to affirm the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, if your Lord-[758]-ships take the same view of the case which I have now submitted to your Lordships.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the several interlocutors, so far as complained of in the said appeal, be and the same are hereby reversed, and that the said interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of the 8th of June 1837 be and the same is hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the said cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be just, and consistent with this judgment.

[759] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

DAVID BARRY, surviving Partner of Robertson and Barry, Merchants in Leith, (Pauper,) Appellant.—John Stuart—Jemmett; ARCHIBALD WADDELL, Accountant in Glasgow, Trustee on the sequestrated Estate of John Geddes of the Vereville Glassworks, Respondent.—Lord Advocate (Rutherford)—Sydney S. Bell [25th July 1839].

Account.—Judgment of Court of Session in a circumstantial case of accounting, affirmed.

The nature of this case, which involved matters of accounting which had been the subject of investigation by an accountant, by order of the Court of Session, is explained in the note of the Lord Ordinary subjoined to his interlocutor of the 10th June 1836, adhered to by the court, and in the judgment by the Lord Chancellor affirming that of the court.

There were previous interlocutors, of 20th January 1832 and 8th March 1833, pronounced by the Lord Ordinary. Upon hearing parties on their objections to the accountant's report, the following interlocutor was pronounced by Lord Moncreiff:—"10th June 1836. The Lord Ordinary, having heard parties' procurators [760] on the objections to the accountant's report, and having made avizandum, and particularly considered the said report, with the objections thereto, and the whole conjoined processes,—Repels all the objections, and approves of the report: Finds, in the action of declarator and constitution at the instance of John Geddes, that there was due to him from the estate of Barry and Robertson, and the defenders, on 30th June 1804 a sum of £554 19s. 4d., with legal interest thereon since that date, subject to an obligation to account to the creditors of Messrs. Robertson and Barry, the compositions on whose debts had not been paid, and others having interest, for his intromissions with the estates of the company, and the partners thereof, and in particular with the rents and prices of George Robertson's dwelling house and warehouse in Leith, in so far as the same may have been received by him posterior to the said date of 30th June 1804, or may yet remain to be realized by him: Finds, that it has not been made to appear in this process that the said balance due to the said John Geddes, with the interest accruing thereon, has been liquidated by any such intromissions already had by the said John Geddes; but in respect of the minute lodged by him, of date the 22d January 1822, being No. 30 of process, finds that no personal decree is asked against the defender David Barry; therefore, in terms of the said minute, decerns and declares in terms of the libel, to the extent of the said debt and interest, cognitionis causa tantum, against the company of Robertson and Barry, and against the heirs of George Robertson, as an individual: And in the action of count and reckoning, at the instance of the [761] said David Barry, sustains the defences, and assoiliizes the defenders, and decerns; reserving always, as aforesaid, the right of any creditor of the said company, the compositions on whose debts may not have been paid, and others having interest, to call the said John Geddes to account for his intrusions had or to be had with the estates of the company, or the partners, and in particular the heritable property and rents above referred to, posterior to the said 30th June 1804 as aforesaid, or in time coming: Finds, that as no personal decree can be pronounced against the said David Barry, it appears to the Lord Ordinary to be unnecessary to give any deliverance on the expenses of process, the said David Barry having alone carried on the litigation; but allows the cause to be enrolled, in order that any motion which may be necessary for finally extricating it may be made.

"(Signed) JAMES W. MONCRIEFF." *

* "Note.—This cause, which began in 1817, and relates to affairs which were in a great manner closed in 1804, has proceeded under the old forms of the Court; and when the Lord Ordinary looks at the process lying before him, he sees a warning example of the evils which have since called for and obtained a remedy.

"The cause does also, in his opinion, present a notable example of the extent of trouble and vexation which a man may bring on himself and others, to whom he stood under the greatest obligations, from indulging a mere humour of dissatisfaction, originating in circumstances in which he had himself the chief concern, and in regard to which, at any rate, his opponent was perfectly innocent. Mr. John Geddes and his brother had the misfortune, from motives of friendship, to interpose their credit as cautioners for Mr. Barry and Mr. Robertson, in a composition-contract with their creditors. At their own desire, these gentlemen were at first allowed to manage the bankrupt estate; but they quarrelled with one another, and it was then necessary to put the management in Mr. Masterton, accountant. Mr. Robertson continued to give assistance, but Mr. Barry refused to do so. The management went on, however, and in 1804, Mr. Masterton made up his final states, against which no specific objections were stated. Mr. Masterton left this country in the same year 1804, and Mr. Robertson died abroad in 1807. From that time down to 1817, no proceedings took place. In that year Mr. Geddes, finding himself to be in advance for the estate, and seeing that some of the compositions were still unpaid, found it necessary to obtain a decree of constitution against the heirs of George Robertson, no one representing him, by which he might obtain a title to the heritable property which had belonged to him, and the price of which, though it was sold, could not otherwise be recovered. That summons necessarily called the defender Barry, and unfortunately concluded for a sum which has been found by the accountant to be extravagant and untenable. But the pursuer, by the minute mentioned in the interlocutor, passed from any personal decree against Barry. The latter, however, had raised his action, concluding for upwards of £5000, on an account framed on the principle of discarding all Mr. Masterton's accounts and states; and after thirteen years, when Masterton and Robertson were both gone, refusing to Mr. Geddes credit for any thing, unless all the books, vouchers, etc. should be of new opened and exhibited. No creditor has made any claim. These causes have now been nineteen years in court; and Mr. Geddes, thus struggling with a bankrupt on the poor's roll, has himself become a bankrupt.

"The Lord Ordinary having read with care the whole report, and attended to all the objections to it, is completely satisfied that the accountant has done full and fair justice. 1st. He thinks that he judged rightly, seeing that no personal decree was asked by Geddes, and that he was in a litigation with a party on the poor's roll, in proceeding, for the reasons explained in pages 10 and 11 of the report, to endeavour to ascertain whether the documents in process were sufficient to show that there was a debt of any amount due to Geddes. 2dly. He thinks that he has done justice in giving the weight which he has done to the states of Masterton, which were examined and approved of by so many persons having interest, and fully qualified to check or appreciate them. 3dly. He is of opinion, that the report itself contains sufficient answers to all the special objections now insisted on. It is therefore unnecessary for him to go into particulars. Many of the objections put before the accountant were palpably untrue and unfair; some were given effect to, and the rest seem to have been rightly decided.

"One objection (the eighth before the accountant, and the tenth now insisted on)

[762] The appellant reclaimed to the court, praying for absolvitor in Geddes's action, and, in the accounting at [763] his own instance against Geddes, for decerniture with costs, "or at least to recal the said interlocutor in hoc statu, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to make up a record in terms of the judicature act, and relative act of sederunt."

Against that part of the interlocutor, whereby his Lordship "finds, that as no personal decree can be pronounced against the said David Barry, it appears to the Lord Ordinary to be unnecessary to give any deliverance on the expenses of process, the said David Barry having alone carried on the litigation," the respondent presented a reclaiming note; and prayed the court to "find the said David Barry liable in said expenses, at least from 22d January 1822, the date of the minute referred to in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships may seem proper."

[764] On advising both the reclaiming notes the following interlocutor was pronounced (16th May 1837): "The Lords, having considered this reclaiming note for poor David Barry, and another note for Archibald Waddell, reclaiming against the same interlocutor as to the expenses of process, adhere to the interlocutor in so far as complained of in this note, and refuse the desire thereof; and on the other note, find David Barry liable in the expenses of process, from the date of the remit to the accountant; allow the account to be given in, and when lodged, remit to the auditor to tax the same, and report, in so far altering the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary."

Barry appealed.

Appellant.—The course of procedure below had been such as to baffle every attempt by the appellant to get into the real truth and merits of the transaction.

Respondents.—The respondent maintained that the proceedings, not having admitted of the application of the modern forms of pleading, presented much to be animadverted on; but that substantial justice had been done, and every facility of investigation afforded by the accountant's report, which had undergone the judicial review of the Lord Ordinary and the Court.

Lord Chancellor (18th July).—The objections to the account are all to be found on the face of the account itself; there is no evidence dehors the account?

Mr. Stuart.—The first objection is printed in the accountant's report at page 25, and afterwards at page 42. My Lords, at page 42 it is perhaps more explicitly [765] stated, because there the objections are narrowed and more conveniently printed.

Lord Chancellor.—Does that appear on the face of the report?

Mr. Stuart.—Yes, my Lords.

might afford reasonable ground of doubt. Robertson, Mr. Barry's partner, and one of the bankrupts, gave assistance to Mr. Masterton in realizing the estate; and he appears to have received a sum of £335, which he did not pay over to Masterton. The question is, Whether, in a question with Barry, Geddes the cautioner must be liable for what Robertson so received and did not account for? The Lord Ordinary thinks that the accountant is right in his judgment, as explained in the report, p. 67. Robertson was not factor for Geddes. But, at any rate, the point by itself is really of no importance. The sums employed by Robertson, in payment of the third instalment of the composition, and otherwise, must be set against the sum so received, which would reduce it to £143 9s. 1d. But as no personal decree is asked, this could evidently make no real difference on the state of the case.

"Mr. Barry insists much on what is the first objection before the accountant, and the seventh now pleaded. This is £186 paid by Mr. Geddes to take up a bill of a creditor who refused to accede to the composition. The Lord Ordinary can only say, that any thing more unfair or discreditable, to be advanced by Mr. Barry, after so long a period, in the face of his own letter at the time, (29th July 1803,) as quoted by the accountant, p. 61, and of Masterton's state approved of by Robertson and the creditors, he has seldom seen; and he cannot think that it can be listened to, coming from Mr. Barry in such circumstances.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks it unnecessary to advert to any of the other objections.

"J. W. M."

Lord Chancellor.—Your four objections are objections to the course the accountant has taken on the facts as they appear on the face of the report. There is no evidence dehors the report.

My Lords, in this case, which is an appeal against four interlocutors of the Court of Session, the two first objections appear to me to be without any foundation; the two latter depending entirely on an examination of the account, it may be proper to take some time to investigate the account, and the entries on which the objections depend; but the two first are for not having made an order on an application by the appellant, for which I cannot find on the face of the proceedings, or on any thing that is stated at the bar, that there was any foundation. In the course of the contest between these parties it was referred,—the whole matters of account were referred,—to an accountant by an interlocutor of the year 1830, and against that there is no appeal. The interlocutor, therefore, is binding on the party; and the sole question is, whether in carrying that into effect the accountant has or has not done his duty which the court intended he should do,—that is, whether there has been a miscarriage in the mode in which he has performed the duty which the interlocutor imposed on him. The two first interlocutors do not touch that part of the question. They are appealed against as interlocutors of the Court of Session refusing the application requiring certain special directions to be given to the accountant as to the mode [766] in which he was to carry out the account, an application inconsistent with the interlocutor of December 1830, which directed him to take the account generally. I do not find any ground laid before the Court of Session to induce that court to depart from the direction of the interlocutor of 1830, therefore there is no ground for the appeal against the order which refused that application.

My Lords, the other two interlocutors, that is to say, the third, which disposed of a complaint against the mode in which the account was taken, and the fourth, which gave effect to the decision of the Lord Ordinary, is a subject involving a question of account, which appears entirely on the face of the account. In a complicated case of account it would not be satisfactory to dispose of a question of that sort without taking an opportunity of accurately examining the account itself; and for that purpose I propose to your Lordships to adjourn the consideration of this case till Monday next, it being then considered that the two first interlocutors are to be affirmed, and the question to remain open on the two last, which raise the question of the account.

Lord Chancellor (25th July).—My Lords, I do not feel it to be necessary to trouble your Lordships at any length in this case, having in fact stated my views at the close of the argument. It appears that the appellant Mr. Barry and his partner Mr. Robertson, who had been merchants in Leith, became insolvent in the year 1801. The partnership property was sequestrated, and a trustee elected, but the bankrupts having offered a composition of seven shillings and sixpence in the pound by three several payments, the offer was accepted on condition of sufficient security being given for the first and [767] second payments. The Messrs. Geddes accordingly became cautioners for the payment of those instalments, in consideration of which the whole of the sequestrated estate and effects was conveyed to them, and the sequestration was recalled. The Messrs. Geddes, residing at Leith, appointed Mr. Masterton their factor, and he made up statements from time to time of the monies he had received and expended on account of the estate. Whatever came in from the original estate beyond that which was necessary to indemnify the trustees in the payment of that 5s. in the pound, on the debts to the firm, would of course immediately go to the insolvents, or those who stood in their place. That trust continued for a great number of years, during which time statements of the acts and transactions were furnished for the inspection of those interested in the cause; they investigated the concerns of the general firm, which are represented to have remained in the hands of Robertson, the late partner; afterwards another person was appointed to get in the property, and ultimately the present appellant, Barry, obtained from the creditors an assignment of all their interest, so that at last he came to represent those interested under the sequestration; and under these circumstances he has called in question accounts of Messrs. Geddes with the creditors of the bankrupt estate. It was contended that he had no interest, because the creditors under the sequestration had no interest except for the purpose of seeing that there was a due appropriation to the payment of those instalments of 2s. 6d. each in the pound, making 5s. in the pound,—it is in the first instance to themselves, and ultimately to the creditors interested under them. There was another suit by Messrs. Geddes, for the purpose of estab-[768]-lishing the deed, in order to enforce the claim they had against the real property of Barry and Robertson.

When this suit had made some progress the whole of the accounts were referred to an accountant; the accountant investigated them very thoroughly, as appears upon the face of these accounts, and transactions between the parties; and in the report to the year 1804 it appeared that there was a sum of £554 due to Messrs. Geddes, being the excess of what they had paid beyond what they had received; and he found that, although there had been some interest for items arising from part of the property not realized, the interest on the other side of the account exceeded the amount of that on the items, which could have been received by Messrs. Geddes. Taking up the account as it had been stated, it appeared on the investigation that Messrs. Geddes were largely in advance when Barry interfered, having acquired an interest by the assignation of the creditors, and interested of course in the ultimate proceeds of the estate in case there had been a surplus. On the making up the account to that time, no creditor complaining, the accountant found that under any view of taking the account, giving credit for all that might possibly come in, there was a debt of upwards of £600,—a very considerable sum,—due to Messrs. Geddes for money paid by them beyond that they had received; and Barry, standing in the situation of creditor under the sequestration, having produced nothing to break in upon that, under those circumstances the court properly, in my opinion, decreed against him, his only object being to establish a surplus beyond what was necessary to be applied by Messrs. Geddes's in indemnifying themselves against that which they had undertaken to pay; and on the cross suit they [769] found no personal demand against Barry, the whole object of that suit being to establish a claim against Robertson, who had been permitted to assist the factor in getting in the property.

Your Lordships have before you not Robertson, who has since died,—you have not before you any creditor of Barry, who, if any thing wrong had taken place under those circumstances, would have been aggrieved by that which had been done, and would have had a right to complain,—your Lordships have nobody before you but Barry, the original debtor, who could have no possible interest in the proceeds of the estate, unless he could shew that there was a surplus beyond that which was necessary to pay Messrs. Geddes. The accountant has investigated these accounts, and he reports them to be perfectly correct, and that it is impossible there can be a surplus coming to Barry. Under these circumstances it is clear that there is no ground for this proceeding on behalf of Barry, who is suing in forma pauperis, and never can possibly have any thing coming from this source. The interlocutor appealed from disposes of his claim finding that he has not made out his claim; and as to the other suit, finding that the pursuer has made out a title to that which he asks. The interlocutor brought before your Lordships is only appealed from as far as it affects Barry; consequently any other question as to the property, though perhaps unnecessarily reserved, is entirely between the creditors and Messrs. Geddes. It is quite open to them to investigate the accounts of Messrs. Geddes,—nothing precludes them from that; the whole object of the interlocutor being to shut out Barry from any right to investigate the account, in which, from the statement [770] of accounts, it appears he cannot possibly have any interest.

My Lords, it is unnecessary to go into details of these items, but there is one which has been very much observed on, and to which, therefore, I will just call your Lordships' attention, inasmuch as it shews the ground taken by these parties. It appears that the creditors in a bill of £186 refused to come into the arrangement, and Messrs. Geddes, as the friends of the bankrupts, ultimately produced the money to satisfy the creditors, by paying off that debt in full. That gave rise to an objection, on the ground of an alleged improper payment out of the bankrupts' estate; but the £186 was not paid in fact out of the bankrupts' estate; it no longer constituted a debt upon the bankrupts' estate, as it was actually paid by Geddes himself. The question as to that bill is not between the creditors and those who claim under it; Geddes can claim repayment of that bill of £186 only as between himself and Barry and Robertson, for whom it was paid. It was attempted, however, to confound that with payments made on account of the estate with the money of the creditors, for which there is no ground; it is clearly not liable to any objection, Barry cannot dispute the right of Messrs. Geddes, as between him and them, to be repaid that sum of £186.

My Lords, there are some other objections, which are equally void of foundation. I had not any doubt, from the argument, that the conclusion arrived at below was perfectly satisfactory, yet as it involved matter of account, I thought it safer to investigate the whole circumstances accurately before I should state to your Lordships the opinion to which I have come. It only remains [771] that I should move your Lordships to affirm the interlocutors complained of; there can be no costs, as the party sues in forma pauperis.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the interlocutors therein complained of be and the same are hereby affirmed.

[772] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

The MAGISTRATES and TOWN COUNCIL OF DINGWALL, Mrs. C. M. ROSS of Cromarty and Husband, and JOHN C. STEAVENSON, their Tacksman, Appellants.—Dr. Lushington—Sandford; HUGH MUNRO, Tacksman, and the Hon. Mrs. M. HAY MACKENZIE of Cromarty, Respondents.—Attorney General (Campbell)—H. J. Robertson [29th July 1839].

Bona fide Possession—Salmon Fishing.—During the dependence of proceedings in court to determine a disputed right of salmon fishing, one of the parties was allowed for several years to possess the fishings in dispute, subject to an express order of Court to keep and preserve an account of the number of salmon caught by such party or his fishermen, which was accordingly kept till the question of right was determined; and the adverse party having established his right to said salmon fishings:—In an action by the party who had so established his right, to recover from his opponents the free proceeds of said salmon during the period of possession thus illegally retained,—Held (affirming the interlocutor of the Court of Session) that a plea of bona fide possession set up for the defenders was not well founded.

Jury Trial.—Observed, per L. C., (in reference to the circumstances aforesaid,)—that as this was a subject of account arising out of a right as established in a previous suit, there appeared to be no ground whatever for sending the cause in the first instance to a jury.

[773] This was a branch of a long-pending litigation between the same parties relative to a right of salmon fishing in a part of the river Conon. This litigation commenced in 1825, by a summons of declarator and damages, at the instance of the respondents, under which the question came to be, whether two valuable pools in the above river, called Pool Oure and Pool Breakenord, belonged to the appellants or to the respondents? It was ultimately decided by the Court of Session, on 11th July 1832, and by the House of Lords, 12th April 1834, that these pools belonged to the respondents, and they have since then been in their possession. For the greater part of the period, during which this question continued in dependence, these pools were allowed to be possessed by the appellants, under an order of court which enjoined them to keep an account of the number of salmon caught till the final issue of the cause. In consequence of the judgment above mentioned in 1834, the respondents raised an action, concluding that the value of the fish caught by the appellants beyond their own boundary as ultimately established during the dependence of the litigation should be accounted for and paid to Captain Munro, the tacksman of the fishings.

To this action the appellants in their four first pleas pleaded, that on a true construction of the judgments pronounced, the pools had actually been adjudged to belong to them and not to the respondents; and to aid the appellants in this plea, they raised two successive actions of declarator to have it so found and declared, but which were both dismissed with expenses; and the defence rested on this plea was thereupon abandoned.

The appellants however further contended that they [774] were protected against any accounting, by the plea of bona fide possession, and the determination of this point formed the remaining subject of contention between the parties.

The Lord Ordinary (11th March 1837) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, having heard counsel for the parties, repels the first four pleas in law for the defenders, reserving full effect to all the defences, in so far as they are founded on the defenders' alleged bona fide possession of the fishings in question; and on the same defence of bona fide possession appoints the parties to prepare and lodge mutual minutes of debate by the second box-day in the ensuing vacation, to be seen and interchanged, and lodged revised by the third sederunt-day in May next."

Upon advising minutes of debate the Lord Ordinary (30th June 1837) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the revised minutes of debate for the parties, appoints them respectively to box the same, and that within eight days, with the view of reporting to the First Division of the Court." Note.—The circumstance of the defenders being ordered to keep an account of the fish caught while they were allowed to continue the possession, does not, with absolute certainty, imply that they were bound to account for the proceeds, now that the case has been decided against them. But looking at the whole course of procedure * [775] there does appear to the Lord Ordinary strong ground to pre-

* The following is a sketch of the proceedings so far as necessary to explain the above judgments. The predecessors of the respondents (the Commissioners of Forfeited Estates) raised an action against the predecessors of the appellants, to determine their respective boundaries, in which the following was the judgment:—"24th Jan. 1778. On the report of the Lord Auchinleck, and having advised the informations, hinc inde, the Lords find that the commissioners of the annexed estates have not produced a sufficient title to the fishings of the river Conon; but find that the magistrates and town council of Dingwall have produced a sufficient title to the fishings in the said river opposite to their property from the march at Breakenord down to the sea; therefore, not only assoilzie the said magistrates and council from the action against them brought by the said commissioners, but decern to the effect foresaid in the action at their instance against the said commissioners, and declare accordingly."—The point at issue in the action, which gave rise to the present dispute, was the precise position of the march of Breakenord; and in this action the following interlocutors were pronounced:—"9th March 1826, the Lord Ordinary, having heard parties procurators, ordains the defenders to keep and preserve an account of the number of salmon to be hereafter caught by them or their fishermen in the river Conon, all as craved in the foregoing minute, reserving all questions touching the expenses of clerks or otherwise, in consequence of carrying this order into effect. J. Clerk."—"3d June 1826. The Lord Ordinary, at desire of the procurator for the pursuer, ordains the defenders to keep and preserve an account of the number of salmon caught by them or their fishermen in that part of the river Conon called the New Pool, (further up the river than Pool Breakenord) and that in place of the account ordered to be kept by them by the interlocutor of the 9th of March last; reserving all questions touching the expenses of clerks or otherwise, in consequence of carrying this order into effect. J. Clerk."—"14th June 1827. Ordains the defenders instantly to produce in the clerk's hands the account of the number of salmon caught by them or their fishermen in that part of the river Conon called the New Pool, and ordered to be kept by them by the interlocutor of the 3d of June 1826. J. Clerk."—"24th November 1827. The Lords having resumed the consideration of this note, and heard the counsel for the parties, they recal the interlocutors of Lord Eldin, Ordinary, complained of, and remit to Lord Corehouse, Ordinary, in place of Lord Eldin, to proceed in the cause as to his Lordship shall seem proper, reserving all questions of expenses until the issue of the case. C. Hope, I.P.D."—"11th March 1828. The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties upon the whole cause, and in particular upon the demand now made for an interdict against the defenders to fish above the march between the lands of Balblair and Breakenord, sume that that liability was contemplated both [776] by the parties and the Court. In particular, it would be difficult to attach any other meaning to [777] the passages quoted from the defenders' answers to the pursuers' petition for interim execution after the [778] final judgment of 11th July 1832. But as frequent reference is made by both parties to the views of the Court in altering or continuing the state of possession at different stages of the procedure, and as those views, on which the Lord Ordinary possesses no certain information, may materially affect the question now in dispute, he has thought it best to report the case."

in respect it is averred that the defenders have been fishing above the said march, which, by their admissions on the record, they are not entitled to do, in the meantime prohibits, interdicts, and discharges the said defenders, or any of them, their tenants, servants, fishers, or dependents, from fishing or killing salmon in any part of the river Conon above the line delineated on the plan in process as the march between Balblair and Breakenord; but in respect the defenders do not admit that the said line is accurately laid down in the plan, without prejudice to the parties to ascertain the exact march between Balblair and Breakenord before the interdict is declared perpetual, grants diligence at the defenders' instance against havers for recovering the printed informations in the case which depended between the commissioners of annexed estates and the magistrates of Dingwall founded on as res judicata by the defenders, or copies of these informations, and commission to the sheriff depute or substitute of the bounds within which the havers may be for the time to take their oaths and depositions and receive their productions to the day of May next; appoints the parties to prepare mutual cases upon the whole cause, etc.; appoints them to print, at their joint expense, the proceedings in the mutual actions between the commissioners of annexed estates and the magistrates of Dingwall, including the said informations, if recovered, and to lodge copies thereof along with their cases. Geo. Cranstoun."—"12th November 1828. The Lord Ordinary finds that the words 'opposite to their property' in the judgment 1778 are demonstrative, and not taxative, and therefore finds that the magistrates of Dingwall, and those in their right, have a sufficient title to the fishings in the river Conon from the march at Breakenord down to the sea; and to that effect assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of this action, and decerns; but in respect parties are not agreed as to the march between the lands of Balblair and Breakenord, appoints the pursuers to put in a condescendence, specifying what they aver to be the situation of the march, and allows the defenders to answer the same, and in the meantime continues the interdict: farther, in respect the pursuers allege that the defender Steavenson (the appellants tacksman) has been fishing and is continuing to fish in an illegal manner, appoints them to put in a condescendence of what they aver on this point, and allows the defenders to answer the same; the condescendences now ordered to be lodged within three weeks, and the answers by the box day in the Christmas recess. Geo. Cranstoun."—"11th July 1829. The Lords having advised the petition and complaint, with the revised cases given in for the parties, and heard counsel, they renew the interdict as granted by the Lord Ordinary against the respondents fishing in the Pool Oure and Pool Breakenord; and in the meantime direct the complainers to keep an exact account of the fish caught in these two pools;" etc.—"11th March 1831. The Lord Ordinary having considered the closed record and whole process, and heard counsel for the parties thereon, finds that by the words 'the march at Breakenord,' as used in Lord Corehouse's interlocutor of 12th November 1828, is meant, as shown by the subsequent part of that interlocutor, the march betwixt the lands of Balblair and Breakenord, and that it is not now competent to inquire in what sense these words were employed in the interlocutor in the former process of 24th January 1778: Finds, that as the parties are now agreed as to the precise situation of the march betwixt these lands, it is unnecessary to inquire further into this matter; and that the line so agreed upon forms, where it touches the river, the western limit of the fishings belonging to the defenders; but in respect the march so ascertained does not correspond with the line delineated on the old plan of 1763 (Sangster's plan, on which the judgment of 1778 proceeded) as the march betwixt Balblair and Breakenord, recalls the interdict imposed by the interlocutor of 11th March 1828, and decerns: that justice, however, may be done to the pursuers in case this interlocutor should be altered, ordains the defenders to keep an account of the number of salmon taken by them in the pools named Pool Oure and Pool Breakenord, from this time till the final determination of this point in the cause: Finds the defenders entitled to the expenses incurred by them subsequent to the interlocutor of the Court of 20th January 1829. Alex. Irving."—"17th June 1831. The Lords having advised this reclaiming note, and heard the counsel for the parties, they recall the interlocutor reclaimed against (except in so far as it recalls the interdict), and find that it is competent to inquire in what sense the words 'the march at Breakenord' were used in the decree 1778. For that purpose, allow the parties to give in cases on the import of the evidence in process, so far as concerns this point, and in particular on the import of the proof led, the pleadings and other proceedings in the cause on which the decree 1778 proceeded; said cases to be lodged on the second box-day in the ensuing vacation, and appoint said cases to be revised, printed, and boxed by the third sederunt day in November next, reserving all questions of expenses. C. Hope, I.P.D."

Thereafter, the revised minutes of debate having been boxed, the following judgment was pronounced by the First Division of the Court (6th July 1837):—"The Lords having advised this case upon the report of Lord Fullerton, and heard counsel for the parties, repel the plea of bona fide possession set up for the [779] defenders; find that they are bound to account in terms of the conclusion of the libel, and decern accordingly; find the defenders liable in expenses, appoint an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same to the auditor to tax and report. Quoad ultra, remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the case. Signed 7th July."

Judgment of the House of Lords in the first petition and complaint:—"Die Lunae, 11 Julii 1831. After hearing counsel, etc., it is declared by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the mention of Pool Oure and Pool Breakenord in the said interlocutors complained of shall not prejudice, bind, or at all affect the question touching the course of the boundary line, nor decide whether the said line runs below or above the said two pools; and that, with the above declaration, it is ordered and adjudged that the interlocutors complained of in the said appeal be and the same are hereby affirmed; and it is further ordered, that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland to proceed therein as shall be just, and consistent with this judgment. (Signed) W. Courtenay. Dep. Cler. Parliamentor."

After several years' litigation this question was finally settled, by the judgment of the First Division, in these terms:—"The Lords (11th July 1832) having resumed consideration of this reclaiming note, with the revised cases and interlocutor of this Court, 17th June 1831, and plan and report by James Jardine, civil engineer, dated the 9th day of March last, and proof on which the decree of 1778 proceeded, and heard the counsel for the parties, they of new recall the interlocutor of Lord Newton, 11th March 1831, and find that 'the march at Breakenord' used in the decree 1778 is the Fishers' Lodge on the south side of the river Conon, or on Island More, and the letter P at the bend eastward of the burn of Ousie on the north side; and the said James Jardine having, by the direction of the Court, drawn a red line from the point denoting 'Ruins of Fishers' Lodge' on the plan in process made by him across the water of Conon to the letter P aforesaid, they find and declare the said red line to be the march in respect to the right of fishing salmon in said water betwixt the pursuers and defenders, and that the defenders have no right of salmon fishing higher up than the said line, and the pursuers no right below it; and the Lord President, and Adam Rolland, principal clerk of session, have, with reference to this judgment, certified the said line on Jardine's plan in process, by putting their names along it, and decern: Find the defenders liable in the pursuers' expenses since the date of the remit to the said James Jardine, and in his charge for survey, plan, and report; and remit the account thereof to the auditor of court, to tax, and to report; and further, the Lords remit to Lord Fullerton, in place of Lord Newton, deceased, to hear parties on the account of the number of salmon taken by the defenders beyond the line of march as hereby adjusted referred to in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 11th March 1831, and all objections thereto, and to do therewith, and with any other points in the cause not disposed of, as shall be just." This judgment was affirmed on appeal 12th April 1834.

The defenders appealed.

Appellants.—Possession of the disputed subjects for at least thirty years does in law raise the defence of bona fide possession, and is a conclusive answer to the claim for bygone fruits. In the leading case of Agnew (Agnew v. Earl of Stair, 22d July 1828, Wilson and Shaw's Appeal Cases, vol. iii. p. 296), some of the opinions delivered, particularly the opinion of Lord Glenlee, afford valuable authority as to the general nature and foundation of the defence of bona fide possession. As the respondents are, in the present case, claiming restoration of the bygone fruits or issues of the property which have been reaped and consumed, it lies, of course, upon them to prove that there was mala fides on the part of the appellants, who were in the occupancy and possession of the subjects.

The appellants were so far from being in the situation of reaping the fruits of the subject under a conscientia rei alienae, that the Court itself, at one time, determined the matter in their favour. They refer to the interlocutor of Lord Newton, Ordinary, of 11th March 1831, by which they were restored to the possession of the disputed pools, and the respondents subjected in a [780] large proportion of the costs. It is true that interlocutor was afterwards altered by the Court, which is just an example of that vacillation of judgment which Lord Pitmilley observes, in the above case of Agnew, had been expressly laid down by this House as one circumstance which prevents the conscientia rei alienae from attaching till final judgment. But even in the end, the Court, in deciding the case unfavourably for the appellants, only subjected them in a small part of the costs; and this House ultimately, in affirming the judgment, refused to award to the opposite party the costs of the appeal; and yet, in a case where the respondents have been refused their costs, both in this House and in the Court below, they have succeeded in the latter in obtaining judgment against the appellants for damages on the footing of a fraudulent and mala fide possession by them. But if the slightest ground had existed for considering the case as one of that description, it is impossible to doubt that the very least thing that could have been done would have been to award to the respondents the full costs of the litigation. The circumstance that only a small part of the respondents costs was allowed in the Court below, and none at all in this House, conclusively shows that though the appellants were held to be wrong in the claims which they were maintaining, there was nothing improper in the manner in which they had maintained them, and nothing dishonest or fraudulent in their possession, which was fairly referable to their titles as they stood interpreted by the judgment of 1778. This is plainly the view of these matters taken by Lord Denman, who moved the judgment of affirmance in 1834, adding the following important statement:—"And I apprehend that as these matters have all arisen [781] from the carelessness of the pursuers (respondents), the defenders in the former action, and as very great doubts have arisen in consequence of the ignorance of the parties as to the real extent of their rights, that ought to be done (the affirmance of the judgment) without any costs."

Respondents.—The judicial challenge in 1825, and the orders of the Court thereupon, that an account of the number of fish should be kept, put the appellants in mala fide in consuming the fruits of their illegal possession.

The principles by which the defence of bona fide possessions are regulated have been clearly laid down by the institutional writers (Stair, b. ii. tit. 1, sect. 23; Ersk. b. ii. tit. 1, sect. 25, end.)

The defence of bona fide possession can never be sustained, where, after a judicial challenge of the party's right has been brought he has been ordered by the judge to keep an account of the whole proceeds of the subject, with a view to an ultimate accounting, in case his antagonist should be successful. From that time forward he cannot, in reason or common sense, consider these proceeds as his own. He is, in truth, possessing for the benefit of both parties, and not for his own exclusive benefit. Accordingly, there is no case to be found in which, notwithstanding such an order and such a course of possession, the defence of bona fide possession has been sustained to the exclusive benefit of the party possessor.

Such a doctrine, indeed, would be altogether inconsistent with the almost invariable practice of the Court in similar questions in making such orders upon one or [782] other of the parties, rather than granting an interdict in favour of either, by which the proceeds of the subjects in dispute might be entirely lost to both of them. See the case of the Earl of Fife v. the Magistrates of Banff, 27th November 1829 (8 S., D., and B., 137), and the course there followed.

Further, and independently of the order to keep an account, it is impossible that the defenders could be allowed the benefit of bona fide possession; for, no sooner was the record closed, than Lord Corehouse, upon the statement of the defenders themselves, interdicted them from fishing above the line upon Sangster's plan, which interdict was renewed and explained by the Court to embrace the two pools in question. The defender's case was, prima facie, so desperate, that, before any discussion on the merits, it was held that they were not entitled to the benefit of the interim possession.

Lord Chancellor.—This appeal is part, and it is to be hoped the last part, of a contest which commenced in 1763. The town of Dingwall and the proprietors of the estate now possessed by the respondents claimed right of fishing in the river Conon, the limits of which it was supposed had been finally ascertained and fixed by an interlocutor of 1778, by which it was declared, that "the magistrates and town council had produced a sufficient title to the fishings in the river opposite to their property, from the march of Breakenord down to the sea."

It may be assumed, that at this period the position of the march at Breakenord was well known; but as, for many years after this time, the rights of fishing of both [783] parties were let to the same lessee, evidence of their boundary was not preserved.

In 1825 the respondents commenced a suit, complaining of the appellants fishing in pools of the river beyond their limits, and particularly in Pool Oure or New Pool. The respondents insisted upon their rights to fish thus, under the interlocutor of 1778, contending that the march at Breakenord, described in the interlocutor of 1778, was above and not below the place in dispute. By an interlocutor of Lord Corehouse, of the 12th November 1828, affirmed by the Court 20th January 1829, it was declared, "that the words 'opposite to their property,' in the judgment of 1778, were demonstrative and not taxative, and therefore the Court found that the magistrates of Dingwall (in the words of the judgment) have a sufficient title to the fishings in the river Conon from the march at Breakenord down to the sea; but, in respect parties are not agreed as to the march between the lands of Balblair and Breakenord, appoint the pursuers to put in a condescendence upon that point."

The introduction of the new term, "the march between the lands of Balblair and Breakenord," supposed at the time to be synonymous with the term "the march of Breakenord," gave rise to new difficulties. At last, after an appeal to this House, the interlocutor of the 11th July 1832 was pronounced, which finally fixed the position of the march of Breakenord as being between Pool Oure or New Pool and Pool Breakenord, and thereby decided the boundary in favour of the respondents, and this interlocutor was affirmed in this House on the 12th April 1834.

It having been held, that it was not competent for [784] the respondents to claim compensation in that suit in which those proceedings took place, for the invasion of their ascertained rights during the dependence of the action, the present suit was instituted for that purpose. The appellants, in their defences, attempted to open the question of boundary, and also insisted that should the question of right be otherwise, they, having been bona fide possessors, were not therefore liable to account for damages. By an interlocutor of the 11th March 1837 all the defences, except the last, were repelled, and this interlocutor not having been appealed from is conclusive. By an interlocutor of the 6th of July 1837 the defence on bona fide possession was also repelled, and the appellants were ordered to account in terms of the libel. From this interlocutor the appeal is now brought. The question therefore is, whether the appellants are bound to account for the profits of the fishings in this part of the river, to which it has been decided that they are not entitled, or whether they are to be protected from such account by the rule in the law of Scotland as to bona fide possession.

In considering this question it is necessary to attend particularly to several proceedings in the former suit, to which I have not before adverted. By an interlocutor of the 9th March 1826 the appellants were ordered to keep and preserve accounts of the number of salmon caught by them in the river generally; but this was, in June following, altered, and confined to that part of the river called New Pool. On the 11th March 1828 the appellants were interdicted from fishing in any part of the river above the black line in Sangster's plan; but it being disputed what part of the river the black line represented, another interlocutor of the 11th of July 1829 was pro-[785]-nounced, by which the interdict was renewed, prohibiting the appellants from fishing in Pool Oure and Pool Breakenord, and directing the respondents to keep an exact account of the fish caught in these two pools, which assumes that these two pools were considered as being protected by the interlocutor of the 11th of March 1828. Upon this, the respondents obtained possession of those two pools, and kept possession till March 1831. By another interlocutor possession of those pools was again delivered to the appellants but (in the terms of that interlocutor), that justice might be done to the respondents in case that interlocutor should be altered, the appellants were ordained to keep an account of the number of salmon taken by them in Pool Oure and Pool Breakenord.

After the first decision of the right in 1832, the respondents applied for interim execution and possession of the pool, but it was by consent, on the 17th January 1833, ordered that the application should be refused, the appellants being still obliged to keep an account of the number of salmon taken by them in those two pools, till the final determination of the cause. It has been suggested, as the reason for leaving the appellants in possession subject to account, that they, having no right of fishing higher up the river, were interested in obtaining all the fish they could from those places; whereas if the respondents were put in possession subject to account, they might neglect the fishings in those places altogether, trusting to catch the fish higher up. It is obvious that in making these several orders as to keeping accounts, the Court contemplated having the means of giving to the respondents, if their right should [786] be established, compensation for the loss sustained by having been kept out of possession. If, after such order, the Court has not the power of directing such compensation, this arrangement of leaving one party in possession subject to account can never be beneficially resorted to.

The appellants also must have known that such was the object of the Court, as the order for them to keep an account would otherwise be useless; and in their resistance to the application for interim possession in 1833, they do not dispute such to have been the object of these interlocutors. If, therefore, the rule of law were in their favour, it would be to be considered whether they were not in this case precluded from availing themselves of it.

It is however to be considered what is the rule of law as to bona fide possession. Lord Stair, book ii. title 1, section 23, and Erskine, book ii. title 1, sec. 25, put this rule upon the only rational ground, that is, that a party in possession, supposing his title to be good, consumes the goods without any expectation of being called upon to account for the value of them. It would therefore be a great hardship to compel him to do so in favour of the successful party, who by not asserting his title earlier had led the possessor into this confidence. But Lord Stair says "else" that is, if they had no reason to trust to their title, "they are presumed to preserve the fruits, or employ them profitably for restitution." Now in this case the judgment of 1778 informed the defenders that they had no title to fish upon the march at Breakenord; and the plan of 1763, upon which they rely, places a march, therein described as "march between Balblair and Breakenord," above Breakenord, the place mentioned [787] in the judgment of 1778, and below Pool Breakenord, and beyond all question below Pool Oure. The appellants must have known that they had no title above the march at Breakenord; what point was intended to be included in that description was one that became doubtful, but it was a mere question of fact. Upon that doubt as to the fact they assumed the right of fishing in Pool Oure and Pool Breakenord, above both the line marked in Sangster's plan, and the place called Breakenord, an assumption inconsistent with any assignable position of the march at Breakenord. Besides which, the confusion of boundary, so far as it existed, appears to have risen from the town having let their fishings to the same person who was lessee of the fishings immediately above and contiguous to these, for it appears that the lease from the proprietors of the respondents lands was of an earlier date than that from the town. Whether under such circumstances the principle of bona fide possession could be pleaded, is important only to those periods and to those parts of the river as to which the direction to keep account did not apply, which is but a small part of the case. No authority has been cited to show that it can be set up in such a case. The Court of Session has decided that it cannot. It would, I think, be most unjust that it should, and I therefore cannot think that your Lordships will lay down any such rule.

As to those parts of the case which are included in the direction to keep accounts, it would be a fraud upon the pursuers and upon the Court to give effect to such a defence. The condition by which the Court was guided with respect to the possession was, that the party [788] in possession should keep an account; this necessarily implied that the result of the account so kept should be dealt with as the Court should think fit ultimately to direct, and necessarily excludes every principle upon which the doctrine of bona fide possession is founded.

It was contended for the appellants that this case ought, under the Judicature Act, to have been sent in the first instance to a jury; for that I see no ground whatever; this is not a case of quasi delinquency, where the conclusion is for damages only, it is a subject of account arising out of the right as established in the former suit. There is no question of fact to be tried. This appeal appears to me to be a very unnecessary prolongation of the contest which has so long subsisted between the parties, and a very unfortunate addition to the expenses attendant upon it, and which, if successful, would be productive of great injustice.

For these reasons, and being of opinion that the judgment of the Court below is not one open to any substantial objection, I move your Lordships to affirm the interlocutors appealed from, with costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutors therein complained of be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellants do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is further ordered, That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of [789] Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

[790] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

Mrs. CATHERINE CAMERON LOGAN or GILL, residing at Hillend near Airdrie, Widow of the deceased Captain Henry Gill, sometime of the 50th Regiment of Foot, Appellant.—John Miller—W. Daune; MARGARET LOGAN, only child and nearest and lawful heiress of line and of tailzie and provision of the deceased John Maxwell Logan, Esquire, of Fingalton, and her Trustees and Tutors, Respondents.—A. McNeill—G. Robinson [1st August 1839].

Entail—Institute—Life-rent and Fee—Service.—A party, by deed of entail, disposed his lands “to and in favour of M. in life-rent only, during her lifetime after me, and to the second son to be lawfully procreated of her (M.’s) body, and the heirs to be lawfully procreated of his body, whom failing,” to other parties “heritably and irredeemably.” The deed provided that “the second son of the said M., and the other heirs substitutes,” should bear the entailor’s name and arms; the cardinal prohibitions, and relative irritant and resolute clauses, were directed against “the said M., or any of the heirs aforesaid.” J., the second son of M., was not born till some time after the entailor’s death. Upon his attaining majority he expedie a general service as nearest and lawful heir of entail and provision to the entailor, and a title was completed in favour of M. in life-rent only, and himself in fee. In a question betwixt J. and a substitute heir,—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), 1. that [791] the fetters had not been effectually imposed on J. the institute.

Held, 2. that if a party be, by the terms of a deed of entail, the first beneficial taker of the fee, he is the institute, although, by the conception of the destination, the fee would appear to be in pende between the death of the entailer and his birth, without supposing a fiduciary fee in a party having a previous life-rent.

Held, 3. that a party who is institute by the terms of an entail does not, by expeding a service as heir of tailzie and provision to the entailer, and making up his title under the entail, debar himself from pursuing a declarator of his immunity as institute from the fetters of the entail.

By disposition and deed of entail, dated 14th February 1793, and recorded in the register of tailzies 14th November 1819, John Maxwell, esq., of Fingalton, on the narrative of the love and regard which he bore to Mrs. Margaret Baird, his spouse, “and for the affection I have for Mrs. Margaret Mitchell, spouse of Walter Logan, junior, merchant in Glasgow, who lived in my family from her infancy to her marriage, and it being always my intention that she should succeed me in my estate after my death, and for many other good causes and considerations me hereto moving,” under the provisions, conditions, reservation, and power and faculty therein mentioned, gave, granted, assigned, and disposed from him, and all others his heirs and successors, “to and in favour of the said Margaret Mitchell, in life-rent only, during her lifetime after me, and to the second son to be lawfully procreated of her body, and the heirs to be lawfully procreated of his body; whom failing, other substitutes, heritably and irredeemably, all and whole,” the estate of Fingalton, therein particularly described: [792] “But providing and declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that the second lawful son of the said Margaret Mitchell, and the heirs of his body, and the whole other heirs substituted by this deed, whether male or female, and the descendants of their bodies succeeding to the foresaid lands and estate, and teinds thereof foresaid, according to the foresaid destination, shall be holden and obliged to assume, and constantly retain, use and bear the sirname, arms and designation of Maxwell of Fingalton,” etc. Then followed a prohibitory clause. The irritant and resolute clauses provided that in case the “said Margaret Mitchell, or any of the heirs hereby called to the succession,” shall do in the contrary, etc., the acts and deeds should be null, and the right of the party forfeited.

John Maxwell, the entailer, died in the year 1793, and Mrs. Margaret Mitchell or Logan entered into possession of the estate. John Maxwell Logan, second son of the said Mrs. Margaret Mitchell and the said Walter Logan, was not born till some time after the death of the entailer; but in 1816, upon his attaining majority, titles were made up in his person under the entail.

In 1834 John Maxwell Logan, and also his sister Mrs. Gill, and other substitute heirs, brought mutual declarators to ascertain his rights under the entail. The summons by the substitute heirs (signed 20th March 1834), set forth that John Maxwell Logan had “made up titles to the said estate as the institute or first person called by the said deed, and has possessed the same as such, along with his mother, for a number of years,” and concluded that it ought and should be found and declared, by decree, etc., that according to the true spirit, [793] intent, and meaning of the said entail, as well as the sound and true legal construction of the expressions therein contained, the whole provisions, declarations, restrictions, and fetters thereof, apply to the said John Maxwell Logan, defender, as institute or first person called under the said entail, and that the said John Maxwell Logan, has no right to sell, alienate, dispose, or otherwise burden the said estate, whereby the same may be evicted from the said series of heirs called to the succession thereof. The statement in John Maxwell Logan’s summons (signed 21st March 1834) was almost in terms the same as in the other summons, but containing an e conversio conclusion. A supplementary summons, calling the whole heirs substitutes, and containing similar statements and conclusions, was afterwards brought by John Maxwell Logan.

In their condescendence the substitute heirs set out the terms of the service and of the deeds constituting John Maxwell Logan's title, which were in conformity with the terms of the entail; and the two following pleas in law were stated by them on the record:—1. From the peculiar structure and terms of the deed of tailzie libelled on, the pursuer, Mr. Maxwell Logan, is not a proper institute in the conveyance. On the contrary, as he was not in existence at the date of the tailzie, his mother, Mrs. Margaret Mitchell or Logan, was the fiduciary fiar to whom the estate was in the first instance conveyed; and the fetters being applied to her expressly, and her successors, necessarily applied to John Maxwell Logan.

2. His proper character under the tailzie in question is that of an heir; and having made up a title to the estate by service, and been retoured, "proximus et [794] legitimus haeres talliae et provisionis demortui Joannis Maxwell," he cannot, while that title subsists, maintain that he is not an heir, or maintain any plea inconsistent with that character.

The Lord Ordinary ordered cases, and thereafter pronounced the following interlocutor, adding a note:—"27th May 1836.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the revised cases for the parties, with the record, productions, and whole process, in the action and supplementary action at the instance of John Maxwell Logan, decerns in terms of the conclusions of the libels; and in the action at the instance of Mrs. Catherine Cameron Logan or Gill, assoilzies the defender, and decerns; and in these conjoined actions, finds the said John Maxwell Logan entitled to expenses, and remits to the auditor to tax the account thereof when lodged, and to report."

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary hopes that it is no longer necessary to state the grounds of a judgment finding that the fetters of an entail, imposed upon heirs only, do not bind the institute. If it be, no point in the law of Scotland can be held as settled. The attempt to show that John Maxwell Logan is not the institute, but an heir of entail, it is thought, has entirely failed. The estate is conveyed to his mother in life-rent, for her life-rent use only, and to her second son; the fee vested in the second son, John M. Logan, ipso jure, as soon as he came into existence as institute. No fee could be transmitted to him from his mother; if he served heir to her, it was for the purpose not of acquiring, but of declaring a right to the estate. None of the decisions cited by the substitute heirs bear upon the case."

[795] The appellant reclaimed, and pointed out a mistake in the Lord Ordinary's note as to John's service to his mother instead of the entailor. The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"20th December 1836.—The Lords having advised this reclaiming note, and heard counsel, recal the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it finds expenses due to Mr. Logan; quod ultra, adhere to the said interlocutor, and refuse the desire of the reclaiming note, and find that the expense of this process must be paid from the entailed estate of the pursuer, John Maxwell Logan; appoint the account of expenses incurred by the said George Logan and others to be given in, and remit the same to the auditor to tax the same, and report."

Mrs. Gill appealed; and John Maxwell Logan having died, appearance was made for his infant daughter and representative as respondent.

Appellant.—If John Maxwell Logan was the institute under this entail, the respondents were clearly entitled to found on the Duntreath class of cases. But the question raised is, whether he is not an heir, and must necessarily take as such? and in reference to this question there are two points to be made for the appellant, both depending upon nice and difficult questions of law.

1. Was John the institute or an heir? The disposition was to Mrs. Mitchell in life-rent, and to her second son and a series of other heirs; John the second son not having been born at the death of the entailor, the fee necessarily devolved on some party, as it could not remain *in pende*te. The institute has been always [796] understood to mean the party to whom the fee of the estate first passes. It may be that the entailor intended to make the second son of Margaret Mitchell the first beneficial taker; the expressions used by him denote that intention. But, while the intention is clear, it is necessary, in order to effectuate that intention, that there should be due conformity with the legal mode of transference; in order to this it must necessarily be assumed that the fee passed to Margaret Mitchell at the death of the entailor, otherwise, contrary to an acknowledged maxim of law, the fee would be *in pende*te from the death of the entailor to the birth of her second son. Either then Margaret Mitchell was the first taker of the fee, in other words the institute, or the bequest in favour of her second son is void. When a conveyance is made to a party in life-rent, and his children nascituris in fee, the fee is held to be vested absolutely in the parent as the only mode of excluding the heir at law. Hence it is necessary, in order to impose a trust upon the life-renter, to use the words "in life-rent only." But this limitation applying only to the beneficial enjoyment, the legal fee is in the life-renter as much in the one case as in the other; the life-renter is, equally in both, the first taker of the fee. See Lord Corehouse's opinion in Mein v. Taylor (5 S. and D. 781, new ed. 729), which appears to be directly at variance with his Lordship's views in the present case, and which is submitted to be the correct statement of the law as established in Wellwood v. Wellwood, 23d February 1763 (Mor. 15463), Dundas v. Dundas, 2d January 1823 (2 S. and D. 145, new ed. 133). The case of Newlands (Mor. 4289) does not [797] meet the difficulty in the present case, for there the children were in existence at the death of the testator.

2. That it is only in the character of heir of entail, as distinguished from the institute, John Maxwell Logan could acquire a title to the estate, is proved by the manner in which he made up his title. As institute he did not require a service to entitle him to take up the procuratory; unless he was heir of entail he has not acquired a title to the estate at all.

Erskine (Ersk. b. iii. tit. 8. s. 31) explains, as to making up titles, that substitute heirs cannot take up the succession as heirs of the disponent, but must succeed as heirs of the disponent. In the Seaforth case the party claiming to be institute had completed her title by service as heir, and feeling the importance of the step, afterwards attempted to disregard that service. Although the decision did not depend upon that service, still the mode of completing the title was held properly to weigh with the judges, as is plain from Lord Glenlee's opinion at the advising, on 24th November 1818. The title in John being that of heir, he could not by this process get quit of that title and assert a different character (Effect of Service.—Ersk. b. 3. tit. 8. sec. 63. and 73.; 2 Bell's Illustrations, 427; Bell's Princip. 781; Ersk. b. 3. tit. 8. sec. 31.; Blackwood, Kirk v. Sasine, Mor. 14327; Ayton v. Ayton, 7th July 1784, Mor. 9732; Peacock v. Glen, 22d June 1826, F. C., and S. and D.; Colquhoun v. Colquhoun, in the House of Lords, 17th Feb. 1831, 5 W. and S., and in C. of S., 8th July 1831, Fac. Coll., and S. and D.; M'Kenzie v. M'Kenzie, 24th Nov. 1818, F.C., Lord Glenlee's Opinion therein). [The Lord Chancellor directed the attention of the appellant to the terms of her own summons, which set forth the legal character of John, as that of institute, both parties indeed so stating the fact, and asking a declaratory [798] finding by the Court how far, as institute, he was fettered by the entail.] The appellant referred to the pleas in law upon the record as raising the points now argued.

Respondents.—In the mutual declarators, both parties, in the subsumption and conclusions of their summonses, set forth that John was the institute, and asked the Court to declare whether the fetters of the entail were effectually imposed on him. The present case is clearly within the rule settled in the Duntreath case, and recognized in the series of decisions* commencing with the case of Findrassie in 1752, and ending with that of M'Gregor Murray, affirmed in the House of Lords in 1838.

Cumming*, 22d May 1798, Mor. 15467, affirmed 20th June 1800; Miller v. Cathcart, 12th Feb. 1799, Mor. 15471; (Culdares) Mensies v.

The term "institute" clearly applies to the party who first takes beneficially. A mere supposition or [799] fiction, to satisfy a technical rule, cannot alter the character imposed upon the donee by the will of the disponent, particularly as the only object in resorting to such a fiction is to give his intention effect. In the present case, as it was clearly the will of the entailor that the second son of Margaret Mitchell should be the first actual taker under the deed, the fiction or supposition of a fiduciary fee, if brought into operation at all, must be so, not to destroy but to effectuate that intention. But the current of authorities * clearly establishes that this technical difficulty, if it ever existed, no longer exists in the law.

Lord Braxfield, J. C., in the case of Gerran v. Alexander, 14th June 1781 (Mor. 4402), held, 1. that a fee may be in pendente, and that there was no necessitas juris to uphold a contrary presumption; 2. that the intention of the disponent was the paramount principle to be looked to in fixing the character of the disponent; and, 3. that even if the rule that a fee cannot be in pendente remained in force, the principle was met by supposing a fiduciary fee in the parent till the child was born, the institution of the heir then clearly taking effect. Thus the Court had been prepared to find authoritatively, as was done in the leading case of Newlands, 9th July 1794 (Mor. 4289), affirmed on appeal tempore Lord Loughborough, C. (Mor. 4291), that the fee was clearly vested in [800] the children; and the same was held by Lord Eldon, C., affirming, in 1812, the case of Thomson v. Thomson (1 Dow, 417), decided below, of even date with the case of Newlands, but which had stood over; and, finally, the Court, in Harvey v. Donald, 26th May 1815 (Fac. Coll.), disposed of the difficulty now raised by the appellant as to the children, the disponents, not being born when the succession opened; it being held that the case of Newlands had settled a general rule, applicable alike whether the children were born at the death of the disponent or not. But esto, that it was necessary to suppose a fiduciary fee in the parent till the birth of the child, and so Lord Corehouse probably thought; still the character of institute impressed on the fiar by the will of the disponent remained unchanged.

Besides, a life-rentrix, as fiduciary fiar, was in no respect in the situation of an absolute fiar, institute, or first taker under the deed. She held the property, not for her own absolute use, but for the use of another. No doubt as life-rentrix she was in many respects interim domina of the subject, and saved from casualty of ward and non-entry, and accordingly in the brieve in a special service, the seventh head of inquiry was,—In whose hands the fee has been since the death of the ancestor? This is no farther answered than to prove life-rents where they have existed, as they exclude non-entry while they last. So that the appellant had overlooked important authorities, and had relied on the case of Lord Dundas, which, from the very short report of it, appeared to have been one of those amicable suits now discouraged by the court, where those acting [801] for Lord Dundas had thought fit to consult the court upon the accuracy of the title completed in his Lordship's person. The objection started in the name of a substitute heir was, that a general service having been expedited by Lord Dundas upon the supposition that the precept had been exhausted by the infetment of the first Lord Dundas in life-rent merely, that must have been done on the footing of the first lord being a fiduciary fiar; but the court held the title valid,—in other words, considered the general service, by which Lord Dundas took nothing, to be immaterial.

C., affirmed 24th June 1817, 5 Dow, 72; Murray v. Elibank, 2d July 1833, F. C., affirmed 19th March 1835, 1 Sh. and M'L. 1; (Herbertshire) *Morehead v. 2. As to the effect of John's service as heir; it is well known that a service is not confined to the case of an heir, as distinguished from a donee or institute. Where a party is about to make up a title it may be equally necessary for him to establish his character of donee as to establish his character of heir, and equally in the one case as in the other this may be done by service. In the present case, John Maxwell Logan was not named in the deed; it was proper that he should establish his character of second son before making use of the procuratory, and this was aptly done by service. If the procuratory might be used without this ceremony, a fortiori has it been used with it?

Apart from the technical distinction between an institute and an heir, the circumstance that the second son is specified in one provision of the deed, and omitted in the statutory clauses, is, according to the known rule of construction of entails, sufficient to shew that he is not restrained by them.

Besides, the question was as to John's powers under the deed, and therefore the objection of the appellant was not hujus loci, there being no question with a [802] purchaser, nor, as in Lord Dundas's case, any opinion asked as to the accuracy of John's title.

John took nothing by his service that was not already vested in him. He could no more by a service alter his character as institute, than an heir could make himself institute by erroneously completing a title under the procuratory and precept, and without a service. A party may make up an imperfect title under a correct notion of his rights, or he may make up a perfect title under an erroneous idea as to his rights, and still his true character, whether an institute or heir, remain unchanged. The fact of a service having been expedite was no criterion of the party being heir; although the fact of being an heir is the legal test and criterion of the necessity of a service. And truly the Court had in such cases held that the "form of making up the titles is of no consequence," as in Henderson v. Henderson, 12th Nov. 1796 (Mor. 15442); and in M'Kenzie v. M'Kenzie, 24th Nov. 1818 (Fac. Coll.), the objection to the Lady Hood M'Kenzie's service as heir while she claimed as institute was so little regarded, that though noticed in the appeal cases it was not urged in the House of Lords, at least it did not enter into Lord Eldon's judgment. But in the pleadings in the Seaforth case reference was made to the Cudraes case, in which the same question had been fully discussed, and an objection to the title to sue in respect of the party in possession having completed his title by service as an heir of tailzie, disregarded.

The Cudraes case involved the question how far James Menzies was to be considered institute or heir, and the latter character was attempted to be attached to him in [803] respect of a service expedite as heir of tailzie. The first decision of the Court is reported under date 25th June 1785 (Fac. Coll., and Mor. 15436), (the report, however, being confined to one branch of the argument). The cause, having been appealed, was remitted by the House of Lords on 30th June 1801, and the Court having by a judgment on 18th January 1803 adhered to their former interlocutor, the same was affirmed on appeal, 20th July 1811 (not reported), temp. Lord Eldon, C.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case I think your Lordships cannot entertain any doubt of the propriety of the interlocutor which has been pronounced. This was a disposition by a deed of entail to Margaret Mitchell in life-rent, and to her second son, and he now claims the right to sell or dispose of the estate as he may think fit. Now it is not contended to be doubtful that the institute is not bound by the fetters of this entail, as the fetters only apply to the heirs and not to the institute; and my Lords, it is clear that in this case the respondent John Maxwell Logan was institute. He is designated as such. He is the stock from whom the heirs substitutes are to proceed. It is manifest from the structure of the deed, that in imposing the burdens on Margaret Mitchell and the heirs, the entailer does not impose them upon the institute. For this unquestionably is law, that the clause imposing fetters must be construed strictly, and the Court must find in that clause express terms including the institute, which there are not here.

[804] Then my Lords, there are two grounds upon which the case of the appellant is put; first of all it is contended that the fee cannot be in the second son, who was not in existence when the succession opened, but that it must be vested in Margaret Mitchell. Now, under that entail Margaret Mitchell is in terms the life-rentrix; and I do not see that it is material to consider where the fee is vested during the interval, since clearly Margaret Mitchell was only life-rentrix.

Then it is said, that John, the second son, has lost the right he now claims, by his having made up his title to the estate by service as heir of entail. We have no authority quoted for the purpose of shewing that the party is to lose his right, because of the terms of his service, and it would be a most extravagant result of a legal rule if it were so. There may be reasons, if it be at all doubtful whether his character is that of institute or substitute, why he should content himself with one character rather than another. But where is the authority, that having done so, he is to be excluded from contending for the construction of the entail which he now contends for. There are no authorities offered in support of that, and there are many authorities referred to by the respondent shewing the contrary. There is the case of Henderson v. Henderson (Mor. 15442), in particular, quite conclusive as to this.

And, moreover, when you come to look at the proceedings, namely, the summons on behalf of the present appellant, and the summons on behalf of John Maxwell Logan, those do not proceed upon any such ground. [806] They both asked the declaration of the Court as to the right of the parties upon the construction of the deed of entail. The Lord Ordinary and the Court unanimously came to the conclusion, that John Logan is not heir of entail, and that he is the institute, and is not included within the fetters of the entail. It seems to me, there is no doubt raised as to the propriety of that view, and therefore I shall move your Lordships to affirm the judgment. Probably the relationship of the parties would induce the respondent not to ask for costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutors, so far as therein complained of, be and the same are hereby affirmed.

[806]    APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

JAMES BEVERIDGE and JOHN WRIGHT WILLIAMSON, Appellants.*—Lord Advocate (Rutherford)—John Stuart; ALEXANDER SMITH, Respondent.—Pemberton—James Anderson [5th August 1839].

Bona fides—Competition.—Circumstances in which Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that an arrangement had been entered into by the general creditors of an insolvent debtor, including a party holding a prior heritable security and parties holding postponed heritable securities, which would make it a breach of good faith in the parties to adopt separate proceedings; and the postponed heritable creditors having, subsequent to said arrangement, poinded the ground, Held, further, in a question with the prior heritable creditor, that such proceedings could not have effect, and that it was immaterial whether a preference at law had been thereby gained, since it could not equitably be used.

In December 1829 Thomas Thomson, innkeeper in Kinross, granted a bond and disposition in security for £1800 over certain heritable subjects to Alexander [807] Smith the respondent. In 1830 he granted to Smith another bond over the same subjects for £1100; and on both securities Smith was infeft. In 1831 Thomson granted a bond and disposition in security for £300 to the appellant, James Beveridge, and another bond and disposition in security for £1261 to Skelton and others, who subsequently conveyed it to the other appellant, John W. Williamson, a writer in Kinross.

* 16 D., B., and M., 381.

In the beginning of 1832 Thomson became insolvent, and several personal creditors proceeded to do diligence against him. Thomson called a general meeting of his creditors, which was held at Kinross on 21st March 1832. Among others, the respondent, and Skelton, and Williamson as acting on behalf of Beveridge, attended on this occasion, and concurred in the resolutions adopted at the meeting. The minutes bear, that Thomson had before the meeting a state of his affairs, and that "the meeting having taken into consideration the above state of debt, along with the circumstances of the business carried on by Mr. Thomson, are of opinion, that in the meantime it is most advisable, and for the interest of all concerned, that the establishment should be kept open, under the control of the creditors; and that, for this purpose, a committee should be named to superintend the management of Mr. and Mrs. Thomson, to see all monies regularly and periodically lodged in the bank in name of said committee, or of one or more of their number, and to pay out such sums as are necessary for carrying on the business." It is then stated, "that the meeting accordingly resolve to manage the business in the manner above mentioned, and appoint the following [808] a committee for this purpose, four to be a quorum, namely, Messrs. Smith, Steedman, Dowie, Brown, Hardie, Williamson, Curror, and Skelton; Mr. Skelton to be convener." The committee were directed to report their proceedings to a general meeting of the creditors to be called for that purpose. And the minutes farther bear, that "as some of the creditors have executed poindings of the furniture, and used arrestments, in the hands of Mr. Pyper and others, the committee are authorized to take measures to render these steps ineffectual, as preferences, in such a way as they may deem advisable, either by paying the expenses of these poindings, etc., or by making Mr. Thomson bankrupt."

The committee of management met on 4th April 1832, and the minutes bear, that, "in consequence of some of the creditors having poinded some of the horses, the sale of which is advertised for to-morrow, the committee consider that if the same is persisted in it will be necessary to purchase back the horses, and take measures for reducing all preferences, and obtaining for the other creditors a share of the poinded effects corresponding to their debts." Immediately after this resolution, by Williamson's advice, actions of poinding the ground were raised, in the names of Beveridge, Skelton, Steedman, and Dowie, the postponed heritable creditors, in which decrees were obtained on 15th May 1832.

At a meeting held on 24th July 1832, Williamson was authorized by the committee to receive payment of money due by Mr. Pyper to Thomson for coaching business, and, in order to prevent arrestments from [809] being used, he was instructed, at a subsequent meeting held on 1st February 1833, "to obtain an assignation to the mail and coach drawing and profits, as trustee for the general behoof."

Of the last meeting of the committee, held on 2d December 1833, the minutes bear that the respondent was instructed "to wait upon Williamson, and receive from him for our information all his accounts relative to Mr. Thomson's matters, that we may thereby be enabled to judge what farther procedure shall be necessary to be adopted in the regulation for the future of Mr. Thomson's matters."

In July 1834 Beveridge and Williamson, having previously raised on each of the heritable bonds a summons of poinding the ground before the sheriff of Kinross, and having obtained decree, and raised and executed letters of poinding, obtaining warrants of sale of the moveables on the ground in the natural possession of the debtor. They did not execute these warrants, but in June 1834 they obtained a fresh warrant and advertised a sale. The respondent obtained an interdict of the sale, and raised a summons of poinding the ground in the Court of Session (Thomson being dead and his heir abroad). Beveridge and Williamson entered appearance to the action and were allowed by the Lord Ordinary (Corehouse) to state their defences, in which they maintained that the respondent had lost his right as a prior creditor, which they by their proceedings had gained a preference.

The Lord Ordinary (Cockburn, before whom the case came in place of Lord Corehouse, who had taken his seat in the Inner House,) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Edinburgh, 2d June 1837.—The Lord [810] Ordinary having considered the process, and heard parties. Finds that all parties have renounced further probation: Finds, that the defenders, under their decrees of poinding the ground, executions of letters of poinding and warrants of sale, have a preference to extent of obtaining payment of their respective debts of three hundred pounds sterling, and of one thousand two hundred and sixty-one pounds three shillings and five-pence sterling, over the pointable moveables appraised in the inventories upon which the warrants of sale proceeded, and to this extent sustains their defences, and decerns. Quoad any other pointable moveables belonging to the children of the deceased Thomas Thomson, or to his widow, to the extent of the rents due by her, which are or may be on the ground, decerns in terms of the libel: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report."

"Note.—The pursuer having the prior right, might by due measures have made it effectual. But having done nothing with this view, and the defenders, though their right be posterior in date, having obtained decrees of pointing, which were executed and followed by extracted warrants of sale, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that these proceedings gave them a preference, and that there is no authority for now holding that the preference must depend on the mere priority of the right in point of time.

"The pursuer no doubt states two personal objections to the right of one or either or both of the defenders to use the advantage they have gained; but neither of these are well founded.

[811] "1. It is said that they were bound to go along with the rest of the creditors, and that this was the special duty of the defender Williamson, who had not only agreed to abstain from separate measures, but was the agent of the creditors. But these averments are not supported by the evidence in process; and the objection, instead of being stated by or for the general body of the creditors, is brought forward by the pursuer individually, who wishes to exclude the defenders, merely in order to enable him to use the very separate measures which he condemns.

"2. It is stated that the defenders have lost the benefit of their diligence by mora. The Lord Ordinary does not think so. A long period has certainly followed their warrants, and no actual sale has hitherto taken place. But the first part of this delay, extending to nearly a year, arose from their desire to accommodate the creditors, and the pursuer as one of them, by not turning the widow of the tenant out of possession, and was acquiesced in by them and by him. During the subsequent part of it, they were prevented from proceeding by an interdict at the pursuer's instance, which he afterwards abandoned. Nor did the pursuer ever do any thing in furtherance of his own right during these pauses.

"The Lord Ordinary gives the defenders their expenses, because in so far as they are concerned, the pursuer was wrong. He has got decree quoad any moveables that may be on the ground after the defenders debt is paid; but this they never resisted, or had any thing to do with."

The respondent reclaimed.

After advising minutes of debate the Court pro-[812]-nounced the following judgment:—"26th January 1838.—The Lords having resumed consideration of this reclaiming note, and having also considered the minutes of debate, and heard counsel for the parties, in respect of circumstances involving a personal objection to the defenders, recal the interlocutor reclaimed against, and find that they are in consequence barred from obtaining any preference in virtue of their diligence; therefore decern, and declare in terms of the conclusion of the libel: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit to the auditor to tax the same and to report."

Messrs. Beveridge and Williamson appealed.

Appellants.—There is no evidence of any agreement between the appellant Mr. Beveridge and the cedents of the appellant Mr. Williamson on the one hand, and the general body of creditors on the other, to institute and use the pointings of the ground for behoof of the general body of creditors; and even assuming that there had been such an agreement, the respondent, who does not represent the personal creditors, was not in titulo to enforce it or to oppose the appellants' preference; at all events, the effect of such an agreement could only be to compel the appellants to communicate the benefit of their pointings of the ground to the general body of creditors, and could never entitle the respondent to obtain a judgment in the terms of that now appealed from, giving him a preference over and the sole right to the whole moveables on the ground.

[813] There was nothing in the facts or law of the case to raise a plea of personal exception against the appellant Williamson, in his character of assignee of Messrs. Skelton, Steedman, and Dowie, either on the ground of agency or otherwise. Neither the alleged agreement, nor the plea of personal exception, could be urged against or affect the appellant Mr. Beveridge, for he was no party to that alleged agreement, and his interests could in no shape be injured by the plea of personal exception proposed against Williamson. By the law of Scotland it is clear, that by raising their actions of poinding the ground, obtaining decrees therein, executing and reporting poindings of the ground, obtaining and extracting warrants of sale, and advertising a sale to take place, all without the respondent having taken any step to assert his alleged right over the moveables on the ground in virtue of his bonds; the appellants had obtained and secured a preference over these moveables, which the respondent was no longer entitled to defeat. Even if an actual sale should be held to be necessary to complete the appellants' preference over the moveables on the ground, the present question must be viewed as if a sale had taken place, such sale having been prevented solely by delay granted at the respondent's request, and by the wrongous interdict obtained by the respondent, and kept in force by him for nearly a year on the dependence of an action which he thereafter abandoned as incompetent.

Respondent.—In the circumstances of this case, the claims of the appellants ought to be rejected as groundless and untenable, and there is no room even for admitting them to the benefit of a pari passu ranking; [814] the respondent never directly or indirectly renounced his right to a preference, and, at any rate, the proceedings adopted and contemplated by the general body of the creditors had become inoperative, and the rights of the present competitors must be determined, according to the priority of their infeftments, in the same way as if no such proceedings had taken place.

All the measures adopted by the respondent, as the holder of the first heritable securities, were conducted in a legal and formal manner, and there are no grounds either in fact or in law to bar him from asserting his right to a preference, and obtaining a decree of poinding the ground, in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

Independently of these fair and equitable grounds, the appellants in point of law had not established a preference. Even although they had acquired a complete right to the moveables under their diligence, they were barred, personali exceptione, from claiming a preference over the respondent, in respect of their accession to the resolutions adopted at the general meeting of Thomson's creditors, and of the arrangement whereby they became bound to use their poindings of the ground solely for the purpose of defeating the diligence of the nonacceding personal creditors. And in any view, the appellant Mr. Williamson, by acting throughout the whole proceedings as the agent and legal adviser of the respondent and the other creditors, was precluded from claiming any benefit in this competition, and had rendered himself responsible for any loss which might be sustained by his failure to take the necessary steps to protect the respondent's interests.

[815] Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this case in a court of equity would not have afforded room for discussion; and it is fortunate that the principle adopted by the Court below is the same with that which would have been prescribed in a court of equity.

My Lords, the facts of this case appear to be these: Mr. Smith had the first heritable security. He and the other creditors met in March 1832, and it was arranged that the business should be carried on, and a committee of management was appointed, of whom Mr. Williamson was one. Mr. Williamson acted for Beveridge and other creditors. The former part of the resolution, as set out in the appellants' case, states, that as "some of the creditors executed poindings of the furniture, and used arrearsments, in the hands of Mr. Pyper and others, the committee are authorized to take measures to render these steps ineffectual, as preferences, in such a way as they may deem advisable, either by paying the expenses of these poindings, or by making Mr. Thomson bankrupt." The mode they prescribed was not that which was afterwards adopted on another occasion, to which I will presently refer; but the object was necessarily the object of all parties interested in the estate,—to prevent possession of the estate being obtained by diligence being pursued by a particular creditor: that took place on the 21st of March. On the 4th of April the committee of management had another meeting, in which this appears as their minute:—"In consequence of some of the creditors having pointed some of the horses, the sale of which is advertised for to-morrow, the committee consider that if the sale is persisted in it will be necessary to purchase back the horses, and take measures for [816] reducing all preferences, and obtaining for the other creditors a share of the pointed effects corresponding to their debts." That is in complete accordance with the arrangement previously made; and there can be no doubt that all the creditors who were parties to these proceedings came into the arrangement that no steps should be taken which should have the effect, among those who were parties to the arrangement, of stopping the business; that steps should be taken to prevent any creditor gaining a preference, and that for that purpose those creditors who might attempt to gain preferences should be stopped in the various ways which were suggested. One way of effecting this purpose (those being mere personal creditors) was to institute proceedings on behalf of some heritable creditor, in order that the personal creditors might not obtain the property, and defeat the object of all the creditors present. Now, the proposition contended for by the appellants is, that it was not inconsistent with the good faith pledged between the heritable creditors and all parties to that meeting of the 21st of March, that proceedings should be adopted by the second heritable creditor for getting priority over the first. If your Lordships can suppose that that was the intention of the parties, or if your Lordships feel any doubt as to that not having been contrary to the intention of the parties, then some weight may be given to that argument; but, my Lords, in what situation was the first heritable creditor? If he had thought proper, he might at the meeting of the 21st of March have taken measures to secure the payment to himself. He might have helped himself by virtue of his prior claim; but that he did not think proper to do, probably thinking there was enough [817] to pay himself. He was willing that the property should be taken care of, for the purpose of providing such means as could be found to pay as many creditors as possible. He abstained therefore from using that diligence which it was open to him to use. But can it be supposed that it was his intention not to protect himself against the chance of the second heritable creditor gaining priority over himself? That is quite inconsistent with the whole arrangement between the parties, and quite irreconcilable with any intention that the first heritable creditor could have. Now, that some proceedings were necessary seems universally admitted. They were necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect that resolution of all the creditors, as expressed in the minute of the 21st of March 1832, for preserving the property for the benefit of all who were interested in it. Accordingly, proceedings were instituted for obvious reasons in the name of Smith. It was quite immaterial which heritable creditor was made a party, if the intention was to preserve the relative situation of all the creditors, but by no means immaterial if the object was to gain priority on the part of one over the other. But the object being to prevent the personal creditors gaining an advantage over all the others, it was immaterial which heritable creditor was made a party to prosecute the proceedings. Accordingly, by the direction of Mr. Williamson, proceedings were instituted in the name of Beveridge and others, having such heritable securities. Under these circumstances the proceedings continued until April 1836, when it is quite clear, for the reasons which have been stated at the bar, that at that time Mr. Williamson was agent for Smith; and if the question turned on that, no doubt it would be to be considered how far priority had [818] actually been gained before that connexion subsisted between Smith and Williamson. But I consider it quite sufficient that there was that connexion between Smith and Williamson, and that all the creditors were parties to that arrangement; and it was the bounden duty of Williamson, not only between himself and all the parties to that arrangement, (of course if he was acting for himself the case would be still stronger against him,)—but it is quite sufficient for the present purpose that, being one of the parties to the arrangement, and one of the parties to carry it into effect, it was not competent to him to lend his aid to or permit any one of those creditors who were parties to that arrangement to use the delay to which the first heritable creditor had consented so as to make it operate to the prejudice of that first heritable creditor, he abstaining from using his diligence, and thereby giving an opportunity to the second heritable creditor to obtain priority over him; it was quite a breach of that good faith which must have been the ground of the proceedings by all those who were parties to the transaction of the 21st of March 1832. I abstain from entering into the question of priority, which in point of law is one which the Court below has considered as not arising, and which undoubtedly cannot arise. If then your Lordships are of opinion that the Court below was right, whatever may be the legal priority obtained by the second heritable creditor, the question is, whether he was precluded by the transaction that took place and the situation he filled from availing himself of that priority. If he gained it,—it is immaterial whether he gained it at law or not,—i.e. if your Lordships are of opinion that supposing he has gained it, he cannot equitably use it. [819] Those are the grounds upon which the Court below have proceeded. My opinion on this subject is, independently of the act of agency by Williamson on behalf of Smith, founded on that arrangement to which all the creditors were parties on the 21st of March 1832, explained by the subsequent proceedings of the 4th of April 1832,—that after that arrangement it was a breach of faith in the parties to adopt those proceedings, and that it is the duty of every court exercising an equitable jurisdiction to confine the parties to that situation to which they ought to have confined themselves, if they had acted with good faith towards each other and consistently with the arrangement they had made.

My Lords, that is the foundation of the interlocutor appealed from; and if it had not been for the difference of opinion among the Learned Judges in the Court below, it appears to me to be a case so entirely established by the resolutions of the creditors in March 1832, regard being had to the subsequent proceedings, that perhaps some of your Lordships' time might have been saved, after hearing the appellants; but, under these circumstances, it is more satisfactory that you should have heard the whole case. I need hardly say, that being of that opinion, I should recommend your Lordships to affirm the interlocutor of the Court below, with costs, because it is a case in which an attempt was made, in breach of good faith, according to the opinion I have formed, to gain an advantage, which attempt, in my opinion, ought not to have been made.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, [820] and that the said interlocutor therein complained of be and the same is hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellants do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondent the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is further ordered, That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

[821] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

CHARLES TENNANT and Company, Appellants,*—Attorney General (Campbell)—Lord Advocate (Rutherford); JAMES HAMILTON (Pauper), Respondent.—A. M'Neill—James Anderson [5th August 1839].

[Mews' Dig. vi. 952, 961; x. 254. S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 122; and, in Court of Session, 1 Dunlop, 502; Fac. Coll. 14 Feb. 1839.]

Bill of Exceptions—Proof—Witness.—In an action of nuisance one of the defenders' witnesses, when cross-examined by the pursuer, answered, "Knows Glasgowfield (a neighbouring property); never knew of any damage done there." The counsel for the pursuer then proposed to ask the witness, "Whether he had known of any sum having been paid by the defenders to the proprietors of Glasgowfield, for alleged damage?" The judge, at trial, refused to allow the question to be put, whereupon the pursuer excepted. There was a verdict for the defenders: Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session, which allowed the exception,) that the proposed inquiry, being irrelevant to the subject matter, was inadmissible as evidence.

Per L. C.—It is an acknowledged rule of evidence that a collateral irrelevant inquiry cannot be gone into, to discredit a witness on the other side.

[822] James Hamilton, late gardener at Mount-pleasant near Glasgow, brought an action against Charles Tennant and Co., manufacturers at Saint Rollox, in the immediate neighbourhood, for the purpose of abating a nuisance of which he complained, and to obtain damages from the defenders for the alleged loss sustained by noxious and offensive smoke, and other vapours. The issues sent to trial were:—"It being admitted that the defenders are, and since the year 1819 have been, proprietors of a certain portion of land and buildings erected thereon, near Glasgow, and that chemical substances are and have been manufactured since the said year: It being also admitted that by the lease, of which No. 6 of process is an extract, dated 30th May 1816, the pursuer obtained possession, as at Candlemas 1815, as tenant, of a certain garden situate to the eastward of the said works:

"1. Whether, during the year 1819, and subsequent thereto, up to Martinmas 1832, or during any part of the said period, there arose from the said works of the defenders certain noisome, offensive, noxious, or unwholesome smoke and other vapours, to the nuisance of the said pursuer, whereby the produce of the said garden was deteriorated, and the pursuer incommoded and annoyed in the enjoyment thereof, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

"2. Whether, on or about Martinmas 1832, the defenders wrongfully took possession of 150 cart-loads of manure, the property of the pursuer, or about that quantity, and wrongfully retain the same, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

[823] "3. Or whether, in the said year 1819, previous to the pursuer's entering into possession of the said garden, the smoke or other vapours issuing from the said works of the defenders were as great or nearly as great in quantity, and as noisome, offensive, noxious, or unwholesome, or nearly so, in reference to the said garden of the pursuer, as those issuing from the said works of the defenders during the said period, from 1819 to Martinmas 1832?"

Upon the trial before Lord Jeffrey and a common jury at Glasgow the pursuer adduced evidence to establish that the smoke and other vapours from the works of the defenders had, in point of fact, occasioned damage and injury to the produce of other grounds in the neighbourhood of the said works; and the defenders adduced evidence to establish that the said works did not, in point of fact, occasion any damage or injury to the produce of any other grounds in the neighbourhood. Among other witnesses for the defenders was a person named David Smith, a land-surveyor in Glasgow, who stated that he had surveyed the lands in the neighbourhood, that he had made a plan of the vicinage, and mentioned several places which, in his opinion, had sustained no damage. On cross-examination, by the pursuer, the witness made the following answer:—"Knows Glasgowfield" (a place not previously mentioned). "Never knew of any damage done there." The counsel for the pursuer then proposed to ask the witness whether he had known of any sum having been paid by the defenders to the proprietors of Glasgowfield, for alleged damage then occasioned by their works? This question was [824] objected to by the defenders; and the objection being sustained, the pursuer tendered an exception.

Thereafter, the jury found for the defenders.

A bill of exceptions was then presented to the First Division of the Court, when their Lordships ordered minutes of debate upon the competency of the cross interrogatory.

On advising the minutes their Lordships pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Edinburgh, 14th Feb. 1839. The Lords having advised this bill of exceptions, and heard counsel for the parties, allow the exception, set aside the verdict in this case, and grant a new trial."

Tennant and Co. appealed.

Appellants.—The question rejected does not bear upon the issues. Even though an affirmative answer had been given to the inquiry, it would have been inadmissible as evidence. The payment of money, though proved, did not establish damage done. An award or compromise, and a sum paid down, would not be relevant evidence for this purpose. Such is the law even in regard to admissions made for the purpose of settling an alleged claim extrajudicially (2 Starkie, 21, 22; Robertson v. Baxter, 2 Murr. Rep. 427; M'Lachlan, 4 Murr. 218; Wright v. Ewing, 4 Murr. 585). Considerations might have induced the appellants to settle with the proprietors of Glasgowfield, although there might have been no damage or no possibility of proving any damage. If the proprietors of Glasgowfield had re-[825]jected a proffered sum, and brought their action for nuisance, they would not have been allowed in that action to give the offer in evidence, nor to put the question as here proposed. It is clear then that the answer to this interrogatory cannot be made evidence for the respondent.

But then it is said that the proposed question was in any view competent as a means of testing the credibility of the witness. In the first place, that was not the object for which the evidence was tendered; this view of the matter was not suggested at the trial, nor there disposed of, nor is it adverted to in the bill of exceptions. Secondly, If the question had been put to test the credibility of the witness, the judge should necessarily have been informed of it. But, thirdly, It could not be put to test the credibility of the witness, because it would clearly produce an answer involving matter irrelevant to the issue. The rule on this subject is well laid down in the last edition of Phillpotts on Evidence, by Mr. Amos (Edition 1838, p. 909). By the law of England you may discredit a witness by examining him as to statements which he made upon other occasions, in order to discredit and contradict him, but then he can only be asked as to statements which are relevant in themselves. See Baron Parke in Crowley v. Page (7 C. and P. 791). In trial by jury the attention of the court and the jury ought to be kept to the issue; it is incompetent to travel into other matter. A party may prove his whole case from his adversary's witnesses by cross-examination; but it is not to be done by irrelevant cross questions. [826] Besides, the question was objectionable, as tending not to elicit matter of fact, but of inference.

Respondent.—The appellants correctly state that the object and line of investigation adopted by both parties at the trial had been to show, on the one hand, that injury had been done to other grounds; or, on the other hand, that it had not. This, in truth, was the result of the statements on the record, which, if looked to, would show that such damage to the neighbouring grounds had been specifically condescended on. [Lord Chancellor.—That would merely shew whether or not the issues had been rightly framed.] It shows that there was no surprise at the trial, for although some of those statements were denied by the appellants on the record, they were not stated to be irrelevant or incompetent; and no motion having been made to have these struck out, they had competently been admitted to be proved. There was no room for the plea of res inter alios acta in reference to the proposed line of cross-examination; it had an immediate legal bearing on the question at issue. If proving the fact of injury to other grounds be competent, it is not easy to understand why matter essential to ascertain the witness's means of knowledge of that fact should be excluded. The competency of proving that damage was done is the test of the relevancy of the question. The witness might himself have relevantly mentioned the fact of payment of money as his causa scientiae, supposing his evidence to have been for, instead of against, the respondent. Under the A. S., 29th November 1825, cross-examination for that purpose is permitted. Would not payment [827] of money under a verdict of a jury, or decree of a court, or of an arbiter, have been admissible as evidence? Non constat that it was done by compromise. [Lord Chancellor.—How does the question of compromise arise under this first issue?] It arises in this manner: the assumption that the respondent is attempting to make evidence of a payment made in order to compromise a disputed claim, pervades the whole of the appellants argument; this is an entire mistake. It will be time enough to consider whether a compromise of a claim of damages with the proprietors of Glasgowfield can affect the merits of the present cause, when any such compromise is established. The respondent has inquired merely into the witness's knowledge of the fact of the payment, and no point is raised as to whether a compromise between the defenders and a third party may be given in evidence in the present cause. The appellants say no party complained of the nuisance: the respondent says there were complaints, and that sums were paid; to which it is replied that these may have been paid under compromise. But the question was not, Do you know that there was a compromise? but, Do you know that money was paid for alleged damage? [Lord Chancellor.—How do you make out it was not to buy peace?] Assuming that the fact of payment of money was collateral to the fact of damage having been done, was there any thing to prevent the respondent from cross-examining the witness in relation to it? What is foreign to the issue must not be confounded with what is collateral to the issue; foreign matter may be equally inadmissible, whether it is sought to be proved as a substantive fact, or as testing the [828] credibility of a witness. It is certainly, however, not so with respect to matter which is merely collateral to the issue; although matter be collateral, this does not imply irrelevancy. Collateral matter may indeed be also irrelevant, and then it becomes foreign, but it may likewise be relevant; it may bear on the case, or on the evidence already adduced, or on the credibility of a witness under examination.

Even in chief, collateral but relevant matter may be inquired into, but much more in cross-examination, and where the points to which the evidence is collateral form the substance of the witness's previous examination; for in cross-examination, the object of which is to sift evidence and try the credibility of witnesses, a great latitude is allowed in the mode of putting questions. (Phillipps, Evidence, 272; Parkin v. Moon, 7 C. and P. 408; Harris v. Tippet, 2 Camp. 637.)

It is in cross-examination that collateral matter generally emerges, and it has been expressly ruled in England that collateral questions trying the truth of a material part of the witness's story may be put (ex parte Bardeuell, 1 Mont. and Ayr, 206. Archbold, Dig. Plead. and Evid., 2 ed. p. 486); the same rule is followed in Scotland. (Pearson v. Walker, 20th July 1835, 13 S., D., and B. 1138, and F. C. Jury Sitt. p. 85.)

Whatever might have been the abstract competency of the respondent asking the question objected to, the appellants paved the way for it; they laid a foundation by asking questions on the same subject, and they could not prevent the respondent from exhausting [829] the inquiry. This principle applies to the most incompetent species of evidence—a party's own statements. Where a pursuer asks a witness what a defender said, the defender may, in cross-examination, inquire as to further statements, so as to try the accuracy or the general character of the memory of the witness (Chapman, 17th March 1821, 2 Murray, 460). The actual damage done might be proved by the cross-examination of this witness; besides, the respondent was entitled to damage the credit due to the witness. The question ought to be fairly looked to, not critically scanned; the word "then," which occurs in the question, meaning the fact of payment for damage "then" done; that is to say, at that time, or before the money was paid.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case there was a jury trial in Scotland, and a bill of exceptions tendered upon the examination of a witness named David Smith. The object of the action was to try a question of nuisance to a garden in the neighbourhood of a manufactory, which, it was said, emitted vapour and smoke prejudicial to the property of the pursuer, the party complaining. David Smith was called for the defenders, and he was examined as to certain premises in the neighbourhood of the manufactory in question, but he was not examined by the party producing him with respect to the place called Glasgowfield,—not the place in question, but a place situated near the manufactory. Both parties went into evidence for the purpose of showing what the effect of this [830] manufactory emitting smoke and vapour was upon the lands similarly circumstanced to those of the party complaining. Whether that was a legitimate mode of inquiry is not now to be entered into, for both parties pursued it, and for one purpose it was undoubtedly a legitimate mode of inquiry, viz., for the purpose of ascertaining what the effect was of the smoke and vapour emitted by this manufactory. This witness was examined as to several lands in the neighbourhood, and then a cross-examination took place. He says,—(his Lordship quoted the evidence at length). Then comes this answer, "Knows Glasgowfield; never knew of any damage done there." He is being cross-examined by the pursuer (by the party complaining of the damage); the pursuer, therefore, uses the witness (as he had a right to do), not for the purpose of cross-examining him as to what he had said for the party for whom he was originally called,—namely, the defenders,—but he uses him, if he can, for the purpose of extracting any evidence that might be beneficial to his side, and he asks him if he knows Glasgowfield; the witness says he knows Glasgowfield; he asks him then whether he had known of any damage done there; his answer is, "I never knew of any damage done there." That was not the answer which the pursuer, cross-examining the defenders witness, wished him to give. He had fixed him with the knowledge of Glasgowfield; he intended to use him to show that Glasgowfield had been injured by the vapour and smoke emitted from the manufactory; but, however, the answer given was not for the benefit of the party cross-examining him. Then the counsel for the pursuer pro-[831]-posed to ask the witness "Whether he had known of any sum having been paid by the defenders to the proprietors of Glasgowfield (the situation of which is pointed out on his plan), for alleged damage then occasioned by their works?"

Now, he had already said that he knew of no damage done there. If that question had been asked him by the defenders, no doubt a great latitude in cross-examination might have been permitted to the pursuer, for the purpose as well of ascertaining what he meant by "did not know," as for the purpose of testing the accuracy of his statement—of the credit due to that statement; but it so happens, when he says he knows Glasgowfield, and never knew any damage done there, it is an answer given by him to a question of the pursuer in cross-examining him. The pursuer is entering into a line of examination for the first time, and having got an answer which did not suit his purpose, he endeavours to get rid of the effect of that answer by putting a question upon a point short of what was the witness's knowledge; viz. "Whether he had known of any sum having been paid by the defenders to the proprietors of Glasgowfield, the situation of which is pointed out on his plan, for alleged damage?" The pursuer meant, if he could get an answer favourable to his view, to make that part of his case; he meant, not being able to get the witness to say that he knew of any damage, to get him to say that which he conceived would be the next best evidence, but which, in fact, would be no evidence at all. If the witness had answered in the affirmative that he had known of money being paid for alleged damage, it would be no evidence, because money paid upon a complaint made,—money paid merely to purchase [832] peace, money paid upon demand,—is no proof that the demand is well founded; it is not, therefore, to be given in evidence in support of the fact of damage being sustained.

Now, upon general principles the rule of law in this country and in Scotland must be the same: if a pursuer calls a witness, and asks him as to money being paid for alleged damage, his answer in the affirmative is not evidence of actual damage. If the pursuer had made a claim upon the owners of the manufactory for damage done to his field from the smoke and vapour emitted, and the owners had given money to quiet his complaint, that would be no evidence of the damage; it is money paid to buy peace, and to stop complaint; it is very often a wise thing, however unfounded a complaint may be, for parties to pay a sum of money in order to quiet the party making the complaint. But this does not rest merely upon general principles. The rule of law in this country, as laid down by a great authority, has been cited by the appellants; and from the authorities also cited by them it appears that there is no distinction between the two countries in this respect (see cases cited, p. 824).

The question then, clearly could not be put in order to elicit evidence for the party making the complaint, but it is said it was admissible in order to test the credit of the witness. Now, the witness had said nothing in his examination by the party for whom he was called, touching this subject matter. He had spoken of other properties, but he had said nothing which could lead to this cross-examination, and therefore it was not for the purpose of testing the accuracy or truth of any thing he had said. It cannot [833] be supported upon that ground, nor was that the ground, as I understood the argument, upon which it was attempted to be supported, but that it might be put as a matter of inquiry, with a view to test his credit. But if it be not evidence, it is an inquiry perfectly collateral; it is an inquiry into a matter which was not relevant to the subject matter in dispute: it would be relevant if it were admissible in evidence, but it is not. It does not relate to the subject matter, and it is an acknowledged law of evidence that you cannot go into a collateral irrelevant inquiry for the purpose of raising a collateral issue to discredit a witness produced on the other side.

On these grounds the Learned Judge trying the cause was of opinion that the question was not an admissible question under the circumstances of this examination, and to that ruling of the Learned Judge, unfortunately for all parties, because leading to great and unnecessary expense, a bill of exceptions was tendered. It was a question which, answered in either way, could not have affected the result of that cause in the slightest degree. The witness, whether his evidence was correct or not, had spoken of other descriptions of property in the neighbourhood of this manufactory, and he is asked whether he knew of money paid for alleged damage to a particular field, as to which he is not examined in chief; whether he answered yes or no, it cannot affect the question; now the Learned Judge so thought; unfortunately, however, a bill of exceptions was tendered, and unfortunately the Court of Session were of opinion against the ruling of the Learned Judge; they were of opinion that this question might be put, and [834] was an admissible question. The party against whom that decision was come to in the Court of Session necessarily comes here in order to have that judgment considered, because the Court of Session being of opinion that the bill of exceptions was well founded, had no alternative but to direct a venire de novo; it was necessary that the case should be tried again, in consequence of the Court of Session coming to this opinion, however unimportant the point might be; the Court of Session, being of opinion that it was an erroneous ruling of the judge before whom the issue had been tried, had no alternative but to direct an inquiry de novo, so that there was to be a fresh inquiry upon a point which could not affect the question one way or the other, whether the jury had or had not come to a right conclusion upon the evidence proved before them; but assuming that the jury have (which if they have not would be subject to a motion for a new trial, and in that way, if there had been a failure in the jury trial, the parties might have had an opportunity of trying the case over again),—but assuming that the jury had come to a right conclusion upon the matter before them, here is to be a new trial upon a point of evidence which, in whatever way the witness answered, could, in my opinion at least, not affect the result.

My Lords, it is very unfortunate when cases take that turn, and protracted litigation ensues upon points which have not the slightest bearing upon the result of the case. In this country much depends, in reference to tendering bills of exceptions, upon those who have the conduct of the cause, and though it is competent for counsel to tender bills of exceptions, it is in practice [835] reserved only for cases of great importance, where the real question between the parties is conceived to turn upon it, and where it requires the adjudication of the Court to set them right upon some doubtful point; it is a matter to be regretted that the rule which prevails so beneficially in this country, of reserving that course of proceeding only for cases that really deserve it, is not followed in Scotland, inasmuch as this case is an example of the evil which must flow from the too liberal use of that right by the suitor of tendering a bill of exceptions, and calling in question the ruling of a court of justice. My Lords, this is an instance in which I cannot but think it would have been better for the parties to have taken the course of bringing before the Court the merits of the case as to the propriety of the finding by a motion for a new trial, instead of bringing it by the course of error upon a bill of exceptions.

My Lords, I have no doubt, however, that this was a question which, under the circumstances, it was not competent for the party to put, and that the Learned Judge who tried the cause came to a right conclusion upon the evidence, and the bill of exceptions upon that point ought to be disallowed. Under these circumstances I move your Lordships to reverse the interlocutor appealed from, which decided that the Learned Judge who tried the issue had not properly ruled, and that the bill of exceptions ought to be disallowed.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the interlocutor complained of in the said appeal be and is hereby reversed: And it is further ordered, That the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, with [836] directions to disallow the bill of exceptions, to determine all questions of expenses between the parties in the said Court of Session, and to proceed otherwise in the said cause as shall be just, and consistent with this judgment.

[837] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY, ENGLAND.

SAMUEL BIGNOLD and Another, Appellants.—Knight Bruce—Jacob—Girdlestone; THOMAS OSBORNE SPRINGFIELD and Others, Respondents.—Attorney General (Campbell)—Pemberton—Blunt [5th August 1839].

[Mews' Dig. i. 334; iii. 226, 250. S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 71; 5 Bing. N.C. 745; 8 Scott 101; and in Court below, sub nom. In re Norwich Charities; 2 My. and Cr. 275. Discussed and explained in *Doe d. M. and G. 507; s. 133 of Mun. Corp. Act, 1882, taking the place of s. 71 of the Mun. Corp. Act, 1835.]

Statute 5 and 6 W. 4. c. 76. s. 71. (Construction of)—Charity.—Held, on consulting the judges, and affirming an order in Chancery, that the import of the above section of the above statute is, that the estate, title, and interest of bodies corporate, etc. of boroughs, in charitable estates, held by them in trust, should absolutely cease and determine on 1st August 1836, notwithstanding its being thereby provided that said estate, title, and interest should continue “until the 1st day of August 1836, or until parliament shall otherwise order.”

The 71st section of the act of parliament of the fifth and sixth of King William the Fourth is as follows: “And whereas divers bodies corporate now stand seised or possessed of sundry hereditaments and personal estate in trust, in whole or in part, for certain charitable trusts, and it is expedient that the administration thereof be kept distinct from that of the public stock and borough fund; be it enacted, that in every borough in which the body corporate, or any one or more of the members of such body corporate, in his or [838] their corporate capacity, now stands or stand solely, or together with any person or persons elected solely by such body corporate, or solely by any particular number, class, or description of members of such body corporate, seised or possessed for any estate or interest whatsoever of any hereditaments, or any sums of money, chattels, securities for money, or any other personal estate whatsoever, in whole or in part, in trust or for the benefit of any charitable uses or trusts whatsoever, all the estate, right, interest, and title, and all the powers of such body corporate, or of such member or members of such body corporate, in respect of the said uses and trusts, shall continue in the persons who at the time of the passing of this act are such trustees as aforesaid, notwithstanding that they may have ceased to hold any office by virtue of which before the passing of this act they were such trustees, until the 1st day of August 1836, or until parliament shall otherwise order, and shall immediately thereupon utterly cease and determine: Provided always, that if any vacancy shall be occasioned among the charitable trustees for any borough before the said 1st of August, it shall be lawful for the Lord High Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal for the time being, upon petition in a summary way, to appoint another trustee to supply such vacancy, and every person so appointed a trustee as last aforesaid shall be a trustee until the time at which the person in the room of whom he was chosen would regularly have ceased to be a trustee, and he shall then cease to be a trustee: Provided also, that if parliament shall not otherwise direct, on or before the said 1st day of August 1836, the Lord High [839] Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal shall make such orders as he or they shall see fit for the administration (subject to such charitable uses or trusts as aforesaid) of such trust estates.”

On the 16th of August 1836 the appellants presented a petition to the Lord Chancellor by their description of two of the inhabitants of the city of Norwich, and also two of the persons who at the time of the passing of the said act of parliament were members of the body corporate called the mayor, sheriffs, citizens, and commonalty of the city of Norwich, on behalf of themselves, and all other the persons who at the time of the passing of the said act were members of and constituted such body corporate; which petition prayed that it might be declared that, according to the true construction of the said act of parliament, all the said charity estates, funds, and properties did then remain and continue vested in the said petitioners and the other of the surviving persons therein named, or in such of them as were or might be living at the time of making the order to be thereupon made, upon the uses and trusts and for the purposes to which, at the time of the passing of the said act of the 5 and 6 Will. IV., the same were applicable as aforesaid; and that they the said petitioners and the said other persons might be at liberty and might be authorized to administer and apply the same, and the rents, interests, dividends, and annual profits thereof, upon and for such uses, trusts, and purposes, in like manner as the same had been theretofore applied; or in case it should appear to the Court that such is not the true construction of the said act, then that they the said petitioners and such other persons as aforesaid might be appointed trustees for the aforesaid [840] purposes, or otherwise that it might be referred to the master of the vacation to appoint proper persons to be such trustees, with liberty for them the said petitioners and the said other persons to propose themselves as such trustees, and that in the meantime the said petitioners and the said other persons might be at liberty to act in the administration of the said estates and funds, rents and income thereof, and that all proper directions might be given for effectuating the aforesaid purposes, and for duly administering the said estates and premises, and that the costs of and incident to the said application might be paid out of the said trust estates; or that his Lordship would make such further or other order as to his Lordship should seem meet.

On the 19th of August 1836 the respondents (who were respectively members of the council of the present body corporate of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough and city of Norwich,) presented another petition to the Lord Chancellor, stating that, in consequence of the lapse of the said 1st day of August, and parliament not having given any order or direction in respect to said estates, there were no longer any trustees to administer the charity, and therefore praying simply that it might be referred to one of the masters of the said Court to approve of some proper persons to be appointed trustees of the said charities; or that his Lordship would make such other order for the administration of such trust estates as to his Lordship might seem just and fit.

On 20th August 1836, the Lord Chancellor made an order to the effect following; viz., That it be referred to the master of this Court in attendance during the vacation to appoint proper persons to be trustees of and for [841] the charity estates and property late vested in or under the administration of the corporation of Norwich, or any of the members thereof, in that character, which are affected by the said section of the said act. And it is ordered, that all deeds, books, papers, and writings in the custody or power of any of the parties, relating to the said charity estates and property, be produced before the said master upon oath, as he shall direct, and he is to be at liberty to state any special circumstances, as he shall think fit. And his Lordship doth reserve the consideration of all further directions, and of the costs of these applications. And any of the parties are to be at liberty to apply to this Court, as there shall be occasion.

Messrs. Bignold and Rackham appealed.

Upon hearing counsel for the parties respectively, on the 19th February 1839, the cause was postponed, in order to have the opinion of the Judges upon the import of the foresaid section. On the 25th June Lord Chief Justice Tindal delivered the same, as follows:—

Lord Chief Justice Tindal.—My Lords, in answer to the question proposed by your Lordships to Her Majesty's Judges, viz., Whether the administration of the charity estates and funds, comprised in and described by the 71st section of the 5 and 6 W. 4., c. 76., continued after the 1st of August 1836 in the persons described in the said 71st section, no subsequent act having been passed respecting the same before the 1st August 1836, and no vacancy having been occasioned among such persons before that time? I have the honour of stating our opinion to be, that the administration of the charity estates and funds referred to in the question did not [842] continue, after the 1st August 1836, in the persons described in the 71st section of the act.

It was admitted by the counsel for the appellants in the course of the argument, and very properly admitted, that it is impossible to put any construction on the whole of the clause without meeting with difficulty. But we think ourselves bound to put that interpretation upon it, which, taking the whole of it together, appears to do the least violence to the words employed in it, and at the same time to give a consistent meaning to every part of the section; and keeping this object in view, we think the words in the 71st section, that the powers of the former trustees shall continue "until the 1st day of August 1836, or until parliament shall otherwise order, and shall immediately thereupon utterly cease and determine," are to be construed as if the words had been, "until the 1st of August 1836, or until parliament shall 'in the meantime' or 'sooner' otherwise order;" and that the words "shall immediately thereupon utterly cease and determine," intend that if parliament does not in the meantime otherwise order, the powers shall cease and determine upon the 1st of August; and if parliament did in the meantime otherwise order, then they should cease upon the day which should be thereby appointed and substituted by the legislature instead of the 1st of August. And we feel ourselves warranted in giving this construction to the earlier part of the clause, by the consideration that the last provision in the same clause contains an enactment relating to the same subject matter of legislation, and which is free from all ambiguity whatever, viz., "Provided also, that if parliament shall not otherwise direct before the said 1st day of August 1836," the Lord Chancellor [843] shall make such orders as he shall see fit for the administration of such trust estates; and we cannot understand the legislature to have had in its view an alteration by parliament unlimited in point of time in the former part, but limited in point of time to the 1st of August in the latter part of the same section.

The construction contended for on the part of the appellants is further liable to this objection,—that it leaves the time at which the powers of the former trustees are to cease and determine altogether undefined and uncertain. There might happen, according to that construction, an interval of time of unlimited extent before parliament might think fit "to interfere and otherwise order," and in the meantime it is obvious all would be involved in doubt and uncertainty. And again, there is, as it appears to us, a very strong objection against the reading "and" instead of "or," as contended for on the part of the appellants; that is, again reading the act, "until the 1st of August 1836, and until parliament shall otherwise order;" for this would imply that parliament could have no power to make such an order until after the 1st of August had passed, a construction not only inconsistent with the general authority of parliament, but irreconcilable with the proviso above referred to, which expressly refers to an alteration to be made before the 1st of August.

Upon the whole, we think the administration of the charity estates and funds did not continue in the persons described in the 71st section after the 1st of August 1836.

Lord Chancellor (25th June).—This is a case, in which your Lordships have heard the opinion of the Learned Judges. It is an appeal from an order made in Chancery; and [844] the opinion of the Learned Judges being (in conformity with that order), that the administration of the charity estates did not continue in the persons described in the seventy-first section of the act after the 1st of August 1836, I shall move that your Lordships adopt the opinion so expressed; and the only question will be as to the costs. This being an appeal against an order which, in the unanimous opinion of the Learned Judges, is considered to be a correct order, and the respondents being trustees of charities, I apprehend your Lordships will think it a case in which the order ought to be affirmed, with costs.

Lord Wynford.—My Lords, I quite agree in the judgment of the Learned Judges, and the opinion which they have expressed was that which I had formed upon the question before I heard the judgment which has now been delivered. But I confess that, considering the difficulty in construing the act of parliament, and considering too that this is the first time that this question has come under the consideration of this House, and that it was important to the interests of the municipal charities in this country generally that the question should be determined, I think it would be hard to visit the appellants with costs. In this case, the Learned Judges have found their way, through all the mazes and perplexities of this act of parliament, in my opinion, to a right conclusion. But when it is admitted, even by the counsel, that the act of parliament was attended with difficulties, I think the appellants should not be visited with costs, and I would, therefore, move as an amendment upon that part of the motion of my noble and learned friend, that the judgment be affirmed without costs.

[845] Lord Chancellor.—I was not in the least aware that upon this point there would be any difference of opinion, otherwise I should have proposed that the farther consideration of the case be postponed, inasmuch as it is in the absence of a noble and learned Lord who had been present during the whole of the argument, and with whom I communicated on this subject before he left the House. But as the noble and learned Lord who has just addressed your Lordships differs in his view of the case, I would suggest that the consideration of the case be postponed.

Mr. Attorney General.—May I be allowed to say, that on behalf of the respondents I am instructed to pray that the costs be allowed? We submit that it would be hard that the costs should fall upon the charity.

The cause stood adjourned till the 5th of August.

Lord Chancellor (5th August).—In this case, which was heard some time since, your Lordships had the assistance of the Learned Judges, whose opinion was unanimous, that the order appealed from was the correct order. My Lords, when the Learned Judges gave that opinion I moved your Lordships to affirm the judgment. One question remains as to costs. My Lords, the order appealed from is an order made in the Court of Chancery. The Learned Judges have delivered their opinion unanimously that the judgment below is correct, and it is matter of course, unless there is some reason to the contrary, that costs should follow the affirmance of the judgment, and particularly in this case where the respondents are trustees of a charity.

[846] Lord Brougham.—My Lords, there can be no doubt whatever upon it. I cannot say that a case might not have arisen in which a contrary practice might be adopted; but in this case there was not any doubt raised upon the construction of the act; the Learned Judges being unanimous shows there was no doubt.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said order therein complained of be and the same is hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellants do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the clerk assistant.

[847] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

WILLIAM LECKIE EWING and others, Appellants.*—Knight Bruce—H. Robertson; GLASGOW COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE, Respondents.—Pemberton—A. McNeill [16th August 1839].

[Cf. Heddl v. Leith (Magistrates of), 1898, 25 Rettie, 801: Kesson v. Aberdeen Wrights' and Coopers' Corporation, 1899, 1 Fraser, 40.]

Title to pursue—Statute 1821 (Glasgow Police).—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that residents in Glasgow, rateable in police taxes, had no title as such, at common law, nor under the above police act, to sue the police commissioners, on behalf of themselves and others, for misapplication of the police funds.

The appellants reside or occupy property in Glasgow, in respect of which they are liable to the police assessments.

An act of parliament which was passed in the year 1821, for establishing a police for the city of Glasgow, among other things provides for the election of general commissioners, to whom is committed the power of carrying the purposes of the act into execution. The act also specifies very particularly the purposes for [848] which the general commissioners are authorized to levy assessments upon the inhabitants liable to pay them, as also the way in which the amount of the necessary assessments is to be ascertained. By the 124th section appeal to the Circuit Criminal Court is allowed, and by the 133d section it is declared, that "no action shall be commenced against the magistrates and other commissioners for any thing done in the execution of this act after three calendar months from the time the act is committed," it being "competent to the trades house and merchants house to bring actions against the board of commissioners, or the board against its predecessors in office, in the Court of Session or Exchequer, for misapplying the funds, within twelve calendar months after the offence."

There are two companies for supplying the city of Glasgow with water, established under separate acts of parliament, the one under the name of the Glasgow Waterworks Company, and the other under the name of the Cranstonhill Waterworks Company. A proposal having been made to unite the two companies, by an arrangement under which the Glasgow company should, under authority of an act of parliament to be obtained, purchase up the Cranstonhill company's property and works, a bill was introduced into parliament (session 1834), to obtain an act authorizing this agreement to be carried into effect. This bill was strongly opposed by various public bodies, and among others by the general commissioners of police, who sent up a deputation to London to oppose the bill. A resolution was passed at a meeting of the board on the 13th February 1834, by a majority of twenty-one [849] to four, "That the committee be authorized to co-operate with the public bodies in giving effect to the resolutions of the board, by opposing the proposed monopoly in the supply of water, and to constitute a proportional expense of the opposition." The bill having been successfully opposed in parliament, and the expense incurred by the deputation having been ascertained, the board of police, by two resolutions, dated the 17th and 24th July 1834, ordered payment from the police funds of two sums of money, that is, of £47 7s. and £600, towards their share of the expenses.

The appellants brought a process of suspension and interdict, and afterwards raised an action of reduction and repetition against the respondents, (both bearing to be at the instance of certain private individuals,) setting forth, as their title, that they were "residents in Glasgow, or occupiers of property there, and rated in the police books as liable in the payment of police assessments under the police act, and who have hitherto been assessed accordingly," and concluding for reduction of the two resolutions of the 17th and 24th of July 1834, as in contravention of the police statute, and to have the commissioners who attended the meetings held on those days respectively ordained, "as individuals, conjunctly and severally, to repeat and pay back, or to procure to be repeated and paid back, into the hands of the said police establishment, the respective sums of £47 7s. and £600, which they illegally and wrongfully authorized, sanctioned, and ordered to be paid away out of the said funds as before mentioned, for the purpose of defraying the expense in part of opposing the said water company bill, to the effect that the said funds belonging to the [850] said police establishment may be in the same state as if the said resolutions had not been passed and the foresaid sums had not been paid away." The two actions having been conjoined, a record was made up. The respondents, inter alia, objected to the title of the appellants, and the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor on the 2d February 1836:—"Sustains the title of the pursuers; repels the objection to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session; finds that the action is not cut off by the statutory limitation of three months; finds that the defenders had no right to levy or apply the sums in question, or any part thereof, in defraying the expense of opposing the bill in parliament, specified in the summons; therefore reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the first conclusion of the summons; finds the defenders liable in the expenses of this branch of the discussion; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged remits to the auditor to tax the same, and to report; and quoad ultra, appoints the case to be enrolled." *

* To the above interlocutor his Lordship appended the following note:—

"Note.—None of the principles or authorities about popular actions apply to this

[851] The respondents presented a reclaiming note to the Second Division of the Court, and their Lordships, upon [852] advising mutual cases, pronounced the following interlocutor on the 19th (signed the 20th) January 1837 :—

“ [853] Recall the interlocutor complained of ; sustain the objections to the title case ; there can scarcely be conceived to be a better title and interest than that which a person who is taxed illegally has to resist that tax, at least in so far as relates to his portion of it. The 133d section of the statute confers a right of action on certain public bodies ; but giving these a statutory title does not take away any title belonging by law to individuals ; and even as to these bodies, their right is confined to cases affecting the misapplication of funds vested in the commissioners, whereas part of the objection here is, that the defenders went beyond their powers, and assessed for sums, which, for this reason, could not be legally vested in them.

“ Section 124 makes an appeal to the Circuit Court lawful, but the clause plainly does not apply to questions like this ; and, at any rate, the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court of Session to protect against excess of power is not taken away. The two sections which precede, and which follow this one, make it clear that the 124th only applies to proceedings in which the person aggrieved was judicially a party.

“ Section 133 limits actions for things done ‘ in execution of this act,’ to three months, but this does not apply to cases where the complaint is that the defenders went out of the act ; and besides, the act specially challenged took place on the 17th and on the 24th of July, and the action was raised on the 13th October. There were resolutions, no doubt, of February before, to do these acts, which prospective resolutions are not brought under reduction ; but it was unnecessary for the pursuers to challenge, not merely the act which injured them, but all the votes by which it may have been preceded ; if it were, every act might be saved from objection, by being preceded by a resolution above three months before, which, in itself, may do no harm, and of which the party hurt may never hear. In this very case it does not appear how there was any personal interest in any body to interfere, for nothing actually touching any individual was done ; there was merely a barren, general, and revocable resolution, that at some future time an unnamed proportion of the expense would be paid.

“ On the merits the Lord Ordinary has abstained from deciding any thing at present, except the first conclusion of the reduction, because the other matters cannot very well be extricated till the general principle be fixed ; and if his view of this principle be wrong, it is needless to compel the parties to go minutely into the rest of the case.

“ He is not moved in deciding the reductive conclusion by any considerations of expediency ; he goes upon the statute alone, and his general opinion is, that the defenders, as police commissioners, have no particle of power, except what they can show that they possess in virtue of the act of parliament which creates them, and that he cannot discover, by any legal reading or construction of that act, that they are authorized to assess for the purpose of opposing or of advancing any parliamentary bill whatever.

“ The case of the defenders rests on the averments, that the bill in question was hurtful to the inhabitants, and interfered with the existing police act, and that, without their official co-operation, it could not have been defeated. It is, and always must be, one of the misfortunes of permitting such applications of the funds, that any court, in judging of their propriety, must consider the truth of such averments, and that these are scarcely capable of being judicially ascertained. It appears, from this process, that there are persons in Glasgow who hold that the bill was of a beneficial tendency for the people,—that any obnoxious clauses might have been given up or arranged,—that it could have been thrown out without the defenders’ help,—and that, at any rate, their expenditure in obstructing it was extravagant. If the defenders are not to get unlimited credit, these points must be fixed before the propriety of what they did can be determined by this Court ; and how they are to be determined the Lord Ordinary does not know. They are, to a great extent, matters of mere opinion ; however, he assumes, in argument, that they are all clear in the defenders’ favour ; still, he cannot discover that legislation was any part of the commissioners’ business, at least at the expense of the police funds.

of the pursuers, as laid in this action ; repel the reasons of suspension and reduction ; dismiss both actions, and decern ; find expenses of process due ; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same to the auditor, when lodged ; to tax and report."

"The general import of the statute is, that the commissioners are to keep up a proper establishment of officers, and are to see that the city be watched, cleaned, and lighted, and that they may levy funds for the purposes herein directed, 'and for the other necessary purposes of this act, and for no other purposes whatever ;' this gives them ample authority to do any thing, such as even raising or defending actions necessary for the fulfilment of these objects. But, is opposing bills in parliament one of them? If the new bill contained clauses injurious to the public, and repugnant to the existing police act, this may have excited the public to resist ; but what part of the act says or implies that the commissioners may not only assess for administering the statute, but for perpetuating all its parts by obstructing parliamentary change? If a bill were to be introduced for repealing the police act, or for altogether abolishing the police, the Lord Ordinary has no idea that even such an extreme proposal could be lawfully opposed at the expense of the ordinary funds. The commissioners had no property in the police funds or privileges, so as to be entitled, like many other public trustees, to take all measures calculated to maintain or to extend their interests ; they were the mere official servants of the public, under this single and temporary act, so that their preventing a change of the statute could never be part of their implied duty of putting the statute as it stood into execution. If such a power was meant to be conferred, it is odd how it was not mentioned, especially as minuteness is the principle on which the statute is constructed ; there are about fifty or sixty sections, specifying what the commissioners may do ; they are not even allowed to fill up dangerous holes in the street without a clause. It is difficult to believe that, amidst such jealous precision, it was intended that so peculiar and irresponsible a power as that of agitating local bills at the expense of the people, nay, at the expense partly of the very persons opposed to the commissioners in that proceeding, should be conferred without any special words at all. If it had been proposed, in direct terms, to insert a clause in the police act for authorizing the commissioners to assess the people for the expense of opposing bills which they thought hurtful to their police system, its probable fate may be conjectured from the fact, that no such clause can be produced in any statute ; even when parliament means to permit the individual bill which it passes to be assessed for, this is always specially enacted, as it was in this very Glasgow act.

"It is not necessary to notice the defenders' plea under the second section, except for the purpose of showing the length to which their argument leads, and the applications of which it admits in other cases. These sections declare it to be the duty of the commissioners 'to have a general superintendence of their respective districts,' 'and take all measures for preserving the general peace, order, and comfort of the inhabitants thereof ;' from which it is inferred, that wherever comfort is concerned, which it was here, as water and pavement were concerned, assessments may be imposed. For the same reason, churches, and prisons, and hospitals, and theatres, and public baths, and other such things, all most essential, not only to comfort, but to order and peace, may be erected.

"This is an individual case, but the similarity of all police bills makes it one which may be acted upon almost wherever these statutes exist ; and if once the power be recognized, as conferred by implication, it is not difficult to see what use may be made of it. The general burgh police act may be supposed to contain the essence of all the power which parliament thought it necessary for police commissioners to have ; it contains no clause empowering them to assess for bills. But, if such a power be implied in their mere position, then it may be exercised in every burgh in Scotland. Something may be said in favour of the system of establishing boards all over the country, to exercise, at the expense of the public, a discretionary power of promoting, or of thwarting local parliamentary projects ; but something may surely be said against it. The defence that they only interfere to resist schemes touching their existing powers, affords no protection to the lieges, for there is scarcely any local bill which may not be truly said to do so."

The suspenders and pursuers appealed.

[854] Appellants.—The appellants have a direct interest, and a good title, to pursue the conjoined actions of reduction and of suspension against the respondents; the object of these actions being to prevent an illegal assessment from being levied upon them in future, and to obtain relief, in the only competent manner, from the effects of illegal assessments which have been already exacted.

It is maintained by the respondents that the actions of reduction and suspension were of the nature of a popular action; that the appellants had no substantial, direct, peculiar, or immediate patrimonial interest in the matter in question, such as to entitle them to pursue. But the answer is obvious; the interest which entitles the appellants to complain of illegal assessments, by which money has already been taken out of their pockets, and in consequence of which they have grounds to apprehend farther spoliations, is a patrimonial interest of the most substantial, direct, and immediate kind.

The just and sound view of the statute seems to be the converse of that contended for by the respondents, as the statute plainly supposes that the rate-payers have a good right and title to complain of illegal or excessive assessments made upon themselves, and gives them every facility for rendering that right available; and it has even made anxious provision for bringing to the knowledge of all the rate-payers in due and sufficient time the whole details of the respondents' conduct in the execution of their power. The annual accounts of the respondents, containing a statement of the receipts and disbursements of the year, are directed to be made out and printed, published in the newspapers, and lodged in the council chambers of the city for six weeks, [855] open to the inspection of every rate-payer without fee or reward; and it is provided generally that the whole books of the commissioners of police, containing all their minutes of procedure, are to be accessible to every rate-payer who may wish to peruse and inspect the same without fee or reward. For what purpose were these anxious provisions made for the information and satisfaction of the rate-payers, unless it was to enable them to judge whether the commissioners of police had properly performed their duties as prescribed by the statute, whether they had not exceeded their powers in levying assessments, or whether they had not improperly employed the assessments levied? If in any of these respects the board of commissioners transgress the statute upon which their powers depend, it is clear that the rate-payers have a good title, as well as a good interest, to object to such illegal proceedings.

In fact, the rate-payers are the only parties who have a title to challenge irregularities or excess of power in the imposing of the assessments; for it will be remarked, that the power of bringing actions against the board of commissioners, conferred by section 133, upon the three public bodies, before the Courts of Exchequer or Session in Scotland, does not relate to the levying of the assessments, but merely to the "embezzling, squandering, or misapplying the funds vested in them by this act."

Under the 133d section of the act there is a general limitation of all actions to be raised against the board of police, as to any thing done in the execution of the act, to three calendar months from the time the act was committed. This is the general rule. But then there is an exception from that general rule introduced in [856] favour of certain public bodies in regard to a certain description of actions, which are rendered competent at their instance, at any time within twelve calendar months after the offence for which such action may be raised shall be alleged to have been committed. These privileged actions must be raised in the Courts of Session or Exchequer, and they must relate exclusively to the embezzling, squandering, or misapplying the funds vested in the commissioners by the act. The privilege has no relation to actions brought in regard to excess of power assumed by the police board in imposing assessments. Such actions, under the former words of the section, must in every case be brought within the three months. Even within the three months it does not appear that the public bodies in their corporate capacity have any right to bring such action.

The privilege in question conferred upon these public bodies seems to be grounded upon the contribution to the police funds annually made out of the city revenues. The privilege consists in these public bodies being allowed to raise their action at any time within twelve months, instead of being limited to three months, and constitutes an exception to the general rule, and cannot be considered as superseding the ordinary right of action to which the limitation of three months applies.

The rate-payers cannot be held as deprived of their title to resist illegal assessments by the section of the statute in question, because no such right of action is conferred on the public bodies. The Lord Ordinary in his note has most justly observed, "The 133d section of the statute confers a right of action on certain public bodies; but giving these a statutory title, does [857] not take away any title belonging by law to individuals" (Johnston v. The Stentmasters of Kelso, 25th June 1800, Fac. Coll. N. 187, Mor. 12426, Ap. 1, Title to pursue, No. 1; Cowan v. Wigton, Magistrates of, 23d June 1782, Fac. Coll. 9, 73, No. 46, Mor. 16133; Anderson v. Magistrates of Renfrew, 30th June 1752, Fac. Coll. 1, 35, No. 17, Mor. 2539; Lang v. The Magistrates of Selkirk, 2d Dec. 1747, Elchies, Burgh Royal, No. 27, and 28th Nov. 1748, Mor. 2515; Dean v. The Magistrates of Irvine, 3d July 1752, Mor. 2523; Gilchrist v. The Magistrates of Kinghorn, 5th March 1771, Mor. 7366; The Merchant Company of Edinburgh v. The Governors of Heriot's Hospital, 9th August 1765, Mor. 5750; Finlay v. Newbigging, 15th Jan. 1793, Fac. Coll. 11, 21, No. 10, Mor. 2008; Wilson v. Scott, 16th June 1793, Mor. 2010; Montgomery v. Macausland, ibid.; Aitchison v. Magistrates of Dunbar, 4th Feb. 1836, 14 D., B., and M., 421).

Respondents.—The present is an action of reduction and repetition, which does not set forth any direct private and patrimonial interest in these appellants, or conclude for any thing to be paid to themselves, nor is it an action in the name of each, setting forth that some portion of the grievance complained of has fallen upon him, and seeking redress to that extent. There is no conclusion for reduction or repetition generally, or to any particular extent or amount, in favour of the appellants, either individually or collectively. It only points at some remote benefit or relief from a burden already imposed, to be derived from a successful issue of the action. It is a sufficient objection to the title to pursue in such an action as this, that by the law and practice of Scotland parties are not entitled to sue, where there is not a personal, distinct, and direct patrimonial interest to maintain the action. A remote, contingent, or possible interest, and far less any such imaginary interest as is here set out, will not sustain an action.

[858] The appellants themselves repudiate the idea, that their action can be maintained upon the principle of the popularis actio of the Roman law; no such species of action finds a place in the books, or is recognized in courts of law in Scotland, and to entertain such actions would be quite subversive of what is fully established as the law of that country.

A board of commissioners is here established, with certain powers as to levying and applying monies raised for the purposes of the act, and those funds are vested in them, and placed under their control in terms of the statute. The commissioners are subject, no doubt, to be called in question by the statute, by certain bodies empowered by the legislature to do so, but mere individual rate-payers cannot, by any such action as the present, interfere with or paralyze the management of the board acting under the statute.

There is no principle recognized in the decisions of the Scotch Courts which warrants the observation of the Lord Ordinary, that "there scarcely can be conceived to be a better title and interest than that which a person who is taxed illegally has to resist that tax, at least in so far as relates to his portion of it." The very object of the Glasgow police act, in giving certain independent bodies the right to challenge, was to exclude all attempts on the part of individuals to impede or to frustrate the measures of the commissioners (Wigton, 23d June and 1st July 1735, Mor. 1985; Burgesses of Inverury v. The Magistrates, 14th Dec. 1820, Fac. Coll.; Trinity House of Leith v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh, 6th Feb. 1829, Fac. Coll. No. 66, 7 S. and D. 374; Burgesses of Lauder v. The Magistrates, 17th May 1821, 1 S. and B. 17).

[859] Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, the judgment of the Court below in this case was founded on a defect in the title of the pursuers, and did not profess to decide the merits; the decision of the case on appeal, therefore, must depend on the same consideration. The interlocutor appealed from recalling the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, sustained the objections to the title of the pursuers as laid in the actions, and dismissed the actions. Those actions were, first, of suspension and interdict, and, secondly, of reduction and repetition ; in both the pursuers described themselves as residents in Glasgow, and occupiers of property there, and rated in the police books as liable in payment of police assessments under the police act, and as having been assessed accordingly ; and in both they professed to sue for themselves and for all those who had adhered to them, and whose names and designations were to be specified in a minute in the proceedings. The complaint is against the commissioners appointed under the police act for the city of Glasgow, for having applied sums of money, raised under the powers of that act, for purposes alleged not to be authorized by that act ;—that is, in contributing towards the expenses of an opposition in parliament to a bill respecting the water companies to supply that city with water. The letters of suspension and interdict prayed that the defenders, the commissioners, might be interdicted from applying any of the monies raised or to be raised under the powers of the police act to those purposes, and from levying any sums in whole or in part for such purposes ; and the summons of reduction and repetition concluded that the resolution and act of the commissioners for those purposes might be rescinded [860] and declared void, and that the commissioners, who were parties to the payments already made, might individually repay to the police fund the monies so alleged to have been misapplied.

Lord Cockburn, the Lord Ordinary, by his interlocutor of the 2d of February 1826, sustained the title of the pursuers, and repelled the objection to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session. This interlocutor was, upon a reclaiming note to the Second Division, recalled, and the objections to the title of the pursuers, as laid in the action, were sustained.

The title of the pursuers to sustain these proceedings may be considered, first, without reference to the particular provisions of the police act ; secondly, with reference to such provisions. It is admitted that what is known under the denomination of a popular action forms no part of the law of Scotland ; and the Lord Ordinary, in his appended note, says that none of the principles or authorities about popular actions apply to this case. The title claimed by the pursuers to sue in this mode and for this purpose is a question purely of Scotch law and practice, and must be decided by the precedents adduced.

The appellants (the pursuers) first rely upon the case of Johnston v. The Stentmasters of Kelso [25th June 1800] (ante, p. 857). In that case one of the inhabitants of Kelso brought an action before the sheriff against the treasurer of the stentmasters for production and examination of their accounts, in which he failed, and he then, in his own name, raised an advocacy and declarator before the Court of Session. The pursuer's title was objected [861] to ; but he contended that every burgess had an interest to investigate the ground of taxation and amount leviable against himself. The Court, as is said, considered the pursuer's title sufficient ; but there was less room to investigate this minutely, as the defenders were thought clearly right on the merits. This, then it must be observed, was not a decision upon the point of title, besides the object of the suit was very different from that now under consideration ; the case, therefore, may be altogether rejected.

The next case relied upon by the appellants is Finlay and Others v. Newbigging and Others, 15th Jan. 1793 (ante, p. 857). In that case Finlay, a member of a corporation, disputed the application of a sum of money raised upon the members of it, and having refused to continue the annual payment enforced upon him, the corporation resolved to set him aside from the trade, and that he should not be called to any meeting whilst he continued in arrear ; whereupon he, and others in the same situation, brought a process of declarator against the deacon and the members of the corporation. In this case the propriety of the application of the funds was discussed, and so far might have been applicable to a discussion upon the merits of the present case ; but as to the actual question of the pursuer's title it seems likewise to have no application. The pursuers complained of a personal injury in their exclusion from the corporation ; the form of action and its objects were totally distinct from that now under consideration.

The next case is that of Wilson v. Scott [16th June 1793] (ante, p. 857). [862] That was a bill of advocacy, complaining of the judgment of the magistrates of Glasgow, who, upon the complaint of members of a corporation, had held the application of certain funds illegal, and directed the officers to repay them. The Court of Session repelled the reasons of advocacy, and remitted the cause simpliciter to the magistrates. In that case the only question could have been as to the jurisdiction and judgment of the magistrates, and not the original jurisdiction of the Court of Session, which is the point in this cause.

The same observation applies to the next case relied upon,—Macauland v. Montgomery [16th January 1793] (ante, p. 857). Upon a complaint to the magistrates of Glasgow by Montgomery of an order by the trades house for the payment of a sum of money, of which it was alleged there had been an improper application, the magistrates pronounced an interdict prohibiting the payment; whereupon the deacon, conveners, and others, complained of the judgment of the magistrates by bill of advocacy, and at the same time brought an action of declarator to ascertain the powers of the majority of the trades house in the management of its funds. The Court of Session continued the interdict of the magistrates, and, in the declarator, decided the question of right upon a ground quite peculiar to that particular case. The merits of the judgment of the magistrates was the only matter in question. Their jurisdiction in the first instance, and that of the Court of Session afterwards, was not in dispute; that case, therefore, has no application to the present, upon the point now under consideration.

The case of The Merchants Company and Trades of [863] Edinburgh v. The Governors of Heriot's Hospital [9th August 1765] (ante, p. 857), is more applicable; in that case the defenders, being trustees of a charity for poor fatherless boys of burghesses and freemen of Edinburgh,—the pursuers being the merchant company and incorporations of the city,—a process was brought against the governors, concluding to have it found that the governors had no power to feu the charity lands, or, if they had, that the next feuar might be put under certain restrictions. Objections were made to the title of the pursuers, the Lords sustained the pursuers' title to carry on the process; but they being of opinion in favour of the defenders upon the merits, no opportunity was offered of questioning this decision upon the point of title; this case was as early as 1765.

In Aitchison v. the Magistrates and Town Council of Dunbar [4th February 1836], (ante, p. 857), the majority of the town council, describing themselves as burghesses and town councillors, instituted a suit in the Court of Session concluding for reduction of an act of the town council, in which the pursuers were the minority. It was objected, that as burghesses they could not sue, having no private or patrimonial interest in the subject; for the pursuers it was not disputed that the rule of law was against their title to sue as burghesses, but it was contended that, as members of the town council, they were entitled to demand the judgment of the Court of Session, as to the legality of the act of that body. Upon that distinction the Court sustained the pursuer's title the Lord Justice Clerk [864] saying (14 D., B., and M., 425), "The present question has nothing to do with the right of individual burghesses to complain of acts of the magistrates, because the actions were brought at the instance of four constituent members of the town council. The Court of Session is the only tribunal competent to reduce an illegal act or declare its illegality." Not only, therefore, is this not a case in support of the title of the present pursuers, but it is a case in which the reverse was admitted at the bar, and assumed in the judgment.

Three cases were principally relied upon by the respondents (the defenders): the first that of the Burghesses against the Magistrates of Inverury, 14th December 1820 (ante, p. 858); several burghesses instituted an action against the magistrates, who were charged with misapplying part of the burgh funds, and concluding that they might restore the amount to the burgh funds. The Lord Ordinary (Pitmilley) dismissed the action for want of title, finding "That the burghesses, though they have a remote interest in the funds and property of the burgh, have no patrimonial right in the funds and property, so as to confer on them a title to call the magistrates to account in the manner concluded for; and that their interests in the funds in question which as stated in the conclusions of the libel, leads them only to conclude that the money shall be placed to the credit of the royal burgh as articles of charge against the present magistrates, is not such a patrimonial interest in the funds as can entitle them to insist in this action." This was affirmed by the Court, when it was observed from the bench, "The [865] Court never sustains an action at the instance of a party who cannot state a direct or immediate interest in the result, which plainly cannot be alleged in this case, where the pursuers ask for no judgment available to themselves, but complain of acts done to the prejudice of the burgh."

This decision was recognized and approved in the case of the Trinity House of Leith and others against the Magistrates of Edinburgh, 6th February 1829 (ante, p. 858), in which the pursuers, on the ground that they were interested in the completion of the work, instituted proceedings against the parliamentary commissioners for improving the harbour of Leith. It was held that they had no title to pursue, the Lord Justice Clerk saying (Rep. in F. C. 19th January 1837, p. 336), "If we act as in the case of Inverury I can find no ground for doubt. The principle is there laid down clearly and distinctly that indirect interest of this description will not be tolerated by this Court."

In the case of Lauder (Burgesses of Lauder v. Magistrates, 17th May 1821), in 1821, (ante p. 858), the question was raised in an action of declarator as to the right of the burgesses in certain property. The pursuers were burgesses; the claim was not only for themselves but for other burgesses; and it was held that although each burgess might sue for his own individual interest, yet as the action at the instance of the burgesses was raised by them as a body, it must be dismissed, as they were not a corporation, and the action was the more irregular as it concluded for decree of declarator in favour of all the burgesses, while they were [866] not all pursuers. The Lord Justice Clerk, alluding to this case, says (Rep. in F. C. ut sup.), "It is quite clear, when they say they sue not only for themselves but for others, as a sort of body, the law cannot sanction any such thing. That was decided in the case of Lauder." All these cases are subsequent to any which can be relied upon by the appellants.

In England, where parties are numerous, some are permitted to sue in behalf of themselves and others, but they must themselves have such an interest as entitles them to sustain the suit. In Bromly v. Smith, 1 Simons, page 8, the plaintiff had a personal interest in the land for the cultivation of which the rates had been raised. The judgment in the Attorney General v. Heelis, 2 S. and St., page 75, proceeded upon the same ground, and Sir John Leach, V. C., has aptly marked the distinction in that case.

If then by the general law of Scotland, and according to the practice of the Court of Session, the title under which the pursuers have instituted this suit is not such as will enable them to support it, certainly the provisions of the police act for Glasgow increase their difficulty; that act provides certain remedies which would not be necessary if it were competent for any rate-payer to maintain such an action as this now in question. By the 124th section any person aggrieved by any order or other proceeding of the commissioners is entitled to appeal to the first Circuit Court of Justiciary to be held at Glasgow; and by the 133d section no action is to be commenced against the commissioners for any thing [867] done in execution of the act after three months, and it is made competent to the town council, the merchants and trades houses of the city, to bring actions against the commissioners before the Court of Session or the Court of Exchequer, for misapplying the funds, at any time within twelve months. I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary that these provisions cannot take away any jurisdiction which the Court of Session might have, but if there be serious doubt as to such jurisdiction, these legislative provisions for particular remedies are not to be rejected in the consideration of the question of jurisdiction.

My Lords, it appears to me, for these reasons, that the interlocutor appealed from is correct, and I therefore move your Lordships to dismiss the appeal, with costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutor therein complained of be and the same is hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellants do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is further ordered, That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

[868] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

ALEXANDER MORRISON and Others, Appellants.*—Knight Bruce—H. J. Robertson; GLASGOW COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE, Respondents.—Sir William Follett—A. McNeill [16th August 1839].

Title to pursue—Statute 1821 (Glasgow Police).—1. Held, as in preceding case of Ewing v. Inglis (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that rate-payers, as such, had no title to pursue commissioners of police, on behalf of themselves and others, for misapplication of funds.

2. Parties (being also commissioners of police) having sued as rate-payers, in a complaint against the general body of commissioners, in which character the Lord Ordinary decerned against them, and having in that character reclaimed to the Court, and the Court (adhering to the interlocutor) having found that they could not so sue,—Held (affirming as aforesaid) that it was not competent to ask the judgment of the Court, on the ground that, as a minority of the commissioners of police complaining of the acts of the majority, they had a sufficient title notwithstanding.

Mr. Morrison and other rate-payers, some of them being also commissioners of police, brought a suspension of a resolution of the board of commissioners to [869] pay the expenses of successfully opposing a water bill in parliament, similar to that in the preceding case. The Lord Ordinary, following the judgment of the Court in Ewing v. Inglis, repelled the reasons of suspension. The suspenders reclaimed. At the advising in the Inner House, their counsel directed the attention of the Court to the circumstance that some of their number were designated in the suspension as commissioners of police. In that character, therefore, they now insisted that they were entitled to sue as a minority complaining of the acts of the majority.

The Court disregarded the attempt to alter the title to insist at that stage of the process, and repeated their judgment as in Ewing v. Inglis.

Morrison and others appealed, and founded on the case of Aitchison v. Magistrates of Dunbar, 4th February 1836 (14 D., B., and M., 421); while the respondents maintained that the instance being radically defective, could not be cured medio processu.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, the decision in this case must necessarily follow that of Ewing v. Inglis. An attempt was indeed made to distinguish this case from that. It was stated that some of the pursuers are commissioners of police; and it was therefore contended, upon the authority of Aitchison v. the Magistrates and Town Council of Dunbar, (upon which I have before observed), and the case of Goddard v. the Leith Dock Commissioners, in 5 Shaw and Dunlop, 355, that they were entitled to take advantage of their title as such. [870] It is, I think, quite unnecessary to consider those cases, or how far the present case falls within them; because, although it is true that some of the pursuers are described in the summons as general commissioners of police for the city of Glasgow, it is quite clear, after looking through the summons and the other proceedings, that the title to pursue is not founded upon the possession by those pursuers of that character, but is founded exclusively upon their liability, together with the other pursuers, to police assessments. This case, therefore, is precisely the same as that of Ewing v. Inglis; and I, therefore, move your Lordships to pronounce the same judgment, dismissing the appeal, with costs.

* D., B., and M., 1128; Fac. Coll., 13th June 1837.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutors, so far as therein complained of, be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellants do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is further ordered: That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

Entail—Prohibitory Clause.—The prohibitory clause in a deed of entail provided "that it shall at no rate be allowable to the said (institute) 'nor any of the substitutes above named,' to sell off or dispose upon, any part of the lands and subjects before transmitted, nor to contract debt, or do any other deed whereby the said lands and subjects may be adjudged or evicted from the succeeding members of entail, or their hopes of succession thereto in any measure evaded."—Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session) that there was no sufficient prohibition against altering the order of succession.

Irritant Clause.—A deed of entail contained prohibitions to sell, contract debt, etc.; the irritant clause voided "all such debts and deeds."—Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session) that there was no effectual irritancy against sale.

Question, Whether a party who takes under an entail as heir male of the body of the institute is affected by prohibitions directed against "the substitutes above named"?

The late Gabriel Lang of Overton on 25th September 1766 executed a deed of entail of his estate in favour [372] of his only son Gabriel Lang (grandfather of the appellant), and various substitutes. The deed of entail provided and declared, inter alia, "That it shall at no rate be allowable to the said Gabriel Lang, my son, nor any of the substitutes above named (see post, p. 883) called to the succession of the lands and others before conveyed, to sell off or dispose upon any part of the lands and subjects before transmitted, nor to contradict debt, or do any other deed, whereby the said lands and subjects may be adjudged or evicted from the succeeding members of entail, or their hopes of succession thereto in any measure evaded. And if they do in the contrary, it is declared, in the first place, that all such debts and deeds shall be intrinsically void and null, and of no force, strength, or effect; and, in the next place, that the contravener, and descendants of his or her body, shall ipso facto forfeit the benefit," etc.

The appellant, the eldest son of Alexander Lang (entailer's grandson), the party last in possession of the estate, having served nearest and lawful heir in general to him, raised an action of declarator (23d May 1836, in which he called as parties his brother and the other then existing substitutes,) to have it found and declared by decree of Court, that notwithstanding the entail he had right and power to make up titles in fee simple or otherwise, to alter the succession under the entail, and to sell the estate and dispose of the price at his pleasure. The record being closed, upon condescendence and answers, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"27th June 1837. The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the [873] closed record and whole process, repels the defences, and declares and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds no expenses due." *

* "Note.—The opinion of the Lord Ordinary is with the pursuer, both as to the want of a sufficient prohibition against altering the order of succession, and the defect of the irritant clause, as not properly applied to the prohibition against sale. He has a firmer reliance, however, upon the second than the first of those grounds of decision.

"The prohibitory clause, where it is thought to be deficient, is very much in the style of the statute of entails, in so far as it runs the prohibition against contracting debts, or exposing the estate to forfeiture or eviction, into that which is supposed to be directed against altering the order of succession, with very little attempt at separation; and it is almost identical in its phraseology with that in the entail of Lochbuy (23d June 1807,) which was found to be in all respects effectual. In these circumstances, it is impossible not to see difficulties in this part of the case. But on the whole matter, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that there is still ground enough for holding, that the prohibition is in this case insufficient to prevent altering the order of succession.

"The argument from the example of the statute, in consolidating or running into each other the different clauses, which it is admitted must all substantially exist in a perfect entail, is not thought to be entitled to much weight. The statute by no means professes to give a formula for the construction of such clauses; and it has been definitely settled, by a series of concurrent decisions, for more than a century, that there must be a distinct and independent clause for each of the essential prohibitions; and that the defect of separate expression cannot be supplied either by an extensive construction of words, plainly referable to one such prohibition only, or by inference, however probable, as to the intention of the entailer. The series of exact precedents upon this point begins with the case of Campbell and Wightman, 17th June 1746 (Mor. 15505), and ends prior to the case of Lochbuy with that of Hooime of Argaty, 8th July 1789 (Mor. 15535).

"The case of Lochbuy no doubt then appears as an exception; and if it had appeared to have been fully considered, and had not been discredited by subsequent decisions, might be thought to have established a precedent, by which such a case as the present must necessarily have been ruled. To the Lord Ordinary, however, it does appear both to have been pronounced in circumstances which detract somewhat from its original authority; and to have in point of fact been so largely discredited by more recent decisions, as to be no longer to be relied on. In the first place, it was adjudged at the same time with the case of Roxburghe, and without any separate argument from the bar drawing the attention of the Court to the manifest distinction of the two cases—but apparently on the supposition that both depended on the same principle. Now the Lord Ordinary thinks the case of Roxburghe (which was affirmed on appeal) in all respects an unimpeachable judgment, while he is humbly of opinion, that the main ground on which it rested was entirely wanting in that of Lochbuy; and accordingly, he apprehends that, in all the subsequent decisions, this ground has been so distinctly recognized, that a rule may almost be said to be at last established to which this case of Lochbuy can in no way be reconciled. He refers especially to the cases of Brown (Eastfield), 25th May 1808—of Henderson, 21st November 1815, and of Grant, 9th March 1826, (with the unreported cases therein cited,) in all which the entail was found to be defective, as well as to that of Lord Buchan, 9th February 1837, where it was held to be sufficient, and that of Speid, 21st February 1837, where the whole law on the subject was very fully considered, and the issue (though turning on a point different from what occurs here) was against the validity of the deed.

"Now the rule which the Lord Ordinary humbly thinks is to be extracted from all these recent cases, as well as from the whole series prior to that of Lochbuy, is this,—that wherever the prohibition against altering the order of succession is only to be inferred from the circumstance of the description of acts primarily prohibited, as leading to adjudication, apprising, forfeiture, and eviction, being terminated by representing them as also calculated to prejudice, disappoint, defeat, or evade the succession of the several substitutes, or the tailzie generally; in all such cases, the prohibition will be insufficient to prevent a direct alteration of the order of succession,—the true meaning of all such clauses, and of the words with which they conclude, being merely to prohibit acts, whose primary effect and character it is, that they afford ground for adjudication or forfeiture,—and where it is only in consequence of this, that they are described as leading also to the disappointment of the order of succession, the just and real construction being, that no acts are truly prohibited by such clauses, except such as would warrant adjudication or forfeiture, and thereby defeat the rights of the succeeding substitutes. On the other hand, there will be an effectual prohibition against altering the order of succession, though these words are not expressly mentioned, and though the words held to be equivalent are introduced in sequence and connexion with another prohibition, provided the description of the acts previously prohibited is complete, before the words, relied on for this last purpose, are introduced, and especially provided those last words are exclusively applied to another class of acts, deeds, or things, from those primarily characterized as leading to adjudication, eviction, or forfeiture.

[874] The defender having reclaimed, the Court, after ordering printed cases, pronounced this judgment:—[875] “The Lords having heard counsel for the parties, and advised the cases, alter the interlocutor of the Lord [876] Ordinary submitted to review, sustain the defences, assoilzie the defender, and decern.”

The pursuer appealed.

“This distinction, it is humbly conceived, will be found to run through the whole series of cases from 1746 to 1837, without a single exception, but that of Lochbuiy alone. In every one of them where the prohibition against altering the succession was found ineffectual, the words touching the prejudice or disappointment of the substitutes formed parts only of the description of one and the same class of acts or deeds, which had been previously characterized as leading to adjudication or forfeiture, and was a mere continuation of that description; while in all these cases (except Lochbuiy,) where the prohibition was found effectual, the words touching the disappointment, etc. of the succession, are distinctly applied to a separate class of acts and deeds, which are nowhere described as leading to adjudication or forfeiture, and of which the only description in the entail is, that they may interfere with, prejudice, or frustrate, the succession of the substitutes. When the prohibitions, therefore, are separately applied to such acts and deeds, it would seem impossible to doubt, that alteration of the order of succession is as effectually prohibited, as if this had been said in express words, since there is no other quality or consequence ascribed to the acts in question, on account of which they could be included in the prohibitions.

“Nothing can illustrate this better than a comparison of the clauses in the case of Roxburghe, with those which occur in the subsequent decisions already referred to, where an opposite judgment was given as to the validity of the prohibition. In the Roxburghe entail there is first, an express prohibition, ‘to contract debt, or to do any deeds, whereby the said estate, or any parts thereof, may be apprized, adjudged, or evicted;’—thus satisfying and concluding the description of that class of deeds; and then there immediately follows ‘nor yet do any other thing in hurt or prejudice of the foresaid tailzie and succession in haill or in part.’ Now upon the principle already stated, it was rightly adjudged that there was here a sufficient prohibition against altering the order of succession. Since, after exhausting the acts and deeds that might lead to apprising or eviction, the prohibitions are distinctly extended to a class of ‘other things,’ which are no otherways described than as being ‘in hurt and prejudice of the foresaid tailzie and order of succession.’ The only subsequent case in which a similar judgment was given is believed to be that of Lord Buchan, 9th February 1837, and it was precisely of the same description. There was there a clear prohibition of ‘contracting debt whereby the lands might be apprized or adjudged,’—and then against ‘doing any other fact or deed in prejudice of the said tailzie, and of the persons above-named or their foresaids.’ In short, after prohibiting acts leading to adjudication or apprising, there is here also a distinct prohibition against other acts, not leading of course to any such result, but only described as being in prejudice of the tailzie, and the substitutes called to the succession.

“ Contrast now with these the series of cases in which it has since been found that there was no effectual prohibition, and see whether it be possible to account for the difference, except upon the plain and reasonable distinction which has now been indicated. There is, first, the Eastfield case, 25th May 1808, within a year after that of Roxburghe. The prohibition there was merely ‘not to contract debt, or to do any other deed whereby the lands may be appriised, adjudged, or in any way evicted in prejudice of this present tailzie, or those who in virtue thereof are to succeed;’ thus specifying only one class of deeds, the first and leading character of which is to bring an adjudication or eviction, and as a consequence of which alone these deeds are farther described as likely to prejudice the tailzie and the rights of the substitutes. The case of Henderson, 21st November 1815, is exactly of the same description. There the prohibition is against ‘contracting debts, or doing any fact or deed, civil or criminal, whereby the said lands may be anyways adjudged, evicted, or forfeited, or may be any way affected in prejudice and defraud of the subsequent heirs of tailzie successively, conform to the order and substitution above specified;’ there being here again but one class of acts prohibited, viz., acts inferring adjudication, eviction, or forfeiture, and consequently calculated to prejudice and defraud the substitutes appointed to succeed in their order; but no mention of any other class (as in Roxburghe and Buchan) inferring no forfeiture or adjudication, but merely prejudicial to the rights of the substitutes. The case of Grant and Tytler, 9th March 1826, (F.C.) was a clearer case perhaps than any of the others, but it rested on the same principle, the only prohibition alleged to strike at deeds of alteration being against any ‘deed or act, civil or criminal, which might be the ground of adjudication, eviction, or forfeiture of the said lands, or which might any ways affect or burden the same.’ But the case of Dickson (Blairhall) 6th July 1816, recited in this of Tytler, and not elsewhere reported, is perhaps the strongest of all against the sufficiency of the alleged prohibition, either in the present case or that of Lochbuy. After a very express prohibition against contracting debt, it is added: ‘nor shall they do or suffer any other thing whereby the said lands may be anyways affected or adjudged, or the heirs of tailzie deprived of the same or interrupted in the enjoyment thereof.’ And after a special prohibition against treason: ‘nor do any other fact or criminal deed or action whatever, whereby the lands may be evicted, forfeited, or escheat, or the heirs of entail in the order foresaid disappointed of their right of succession thereto.’ Yet the Court found there was here no valid prohibition against altering the order of succession, the reference to such an effect being held to have been introduced merely as a consequence of the adjudication or forfeiture primarily attaching to the only acts truly meant to be prohibited.

“ If there be any weight however in these authorities, and in all the earlier series, it does seem altogether impossible to justify the decision in the case of Lochbuy, which it has been seen was adjudicated without special argument, under the very unaccountable assumption that it was not to be distinguished on the merits from that of Roxburghe. In Lochbuy the prohibition was almost in the words of the present case; ‘to contract debts, or do any other deed whereby the lands might be adjudged or evicted from the succeeding members, or their hopes of succession thereto in any way evaded.’ Now there is here, as in all the other cases, but one class of acts prohibited, the primary characteristic of which is that they might induce adjudication and eviction of the lands to the disappointment of the succession of the succeeding substitutes, the structure of the clause being totally different from that of Roxburghe or Strathbrock, and identical in this respect with the cases first cited, though far less favourable for the prohibition than that of Brown, Henderson, or Dickson, inasmuch as the words used in these cases as to the prohibited acts being to the prejudice and defraud of the substitutes, or their being disappointed thereby of their right

The only acts struck at are those by which the succession may be defeated or frustrated through the eviction of the estate. Deeds altering the order of succession are deeds executed expressly with that intent, deeds directly defeating the destination; the deeds prohibited in the present entail are not such, they are merely those whereby the rights of the substitute heirs may be partially or wholly disappointed, according as they may or may not be subsequently acted on. They are deeds which do not in themselves alter or defeat the succession, but which may give rise to other deeds having the effect of attaching the estate, and so indirectly depriving the subsequent heirs of their hopes of succeeding, i.e. evading their succession to the extent or measure to which the said attachments may [879] operate, not necessarily defeating or frustrating entirely their right of succession. The practical result of the cases which have hitherto occurred on this point, with the exception of the case of Lochbuy, which, as is justly observed by the Lord Ordinary, though not actually reversed has been substantially overruled, is clearly that which is set forth in his Lordship's note (Campbell v. Wightman, 17th June 1746, Mor. 15505; Sinclair v. Sinclair (Carlowrie), 8th November 1749, Mor. 15382; Nisbet v. Young, November 1763, Mor. 15516; Stewart v. Hooime (Argaty), 8th July 1789, Mor. 15535; Brown v. Countess of Dalhousie (Eastfield), 25th May 1808; Henderson v. Henderson (Earlshall), 21st November 1815, Fac. Coll.; Dickson (Blairhall), 6th July 1816; Grant v. Tytler (Burdyards), 9th March 1826, Fac. Coll.; Rowe v. Monypenny (Strathbrock), 9th of succession, are far better fitted to describe a direct alteration of the order of succession than those which occur here or in Lochbuy, which are merely against acts by which their hopes of succession might be 'in some measure evaded,' an expression which is obviously much more appropriate to some partial and indirect injury, by contraction of debts or other burdens of that kind, than to a total and direct frustration of their rights by a deed of alteration. The Lord Ordinary cannot persuade himself therefore that this case of Lochbuy is now of binding authority, and being the only precedent to which the defenders can refer in support of this part of their argument, he has not hesitated to reject that argument.

"2. The defect in the irritant clause is conceived to be still plainer, or, at least, the difficulty is not increased by an apparent conflict of authority. If the rule laid down in the case of Dick (14th January 1812), that where a word of flexible signification is used in a fixed and limited sense in one part of a deed of entail, it shall be held to have that and no more extensive sense when it occurs in any subsequent and relative part of the same deed, was a sound and correct rule; and if it be still the law of Scotland, as was found in the late case of Speid, (21st February 1837) that clauses importing fetters are to receive the narrowest and most rigorous construction, (and the Lord Ordinary fully adopts both maxims) it does not appear doubtful that the irritant clause in this case is not properly applied to the prohibition against sale. The leading prohibition is expressly against selling or disposing; and then this is followed up by a continuous prohibition (as already noticed) against contracting debt or doing any deed by which the lands might be adjudged or the succession of the substitutes evaded. The irritant clause follows immediately after, and in reference and connection with these prohibitions, declares merely, that if any of the heirs 'do in the contrary, all such debts and deeds shall be null and void;' and the question is whether this must not be limited to the debts and deeds specifically mentioned in the close of the prohibitory clause? or may be extended by a large construction of the word 'deeds' to the preceding prohibition against sales and dispositions also? If the matters were otherwise doubtful, the Lord Ordinary would hold himself bound by the case of Barclay and Adam, decided in this Court 8th February 1821, and affirmed on appeal 18th May of the same year. It is only reported in Shaw's Appeal Cases, (vol. i. p. 25) but appears to have been almost identical with the present. There was a distinct prohibition there against sale, and also against contracting debt, altering the order of succession, or doing any deed whereby the lands might be evicted, etc. But the irritant clause provided only that 'all such debts, deeds, and contractions should be null,' and it was held clear that this did not apply to a sale. Debts and contractions being plainly synonymous, the only irritancy truly expressed in that case was merely of debts and deeds, which are the very words which occur here, and the Lord Ordinary can make no distinction."

February 1837, (see post, p. 898); Brown v. Macgregor, 2d March 1837; Little Gilmour v. Caddell, 5th July 1838; Braimer v. Bethune, 18th January 1839; all as in Fac. Coll. under respective dates).

The prohibition against selling is not effectually fenced by the irritant and resolute clauses. These clauses are framed on the principle of enumeration of the acts prohibited. They enumerate the debts and deeds specially mentioned in the prohibitory clause, but they do not enumerate sales or alienations. Hence the prohibition against sales and alienations is not properly fenced. But, on whatever principle these clauses are framed, they are susceptible of a construction either exclusive or inclusive of sales and alienations. They must therefore be construed as exclusive of sales and alienations, which is the construction in favour of freedom from fetters (Dick v. Drysdale, 14th January 1812, Fac. Coll.; Barclay v. Adam (Blairadam) (18th May 1821, 1 Shaw's Appeal Cases, 24; Speid v. Speid (Ardovie), 21st February 1837, 15 Shaw and Dunlop, 618; Rennie v. Horne, 13th March 1838, 3 Shaw and Maclean's Appeal Cases, p. 142).

Respondent.—The prohibitory clause is conceived in such terms as sufficiently to prevent alteration of the [880] order of succession. It is important to observe that the words used are in substance the same as those in the statute 1685, c. 22. The estate may be affected so as to alter the succession in other ways besides selling and contracting debts; and yet these other modes are not required by the statute to be expressly described in order to be effectually prevented. It is sufficient that the deed have the effect of frustrating or altering the succession. This is clearly all that was meant or intended by the framers of the statute.

But then it may be said the statute did not profess to deal with entails in questions inter hæredes,—alteration of the succession operates only inter hæredes,—therefore some expression should have been used to indicate the entailor's intention to prohibit an alteration of the succession, as distinguished from acts creating a defeazance of the entail, in consequence of rights acquired by third parties. If that be so, then it is important to observe that the words used in this entail are not precisely similar to those in the statute. The framer of the deed would clearly have adopted them, had it not been the intention of the entailor to provide against an alteration of the succession otherways than by the intervention of third parties. A donee in tail may alter the order of succession, and yet not do a deed whereby the succession under the entail is frustrated and interrupted, i.e. actually put an end to; but he cannot alter the order of succession without, in some measure, evading the hopes of succession of the heirs of entail. But again, in this view of the statute, the whole doctrine of strictness of interpretation is inapplicable. It is to those clauses which prevent heirs of entail from dealing with third parties in reference to the estate,—to those clauses [881] which deprive heirs of entail of the ordinary rights of ownership, that this doctrine is alone applicable; these, and these only, require the statutory formality of being fenced with irritant and resolute clauses, which clauses create what are called the fetters of an entail. Other provisions are mere conditions of descent, affecting only the heirs who take under and are bound by them, but not their creditors or those who may deal with them, and hence they ought to receive effect inter hæredes, according to the intention of the entailor (Erskine, b. 3, t. 8, s. 23). Even if the words used may be made as well to comprehend acts which require to be restrained by fetters as an ordinary condition of descent, it is not the less clear that the testator has expressed his intention to impose a simple condition of descent. That expressed intention cannot be legally counteracted, although the words may be susceptible of another meaning, unless it can clearly be shewn that the testator limited his intention to that other meaning. Limitations inter hæredes, as distinguished from statutory fetters, must be construed ut res majus valeat quam pereat. It would be utterly inconsistent with this rule to say, that the expressed intention of an entailor to create a limitation not subject to strict interpretation is to be disregarded, merely because one consequence of the breach of a statutory fetter would be to defeat that limitation.

The present case is identical with that of Lochbuy (MacLaine v. MacLaine, 23d June 1807, Fac. Coll.) decided upwards of thirty years ago, and acknowledged as authority since its date. They both fall under that class of cases of which the case of Roxburghe (Kerr v. Innes, 23d June 1807, Fac. Coll.; affirmed, 8th June 1811, Lords Journals, vol. 48, p. 376) is the [882] leading one. In the cases of Roxburghe and Lochbuy, as in the present case, the parties are prohibited from doing some other act in prejudice of the succession, besides the acts previously prohibited, whereas in the other class of cases, viz. those of Argaty and others, (referred to in the appellant's argument,) there is no separate announcement of any other act, but the prejudice to the succession is stated exclusively as the result of the acts previously prohibited. If the cases are examined with a view to this observation, the distinction will be at once apparent.

The deed of entail contains an irritant clause, applicable as well to sales as to debts, etc. The statute has fixed the meaning of the word "deeds" to comprehend every one of the acts which it requires irritant clauses to prevent. The mere mention of the word "debts" will not alter the meaning so fixed. If the words used had been, "all debts and such like deeds, or deeds of a similar character," then it might have been plausibly contended, that the entailer had himself created a limitation upon the word "deeds"; but the words used are "such debts and deeds," that is, such debts and such deeds as have been previously prohibited, thereby including every deed to prevent which the irritant clause was necessary. It may be conceded that a court is entitled to give an interpretation in favour of freedom, where the expressions used will admit of that interpretation as well as of an interpretation against freedom; but here an interpretation in favour of freedom can only be given by forcing the construction, or rather by transposing the sentence, that is to say, by transferring the word "such" from its actual position in the sentence to a different position, by placing it, not as it was placed [883] by the entailer in connexion with the word "debts," but by removing it from that place, and placing it in connexion with the subsequent word "deeds."

In the case of Blairadam (ante, 879,) an enumeration was clearly intended, and therefore it was justly held that there had been an omission, but here there was clearly no such intention; neither has the testator in this case, as in the case of Dick, (ante, 879,) fixed a specific meaning upon the word "deeds" in the prohibitory clause, so as to render it necessary that it should be received in the same meaning in the irritant clause.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case of Lang v. Lang the prayer of the summons was, that it might be declared "that the pursuer has full and undoubted right and power to make up and complete, in his person, valid titles to the said lands and others, in fee simple or otherwise, and to alter the order of succession." The question arose on a settlement, which contained the provisions I will state to your Lordships, after settling the estate on a certain succession of parties. Though there is a question raised as to how far the party is within the description, in the view I take of the case, I do not feel it necessary to call your Lordships' attention to that question, because it formed no part of the decision below.* There are other grounds on which I think the case can be safely disposed of. The prohibitory clause is in these words: "Providing also, as I hereby expressly provide and declare, that it shall at [884] no rate be allowable to the said Gabriel Lang my son, nor any of the substitutes above named, called to the succession of the lands and others before conveyed, to sell off or dispoise upon any part of the lands and subjects before transmitted, nor to contract debt, or do any other deed whereby the said lands and subjects may be adjudged or evicted from the succeeding members of entail, or their hopes of succession thereto in any measure evaded; and if they do in the contrary, it is declared, in the first place, that all such debts and deeds shall be intrinsically void and null, and of no force, strength, or effect," etc.

My Lords, in the course of the discussion of this case, as to how far these clauses raised an effectual prohibition against altering the course of succession, the terms of the statute were very much referred to. It does not appear to me that any great assistance can be derived from reference to the terms of the statute, for that merely describes the general rule,—(it does not affect to describe the form in which the thing is to be done,)—that in settlements to be made in pursuance of that statute there shall be clauses irritant and resolute, which shall have the effect, among other things, of preventing any acts being done whereby the succession shall be altered, leaving the question entirely open, as to how that shall be carried out. Consequently the question, as to what clauses shall have the effect to prevent any thing being done which may alter the purposes of the settlement, is to be arrived at from a consideration of the decisions, rather than from the terms of the statute. The question really is, how far this case falls within the acknowledged rule, which, in fact, does not [885] appear to be disputed, viz. that there must be a distinct prohibition as to the particular matter which is brought under consideration, and that the prohibition of any particular act is not to be inferred from expressions supposed to include it, or as the consequences of some other prohibition.

This being the rule, it appears to me to be quite clear that the cases of Roxburghe and Lochbuy are distinguishable. In the case of Sinclair v. Sinclair, (ante, p. 879,) which was so early as 1749 (8th Nov.), a prohibition against altering the order of succession, granting wadsets, or the doing any other fact or deed that might anywise affect, burden, or evict the lands, or whereby the right and benefit of succession by virtue of the tailzie might be prejudged any manner of way, or whereby the lands might be evicted, adjudged, apprized, etc., was held not to include a prohibition against selling, although the consequences of selling would clearly fall within the mischief intended to be guarded against, and although there were expressions which, separated from the other parts of the sentence, would have described it. The cases of Campbell v. Wightman, in 1746 (17th June) (ante, p. 879,) and Nisbet v. Young, in 1763 (Nov.) (ante, p. 879,) proceeded upon the same principle. In the Argaty case (Stewart v. Hooime, in 1789 (8th July), ante, p. 879,) the expressions were less comprehensive than in some of the subsequent cases. I therefore pass over that case, and shall afterwards observe upon the cases of Lochbuy and Roxburghe.

[886] I now proceed to the Eastfield case (Brown v. Countess of Dalhousie, 25th May 1808), in 1808, (ante, p. 879,) in which the prohibition was against contracting debt, or doing any deed whereby the said lands might be apprized, adjudged, or in any manner of way evicted, in prejudice of the tailzie, "or of those who by virtue thereof shall be then to succeed." This was held not to include a prohibition against altering the order of succession. The Earlsall case (Henderson v. Henderson, 21st November 1815), in 1815, (ante, p. 879,) is stronger. The prohibition was against selling, or contracting debts, or doing or committing any fact or deed, civil or criminal, whereby the said lands and estate or any part thereof might be in anywise adjudged, evicted, or forfeited anyways from them, or might be affected in prejudice and defraud of the subsequent heirs of tailzie and provision successively, conform to the order and substitution above specified." Now, altering the order of succession would be most accurately described as "a fact or deed whereby the estate would be affected in prejudice of the heirs of tailzie," but the prohibition was held not to include alteration of the succession, because these terms were so involved in the prohibition against contracting debts as to express rather a consequence of any such act, than a distinct prohibition against altering the succession. In Brown v. M'Gregor in 1837 (6th March), (ante, p. 879,) the same principles were acted upon by Lord Corehouse as Lord Ordinary. The terms used in Little Gilmour v. Caddel in 1838 (5th July), (ante, p. 879,) were not similar to those [887] used in the present case; but all the Judges of the Inner House recognized the principles upon which the preceding cases had been determined; and Lord Corehouse said, "I hold it to be a point as much settled as any point in the law of entail, that an entail must contain a substantive prohibition against alienation, a substantive prohibition against contracting debt, and a substantive prohibition against altering the order of succession. There is no set form of words in which these three prohibitions require to be expressed, nor is a separate and distinct clause of any given style necessary for each several prohibition, but the three substantive prohibitions must be all there, and all of them expressed."

The last case which has occurred is consistent with all those which I have before observed upon,—Braimer v. Bethune in 1839 (18th January), (ante, p. 879). The prohibition was, that it should not be lawful to alienate and contract debt, "nor to do or commit any fact or deed, civil or criminal, whereby the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, may be anywise adjudged or evicted from them, or forfeited, or may be anyways affected in prejudice and defraud of the subsequent heirs of tailzie and provision successively, conform to the order and substitution above specified." Altering the order of succession was, no doubt, a fact or deed whereby the estate was affected to the prejudice of the heirs of tailzie; but it was held that such fact and deed was not prohibited. Here, then, is a succession of cases for above ninety years, in which the same principle has been acted upon; and how is the present case to be distinguished [888] from them? There is no substantive prohibition against altering the order of succession. There are, indeed, terms to be found in the prohibition against contracting debt, which, if used by themselves in a separate sentence, might have been sufficient to express such a prohibition; but which, when intermixed with other parts of a sentence addressed to a different purpose, are, according to all these cases, incapable of being selected and used for the purpose of expressing a new and distinct prohibition.

The present case appears to be clearly governed by the long train of decisions to which I have referred, and particularly the cases of Earlshall, and Braimer v. Bethune.

Against all these authorities one case only can be quoted (for the Roxburghe case (Kerr v. Innes, 23d June 1807; affirmed 8th June 1811) (ante, p. 881.) is clearly distinguishable,) and that it the Lochbuy case (MacLaine v. MacLaine, 23d June 1807), in 1807 (ante, p. 881). If that case had been now the subject of appeal, and no subsequent decisions had taken place impeaching it, I should not have hesitated between adhering to an intelligible rule which for nearly a century has regulated the law of property in Scotland upon this point, and a single decision contrary to all preceding decisions on the particular point, and inconsistent likewise with a rule established, not only by cases in Scotland, but by many decisions of this House, viz. that clauses imposing fetters are to be construed with strictness. But when we find that the Lochbuy case was decided in 1807, and that all the cases to which I have referred after that of Argaty have been subsequently decided, no weight can [889] be given to it as an authority; and one cannot but feel surprised that, after it had been so repeatedly overruled, it should have been made the ground of the decision in the case now under consideration. The case of Roxburghe, which is supposed to have governed that of Lochbuy, is clearly distinguishable from that case and from the present. The objection in this case is, that the expressions relied upon, as prohibiting alteration in the order of succession, are so involved in the prohibition against contracting debts, etc. that they cannot be separated,—that they express rather a consequence of one prohibited act than a distinct prohibition of another. That objection, however, has no place in the Roxburghe case, in which the prohibition against contracting debt, etc. is first completed and exhausted; and then a new sentence is added; viz. "nor zitt to do any other thing in hurt and prejudice of the aforesaid tailzie and succession in haill or in part." I do not therefore hesitate to say, that I entirely concur in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary upon this point.

Being of this opinion upon this point, it is not necessary to say much upon the other, viz. as to whether the irritant and resolutive clauses are so expressed as to apply to the prohibition against selling. The prohibition is against selling, or contracting debt, or doing any other deed, and the irritant clause is as to all such debts and deeds,—taking up the very words of the prohibition so far as regards contracting debts, but passing over the prohibition against selling. The cases of Blairadam (Barclay v. Adam, 18th May 1821), and of Rennie v. Horne (13th March 1838), (ante, p. 879,) in this House, appear to me to be conclusive.

[890] I abstain from expressing any opinion upon other points, the above being sufficient to enable your Lordships to dispose of this appeal. I therefore move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed.

Lord Brougham.—My Lords, I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend in the opinion he has expressed. I had no doubt during the whole progress of this case that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (Lord Jeffrey) gives a correct view of the case, and the law relating to it; and that the reversal of that interlocutor by the Lords of the Inner House was wrong, and ought to be reversed. My Lords, if we go to the statute, and endeavour to shape our course by any opinion to be deduced from that statute, (namely, the act of 1685,) we shall find that we are wholly at sea, that we have no compass or guide, and that we must resort, as my noble and learned friend has justly observed, to the law as expounded by the decisions, the statute itself affording no decisive rule one way or the other in the great majority of the cases which occur. This has been so frequently before remarked, that I need not illustrate the proposition by any instances, further than to say, that if the law of entail were to be taken merely from the statute, I venture to say that half a dozen persons sitting down to write a digest of Scotch law drawn from the statute alone, without opening any book of decisions, would make, every one of them, a different code of the Scotch law of entail: that I will venture to say, at all events, is the probability of the case.

My Lords, looking then to the rule of law upon this subject, as it is to be gathered from the decisions, it appears to me to be clearly in favour of the interlocutor [891] of the Lord Ordinary; nothing can be more clear than that there must be a substantive prohibition against selling, against alienating or disposing, against contracting debt, and against altering the order of succession. The question is, have we here a substantive prohibition against that act being done? There must, besides, be an irritancy of the act if attempted to be done, and there must be a resolution of the right of the contravener who has done that act. All these things are absolutely necessary to make it a valid entail, and two of those things are here wanting. There is no absolute prohibition against altering the order of succession, and in my humble judgment there is no irritancy in respect of altering the order of succession if that shall be attempted. When I say there must be a substantive prohibition, and a substantive irritancy, and a substantive resolution, I mean of course this, that each must be self-subsisting,—standing and existing by itself; it must not be merely brought in by way of inference from some other provision directed against some other act. Thus, you cannot by a side wind, and in dealing with the consequences of what you are prohibiting, prohibit at the same time burdening with debt or altering the order of succession. If, for example, you only state burdening with debt or altering the order of succession, as consequent on the act of selling or disposing or alienating, when you are principally and substantively dealing therewith, that will have no effect against those acts; it is not enough to say, “he, my heir of entail, shall not sell, whereby the estate may be incumbered or evicted, or the future succession defeated.” That is not a substantive prohibition either against burdening or altering the order of suc[892]-cession, it is a substantive prohibition against selling; and the fact of altering the order of succession is only brought in consequentially, and under the cover of the other, as connected with and arising out of it. Such is now the clear rule as to prohibitions, and so it is with respect to an irritancy. There must be an irritancy, not only of the act of sale, but an irritancy of the disposition, whereby the order of succession laid down in the destination clause is varied, and the rights of some heirs of entail defeated, or, as we should say, some remainder-men disappointed in favour of others. The irritancy must be levelled at the act of altering the order of succession; it is not sufficient that it should be levelled at it as a consequence and implication from the act of sale; it must comprehend distinctly an act which shall touch or affect the order of succession.

Now, my Lords, have we here a prohibition and an irritancy self-subsisting, and not being a consequence arising out of some other prohibition and irritancy, or have we not? That is the whole question. On looking into the entail it is perfectly clear we have not. The expression used is, “that it shall at no rate be allowable, etc., to sell off or dispoise upon any part of the lands and subjects before transmitted, nor to contract debt, or do any other deed,” (now “contract debt” rides over the whole, then what follows) “whereby the said lands and subjects may be adjudged or evicted from the succeeding members of entail, or their hopes of succession thereto in any measure evaded.”

But then it is said this sentence, no doubt, contains a prohibition to contract debt whereby the lands may be adjudged, and whereby the hopes of succession may be [893] evaded; but it contains, besides that, another substantive prohibition to do any other deed whereby the hopes of succession may be in any measure evaded, and this latter prohibition necessarily includes alteration of the succession. That I admit, is one mode of construing it; and if that were the only mode of construing it, it might be fairly contended that there is a prohibition against altering the order of succession, as well as against contracting debt.

But is there not another mode of construing it? most manifestly there is. Observe the words used:—“or contract debt, or do any other deed whereby”—that is, by which debt or by which deed eviction may take place, and an alteration of the order of succession may take place. It is not then a substantive prohibition against altering the order of succession, it is a prohibition against contracting debt whereby that order of succession may be altered, as well as whereby the lands may be evicted. Now, my Lords, I take it to be clear that if there are two constructions open, one of which makes this clause against altering the succession a substantive, and the other only an auxiliary clause,—one of which makes it a complete and separate fetter, and the other makes it not a complete and separate fetter,—you are bound by the principles of the Scotch law of entail to prefer that construction which is in favour of the freedom of the heir. The rule of the Scotch law is, that heirs of entail in succession are fiars; that is the cardinal point; that is the very corner stone of the law of entail in Scotland. The heirs of entail in succession in Scotland are every one of them perfectly free, unless in so far as they are fettered, whereas with us the tenant in [894] tail is fettered except in so far as he is made free. If I make A. tenant for life, with remainder to B. and his first and other sons, that is a strict settlement in favour of A.; A. has only a life interest in the estate, unless I enable him to do certain things by adding a power. But in the Scotch law of entail the rule is, that each heir of entail takes a fee simple, unless in so far as he is fettered, and the proof that he is fettered is thrown upon those who would fetter him, consequently if there are two modes of construction of any given clause, (one of which leaves him free and the other fetters him,) the construction to be given to that clause is in favour of leaving him free, just as much as if there were only one construction, and that construction in his favour.

Then with respect to the second point, Lord Jeffrey says he thinks it clearer than the first. The second point is this: there is an irritancy, and it is a substantive and independent and effectual irritancy. The words used are, "That all such deeds and debts shall be intrinsically void and null, and of no force, strength, or effect." If it had been "all deeds," that would have included (as well as debts) deeds, aliening, disposing, and otherwise altering the order of succession. But what deeds are covered by it? "All such deeds and debts;" that is, the deeds and debts referred to in the last antecedent clause, the clause I have been dealing with, viz. "not to contract debt or do any other deed whereby the said lands and subjects may be adjudged," which as we all know by the law of Scotland means "prejudiced." Now my Lords, that being the case, I hold those words to mean deeds in the nature of incumbrances, and that they do not apply to sale, to [895] disposition, to alienation, and alteration of the order of succession. This is an irritancy simply levelled at the last antecedent.

My noble and learned friend has already dealt with the cases on the subject, which dispenses with my going through them, except as regards the case which stands next for your Lordships' decision; and as I am obliged to leave the House on other business at present, I shall merely state in passing how I think the two cases differ, because I should recommend to your Lordships, as I know my noble and learned friend is about to do, to reverse the interlocutor in this case of Lang v. Lang, but to affirm that in Monypenny v. Campbell, a case of great importance, but quite distinguishable from the present case. I mention Monypenny v. Campbell as a case prior, in point of decision, to this of Lang v. Lang. Lang v. Lang was in 1838. The Strathbrock case is in opposition to the Lochbuy case, which case is clearly the only one in accordance with the decision of the Court in Lang v. Lang, and against the decision of the Lord Ordinary. The decision in the case of Lochbuy is in the face of all the previous decisions, particularly the case of Strathbrock. It is most decidedly against that case, and I agree with my noble and learned friend in holding it not to be law. It is a painful thing to a court to be reduced to the necessity of saying that a case is not law which has never been reversed, and which has been so far acted upon that it has been adopted as a cardinal decision in this very case of Lang v. Lang; it is the only leg upon which that decision can stand. It is a very unpleasant thing to be reduced to the necessity of saying that a case which has been adduced in the Court below to support the present [896] decision is not law; but if your Lordships say that that is law you must say that the Strathbrock case is not law, as well as a crowd of cases. It may, in some instances, be difficult with opposing decisions to find our way, but we have no such difficulty here; for the question is, whether one case is to be taken as law and a series of cases not law. I have no hesitation in saying I think the Court is wrong here, and that the Lochbuy case is not law.

I have only to add with respect to the Strathbrock case (that which stands next for judgment), that it is perfectly distinct from the present. If there had been only the words "to contract debt or do any other deed whereby the said lands and subjects may be adjudged," that would have been consequential. It would have been the Lochbuy case wrongly decided, and Lang v. Lang wrongly decided. But the words are perfectly different; they are "that they shall not contract debt for which the samen may be apprized and adjudged," and then comes a totally different clause, "or do any other fact or deed in prejudice of the said tailzie." If the words had been "to contract debt or do any other deed, whereby the said lands may be adjudged or evicted from the succeeding members of tailzie or the tailzie prejudiced," it would have been the same case as Lang v. Lang; it would have been the same case as Lochbuy; but it is totally different, the words "or do any other fact or deed" are in a postponed clause to the words "or to contract debt for which the samen may be apprized or adjudged." The prohibition of acts or deeds creating an alteration of the order of succession is distinguished and kept apart from the other, it is not dependent, ancillary, or consequential, but a distinct and substantial prohibition. It therefore is a perfectly different [897] case from Lang v. Lang, and affords no authority for it. It is a case, according to strict construction, in conformity with the Roxburghe case, the words in which are, "to contract debt or do any deeds whereby the said estate or any part thereof may be apprized, adjudged, or evicted, nor yet to do any other thing in hurt or prejudice of the aforesaid tailzie and succession, in hail or in part." The Roxburghe case sanctions and governs the Strathbrock case, and is the rule for deciding it. But, for the same reason, these cases do not interfere with Lang v. Lang, although they were decided, the one thirty years, and the other one year before Lang v. Lang. It follows, therefore, that the interlocutor in Lang v. Lang may be reversed, and that in the Strathbrock case consistently affirmed, the one being contrary to the current of all decisions, with the exception of the Lochbuy case, which we hold not to be law, and the other being according to the current of all the decisions, but particularly the decision in the Roxburghe case.

For these reasons, my Lords, I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend in the motion he has made to reverse the judgment of the Court below in the present case, as I shall equally concur in his intended motion to affirm the judgment in the case of Monypenny v. Campbell.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said interlocutor complained of in the said appeal be and the same is hereby reversed.

[898] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

ALEXANDER MONYPENNY, W. S., Trustee under the Settlements of the late David Steuart Erskine, Earl of Buchan, Appellant.—Pemberton—Cowan; WILLIAM CAMPBELL, of No. 9, Great St. Helens, London, Son of John Campbell, deceased, and his Administrator, and DONALD HORNE and JAMES ROSE, W. S., Mandatories of said William Campbell, Respondents.
—Lord Advocate (Rutherford)—Knight Bruce—MacDowall [16th August 1839].

Entail (Prohibitory Clause)—The following words, in the prohibitory clause of a deed of entail, were inserted immediately subsequent to prohibitions against selling and contracting debt, etc., viz. "or to do any other fact or deed in prejudice of the said tailzie, and of the persons above named, and their fore-saids." Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session,) that they were sufficient to prevent an alteration of the succession.

Question—Whether it is necessary to fence with irritant and resolute clauses a prohibitory clause against altering the order of succession? (See p. 909.)

The late Earl of Buchan was infeft in the estate of Strathbrock under a deed of entail, dated 4th November 1664. The deed of entail contains, inter alia, [899] the following clauses:—"It shall noways be leisome nor lawful to any of the heirs of taillie and provision above specified to sell, dispoone, and wadsett the lands, baronie, and others above written, or any part thereof, or any annual rents or yearly duties to be uplifted furth of the samen, or to set tacks thereof for longer space than their own lifetime, or to contract debt for which the samen may be apprised or adjudged, or to do any other fact or deed in prejudice of the said taillie, and of the persons above named, and their foresaids; and if any heir of taillie and provision above specified shall in any time coming failzie herein, or do any thing contrair to this my destination and appointment, then and in that case the person or persons sua failzieing and doing in the contrair hereof, and the heirs of their bodies, shall amit and lose their right and haill benefit to this present bond of provision and infeftment following hereon, and of the haill lands, baronie, and others above written, and the samen shall in all time thereafter pertain, belong, and accress to the next person for the time who, by and in virtue of the said tailzie and provision, would have succeeded to the said lands and estate, failing the said persons, contraveners, and the heirs of their bodies, and all dispositions and deeds whatsoever made or done contrair to the said provision and destination, with all that shall follow thereon, shall be ipso facto void and null, without any declarator, and shall noways affect nor burden the said lands, baronie, and others above written, or any part thereof, as if the same had never been done, with and upon the whilk reservations, reversions, provisions, and conditions respectively above men-[900]-tioned, I have made and granted thir presents and no otherways."

On 12th June 1822 the late Earl of Buchan executed a trust conveyance, inter alia, of said estate, in favour of the appellant, with a view to exclude his Lordship's nephew, the present Earl, from the rights accruing to him as next heir of entail. The respondents, creditors of the present Earl, having regularly adjudged his Lordship's power and faculty, brought an action, founded on their adjudication, of reduction, inter alia, of said trust deed, as being ultra vires of the granter, in which they called the present Earl and the appellant as defenders. The present Earl of Buchan did not appear as a defender in the Court of Session. The record being closed upon summons and defences, the Lord Ordinary, on 11th July 1837, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the record, and heard counsel thereon, Imo, In respect of the decision of the Court on 9th February 1837, in an action at the instance of Mrs. Susan Rowe against the same defender,* and in reference to the original tailzie of the estates now libelled on, finds that the said tailzie contains an effectual prohibition against frustrating the order of succession which the late Earl of Buchan could not gratuitously contravene. 2do, Finds that the disposition executed by the late David Earl of Buchan, on 20th January 1819,† and [901] also the trust disposition executed by the said Earl in favour of the defender, Mr. Alexander Monypenny and others, dated 12th June 1822, are contrary both to the prohibitory and irritant clauses of the original tailzie of Strathbrock, libelled on, and that the charters and sasines following on these deeds, or either of them, cannot have more force or effect than their warrants. Therefore reduces, decerns and declares in terms of the libel: Finds the defender qua trustee liable in expenses, and remits the account thereof, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and report. Six words delete before signing."

The appellant reclaimed to the First Division of the Court, when the following judgment was pronounced (22d Dec. 1837):—"The Lords having considered this note, and heard counsel, adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, so far as relates to the lands and barony of Strathbrock, and with this qualification, refuse

* The Court had previously pronounced judgment to the same effect in an action at the instance of this party, which was withdrawn from a supposed defect in her title. (See 15 D., B., and M., 500.)

† The disposition here referred to was a disposition and procuratory of resignation, on which titles were made up by the late Earl in fee simple before he executed the trust deed; these titles were also brought under reduction.

the prayer of the note. Of new, find expenses due, and remit to the auditor to tax the account thereof, and to report."

Appellant.—There is no valid and effectual prohibition against altering the order of succession. The cases of Earlsall, Blairhall, Craigievar, Argaty, Eastfield, and Burdsyards completely establish this proposition (see ante, p. 879). The case of Lochbui (see ante, p. 881) cannot be reconciled with these decisions, of which the cases of Eastfield, Earlsall, Blairhall, and Burdsyards were subsequently decided.

The case of Roxburghe (see ante, p. 881) differs essentially from the present. In that case it will be remarked, there is a [902] complete separation and disjunction of the concluding part of the prohibitory clause from all that precedes it, by the words "nor zitt" marking in a definite manner the introduction of some new and different thing from what had gone before. There is a special thing prohibited in addition to what is previously prohibited, and that too in a separate clause disjoined from what goes before by the words "nor zitt," namely, the doing any thing in hurt or prejudice of the foresaid taillie and succession, in haill or in part. The thing which is substantively prohibited from being done, is, the hurting or prejudicing the foresaid taillie or succession; this, it was held, was as strong as if the clause had prohibited any thing by which the succession might be frustrated or interrupted. The clause, construing it strictly, and referring to the statute as a guide for what is requisite, is a clause, 1st. Against selling; 2d. Against contracting debt; 3d. Against doing any deed whereby the estate may be appraised, adjudged, or evicted; and 4th. Against hurting and prejudicing the order of succession. The last part is not left indefinite, so that if it stood by itself it might be said to refer to selling or contracting debt, or any other act by which the taillie might be prejudiced; it is not expressed in general words; it is so expressed, as, when perused, to impress on the mind that a different class of things is prohibited from what had previously been made the subject of prohibition. It is directed against deeds done to the hurt and prejudice of the succession, deeds frustrating or interrupting the succession, just as the preceding portion of the clause is directed against selling, contracting debt, etc. It is a prohibition against altering the order of succession, not indeed in these words, (which is not necessary, there [903] being no voce signatae required to be used,) but in words which express in clear and appropriate terms that particular mode of disappointing or depriving the heirs substitute of their right to the entailed estate. Applying these observations to the prohibitory clause in the Strathbrock entail, it will be seen at once it contains no effectual prohibition against altering the order of succession. The concluding part of the clause is not separated from the prior parts of it by any properly disjunctive words, as in the case of Roxburghe. It commences with "or," an appropriate introduction to what is merely to render what preceded more comprehensive, by reaching every indirect or possible form in which the taillie, or the persons above named and their foresaids, might be prejudiced by a contravention of the preceding prohibitions; and, accordingly, there is not a single word used which does not admit of, and naturally suggest, that construction. There is no word used that suggests to the mind some other specific class of acts by which the taillie and the heirs called might be prejudiced; on the contrary, in the concluding part of the clause there are only general words,—there is no particular act or class of acts set forth as prohibited,—there is nothing more than what forms an appropriate sequence, introduced for the purpose of more effectually securing the taillie, and the persons before named, against the classes of prohibited acts previously enumerated.

But, again, it is an undoubted rule, in construing the fetters of an entail, that if the words used be susceptible of two interpretations, that is to be adopted which is against the fetters. Now, there is this further essential difference between the Roxburghe case and the present. In the Roxburghe case the words are [904] "apprized, adjudged, or evicted." The word "evicted" is omitted in the present case. There are other ways by which an estate may be affected indirectly besides appraising or adjudication: e.g., an estate may be evicted for feudal delinquencies, and accordingly the statute expressly declares it necessary to provide against such eviction, and uses the very word which is used in the Roxburghe case. Coupling this consideration with the further consideration that the words in the latter clause in the present case are not, as in the Roxburghe case, "in prejudice of the succession," but simply "in prejudice of the taillie," it is clear that the words used in the present case may apply at least as aptly to acts of eviction as to acts of alteration of the succession. In this question, then, which is one of freedom, it necessarily follows, according to the rule above stated, that the words must be so applied as to give such freedom. In reality the appellant does not require the aid of this rule in favour of freedom, because it seems to follow as matter of course, that if the conveyancer had been instructed to prevent alteration of the succession, as well as the indirect methods of affecting or prejudicing the taillie, he would have added the expression used in the Roxburghe case, which clearly must have become a noted precedent in conveyancing at the time this entail was framed.

In the second place, the irritant clause in the entail of Strathbrock is defective; the whole entail is thereby rendered inoperative; and so it was competent to the truster to settle the estate in any way he thought proper. It will be observed, that by the irritant clause it is provided, "that all dispositions and deeds whatsoever made or done contrair to the said provision and [905] destination, with all that shall follow thereon, shall be ipso facto void and null." The appellant apprehends that this clause is clearly defective from uncertainty. Suppose the words, "and destination," had been omitted, there would no doubt be a voidance declared of all dispositions and deeds made or done contrary to the said provision, but then the question at once arises, what provision? The irritant clause refers to the prohibitory clause. Its object is to irritate the deeds done in contravention thereof, but the prohibitory clause contains various provisions. It contains a provision against selling, disposing, and wadsetting,—a provision against letting leases exceeding a certain limited duration,—a provision against contracting debt; and, according to the argument of the respondents (which the appellant here assumes to be well founded, for otherwise he has no interest to inquire into the validity of the irritant clause), a provision against altering the order of succession. Now, to which of these does the word "provision" apply? It is evidently impossible to answer; but then it may be said, that the term "provision" applies to the whole of the prohibitory clause, to every thing therein provided, and that consequently there is a complete irritancy declared of all dispositions and deeds in contravention of any of the prior prohibitions. This plea the appellant humbly conceives not to be tenable; but it seems unnecessary to go into any argument, either in refutation of it, or in support of the appellant's objection to the clause in respect of uncertainty, because the same question occurred very lately in the case of Speid (21st Feb. 1837, 15 D., B., and M., 618), where the [906] whole law upon the point was fully considered in reference to an irritant clause conceived in terms so nearly resembling the present, so far as regards that point, that it is clear the judgment in it must be taken as a direct precedent in the present case. It has, however, been said that all dispositions are here declared to be null and void; that the deeds under reduction are dispositions, and that, all such deeds at least, are effectually irritated. But in this remark it seems to be overlooked that the dispositions which are declared to be null and void are dispositions "contrair to the said provision." This being the case, the question cannot in the slightest degree turn upon the word "disposition," but must evidently rest entirely upon the legal import of the word "provision;" and if that word is not definite and precise in its application,—if it cannot be held to apply to all the prohibited acts of selling, contracting debt, and altering the order of succession, nor to any of them in particular, it is obvious, the word "dispositions" is of no more definite signification, and that the same uncertainty exists as to it, that is, whether it points at dispositions of sale, dispositions in security, or dispositions directly altering the order of succession.

But again, if the word "destination," which is also used, has any definite meaning, and could apply directly to any one prohibition, it could only be to a prohibition against altering the order of succession, supposing the entail to have contained such a prohibition. As regards other prohibitions it is liable to the same objection of ambiguity and uncertainty as the word "provision." Therefore, it follows, that at all events the irritant clause is ineffectual, in so far as respects selling or contracting debt. If, however, the irritant clause be either wholly [907] defective, or would apply only to the prohibition against altering the order of succession, then, upon the authority of the cases of Hoddum (3d July 1832, reversed 18th April 1835; 1 Sh. and M'Lean's Appeal Cases, p. 594; Lords' Journals, vol. 67, p. 114) and Speid, the deeds under reduction are unchallengeable, because the necessary result of these cases is, that an entail defective in one particular is ineffectual in all other respects.

Respondents.—The present case is identical with that of Roxburghe; the entail in each of them is conceived in terms which announce a distinct and explicit prohibition to alter the succession, and this being so, it is utterly unimportant that the disjunctive used in the one case is “nor yet” and that in the other “or.” The omission of the word “evicted” might afford an argument, if the act under consideration had fallen under the denomination of acts alluded to on the other side. Whatever may be its effect as to such an act, when the point comes to be considered it is obvious that the Roxburghe case has clearly fixed the application of the subsequent prohibition to an alteration of the succession which may be effected without eviction.

It is altogether contrary to the law, as hitherto known in Scotland, to say, that an entail defective in one particular is altogether defective (Cathcart, 5 Wilson and Shaw, 315). The irritant clause in the present case is sufficiently applicable to alterations of the succession, if irritant clauses were necessary for this purpose. In order, however, to prevent alterations of the succession, as distinguished from the statutory acts which may indirectly have that effect, irritant [908] clauses are not required. A prohibitory clause alone is necessary to authorize reduction of gratuitous or mortis causa deeds, such as are here in question (Erskine, b. iii. tit. viii. sec. 23).

The judgment in the case of Hoddum (see ante, p. 907) as regards this point was drawn up per incuriam, and is not authorized by the opinion delivered in this House when that cause was heard.*

Lord Chancellor.—What I have already said in the case of Lang v. Lang, nearly exhausts the first part of this case, namely, as to the effect of the prohibition against altering the order of succession.

There was but one different ground on which it was attempted to distinguish this case from the Roxburghe case, and that was, that the prohibition in the Roxburghe case, besides contracting debt, included the case of forfeiture for feudal delinquencies, which it was said was not so in the present case. Now, supposing the word “evict,” which is used in the Roxburghe case, to apply to acts creating forfeiture, it does not follow that there are not words sufficient in the clause in the present case to entitle us to give the same construction in both; I cannot entertain a doubt as to the expressions [909] in the two cases being so substantially the same as to require the same decision.

Assuming then that there is an effectual prohibition against altering the succession, an objection was taken that there are not proper irritant and resolute clauses applicable to such prohibition, to which it was answered that in cases of simple destination such clauses are not required; be that as it may, I think it clear that in this case there are such clauses sufficiently applicable to the purpose. The term “deed” is only to be found in the prohibition against altering the succession; the resolute clause applies to any thing done “contrair to this my destination and appointment,” and that which is avoided or declared null is “all dispositions and deeds whatsoever made or done contrair to the said provision and destination.” If, therefore, clauses irritant and resolute against altering the order of succession are necessary, they are, I think, to be found in this entail. The question is not here, as in the case of Lang, whether there are clauses properly fencing the other prohibited acts. I think, therefore, that, upon the points raised, the interlocutors appealed from are correct, and that these interlocutors should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be

* The Lord Chancellor here intimated that he considered the error in drawing up the judgment to have arisen from the report of the speech, i.e. that in the following sentence (1 Sh. and M'L., p. 626) viz. “to reverse the decree in this case, and declaring the entail insufficient to prevent the heirs of entail from selling, disposing, burdening, etc. in terms of the conclusions of the summons,” the term, “etc.,” introduced into the speech, has led to the insertion of the declaration in the judgment, extending over all the conclusions of the summons.

Lord Brougham subsequently stated that it was by no means his intention the House should, in the Hoddum case, decide more than that there was no irritant clause in the entail, valeat quantum.

and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutors therein complained of be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellant do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the clerk assistant: And it is further ordered, That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party [910] entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

[911]      APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

THOMAS DUNCAN, Writer in Perth, Treasurer to, and on behalf of, the Trustees for the Turnpike Road from Perth to Dundee, through the Carse of Gowrie by Inchture, Appellant*—Attorney-General (Campbell)—Lord Advocate (Rutherford); JAMES FINDLATER, Coal Merchant and Innkeeper in Perth, Respondent.—Pemberton—James Anderson [23d August 1839].

[Mews' Dig. x. 100; xv. 139; S.C. 6 Cl. and F. 895. Discussed in Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs, 1886, L.R. 1 H.L. 116, and Harris v. Great Western Ry. Co., 1876, Q.B.D. 528; and see Scotch authorities cited 3 Scots R.R. at p. 333.]

Reparation—Road Trustees—Public Officer.—Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session) that road trustees on a public road are not liable for any injury which may happen to passengers in consequence of the negligence or improper conduct of labourers or surveyors or other persons employed by the trustees, or by the officers of the trustees, when engaged in any operation performed under the authority of the trustees.

Practice—Issue.—Under an issue, Whether a particular act has been done to the "loss, injury, and damage" of a party, it is left open to try the question of the damage, and the liability of the party causing the damage to make compensation.—Per Lord Chancellor, confirming the opinion of Lord Eldon, Chancellor. (See p. 926.)

Practice—Pleading—Preliminary Defence.—In an action directed against the clerk and treasurer of road trustees, acting under the statutes, for injury sustained by alleged negligence on the part of persons employed by them, [912] the summons concluded against the said trustees and their said clerk for payment of a sum as compensation. It was pleaded for the trustees, that the "injury, such as it was, not having arisen from misconduct on the part of the trustees, or of any person for whom they are in law responsible, or from any cause for which they are legally responsible, the defender is entitled to absolvitor." When the record was closed, an issue was sent to a jury, to try whether the act complained of had been done to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer. The House of Lords reversed the interlocutor directing the issue, the Lord Chancellor observing, that, "as the ground of defence appears upon the summons itself, and in the defences as originally made, the cause was, before the interlocutor directing the issue, in a state which would have enabled the Court to dispose of it." (See p. 936.)

The turnpike roads within the county of Perth during the year 1835 were under the management of trustees, whose powers and duties are regulated by the general road act for Scotland, 1 and 2 W. 4, c. 43, and also by a local act, 2 W. 4, c. 82.

The general road act provides (sec. 10), that "it shall be lawful for the trustees acting under any turnpike act to appoint clerks, collectors, treasurers, superintendents, surveyors, and other officers, with reasonable salaries or allowances for their trouble:" (sec. 16) that "the trustees may sue and be sued in name of their clerk or treasurer; provided always, that all expenses of process or proceedings so incurred by such clerk or treasurer shall be reimbursed and paid out of the trust funds of the turnpike road for which he shall act: " (sec. 101) that " if the surveyor of any turnpike road, or any contractor or other person employed on such road, shall lay on any part of any such road any heap of stones or other materials for the repair [913] thereof, and shall permit the same to remain longer than necessary for the breaking and spreading of such materials, or shall lay on any such road any matter or thing, or shall knowingly permit to remain on any part of any such road any matter or thing which may endanger the safety of any passenger, or shall dig any pit, or make any cut on any turnpike road without sufficiently fencing the same, such person shall for every such offence forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding £5, over and above the damages occasioned thereby, and expenses; and it shall be lawful for any person travelling along any turnpike road to prosecute for such sum, damages, and expenses in manner herein-after provided." By sec. 109, the trustees or the procurator fiscal, or any person authorized by the trustees, are empowered to prosecute for payment of toll duties, penalties, or fines due under the statutes; the enactment declaring, " that it shall be lawful for the said trustees to allow the expenses of such prosecutions to be defrayed out of the funds of the trust." Sec. 117 provides, that " if the repairing or maintaining of any turnpike road shall be neglected, or such road so badly kept that travellers are injured, impeded, or obstructed in using the same, any person having paid toll duty thereon, and finding caution to pay expenses of process, may present a petition and complaint against the trustees of such road to the Court of Session, and the said court is hereby authorized to receive the same, and to adjudge and determine therein in a summary manner, without abiding the course of the roll; and to pronounce such orders and decrees as to the repairing and keeping of the road, or otherwise, as the justice of the [914] case shall seem to them to require, having due regard to the funds of the trust; and particularly to determine whether the road is in such a state of repair as to justify the levying of the toll duties or any proportion thereof levied by the said trustees; and also to determine as to the expenses of such complaints and proceedings thereon; and if any such complaint shall be found to be without probable cause, the complainer shall be found liable, over and above the expenses of process, in a penalty of £20, to be paid to the trustees for the purposes of the trust; and it shall not be lawful to present any such complaint, or institute any proceedings on any of the grounds above mentioned before any other court, or in any other manner than as aforesaid." Sec. 118 provides, that " all civil causes, and prosecutions for expenses, toll duties, penalties, forfeitures, and fines imposed by this act or any local turnpike act, or for any damages incurred, or any wrongs done or injuries suffered in any matter thereto relating, or for any thing done in pursuance of any of the powers by this or any such act given and granted, shall be commenced within six calendar months after the penalty, etc. shall have been incurred, or wrong done, or injury suffered."

The statutes expressly authorize the trustees to raise certain funds in the shape of toll duties, which are specially appropriated by the statutes. The local act (sec. 16) enacts, " that at any of the stated general meetings of trustees it shall be lawful for the said trustees to direct the tolls arising at the gates or turnpikes erected or to be erected on the said roads to be applied towards making, repair-[915]-ing, upholding, and improving the aforesaid roads and bridges thereon respectively, in such manner as the said trustees shall think fit; and paying the expense of management, interest of the money borrowed, advanced, and owing at the time; and the surplus shall be appropriated annually to extinguish the principal of the money so borrowed, advanced, and owing, and to no other purpose whatsoever."

James Findlater, coal merchant in Perth, while driving a gig at night along the turnpike road between Dundee and Perth, near Inchture, came in contact with a large heap of stones placed partly on the footpath, and partly on the road. There was no light set up or watchman posted, or any other precaution taken to warn travellers as to the state of the road. The stones had been placed there by persons in the service of a contractor employed by the road trustees, for the purpose of filling up a drain which had been dug across the road. The gig was overturned, and the son of Findlater, who was along with him, received so much injury in consequence of the accident that he died soon after; Findlater was also himself considerably injured.

Findlater brought an action in the Court of Session against the road trustees, libelling that the obstruction on the road had been occasioned by the operations carried on by the road trustees "or their surveyors or contractors, or other person or persons for whom these trustees were and are responsible;" and that the trustees, "or their workmen or others employed by them as aforesaid, did knowingly and most culpably permit that aforesaid part of the north side of the road to remain in this state of danger till the follow-[916]-ing day, and did not use any means by which passengers travelling at night could be led to believe or suspect that there was any obstruction upon the said road."

The road trustees were sued through their treasurer, Thomas Duncan, and the summons concluded against "the said trustees and the said Thomas Duncan as the clerk and treasurer, or the clerk or treasurer, of the said road trustees, and as representing them," for payment of £500 as solatium for the loss of his son, and £500 as compensation for the injury sustained by himself. They pleaded, 1st, that the pursuer was not entitled to damages on account of his son's death; 2d, that the pursuer's injuries did not entitle him to damages; 3d, that, "at any rate the overturn and consequent injury, such as it was, not having arisen from misconduct on the part of the trustees, or of any person for whom they are in law responsible, or from any cause for which they are legally responsible, the defender is entitled to absolvitor."

The libel being in form an action of damages, the cause was by interlocutor (appealed against) transmitted to the issue clerks. The defender moved the Lord Ordinary to remit the cause to the Court of Session roll, to determine the legal liability of the trustees as raised by his plea in the first instance. The motion was refused on the ground, that if the plea was well founded effect would be given to it at the trial. The issue, as originally framed by the issue clerks, was alternative as against the trustees or those employed by them; the Lord Ordinary limited it to the trustees, but on application to the Court the alternative form was restored, and the following was the form of [917] the issue sent to trial:—"Whether the pursuer and his son, while travelling in a gig along the said road, near the west half-way house, were overturned through the fault or negligence of the said trustees, or others in their employment, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages claimed: for reparation, and as a solatium for the loss and deprivation suffered by the death of the pursuer's son, £500; for compensation and reparation for injury sustained and expenses incurred by the pursuer in the premises, £500."

At the trial the Lord President directed the jury, in point of law, "that road trustees on a public road are liable for any injury which may happen to passengers in consequence of the negligence or improper conduct of labourers or surveyors or other persons employed by the trustees, or by the officers of the trustees, when engaged in any operation performed under authority of the trustees." The jury found for the pursuer as follows: viz. damages for loss of his son £500, for injury received by himself £300.

The appellant excepted to the above direction.

The First Division of the Court, having advised the cause upon the bill of exceptions, after an oral debate, and cases, disallowed the bill of exceptions by the following interlocutor (19th June 1838):—"The Lords, having advised the cases for the parties, disallow this bill of exceptions, and find the defenders liable to the pursuer in the expenses incurred by him in the discussion on this bill, and appoint an account thereof to be given in, and remit to the auditor to tax the same, and to report." The First Division thereafter applied the verdict as follows (22d June 1838):—"In respect of the verdict found by the jury, on the issue in this cause, the Lords decern [918] against the defenders for payment of £500 in name of damages to the pursuer, as reparation for the deprivation suffered by the death of his son, and for payment of £300 as reparation for injury sustained by the pursuer himself: Find the defenders liable to the pursuer in the expenses incurred by him in this action. Appoint an account thereof to be lodged, and remit to the auditor to tax the same, and to report."

The road trustees appealed.

Appellant.—It has been conceded that the appellants are not personally responsible; in making this concession the only ground of action is virtually abandoned. The trust funds are created by statute; no right, claim, or remedy can be maintained against the statutory funds, unless such right, claim, or remedy can be supported from the statute. The statutes from beginning to end are perfectly silent as to any claim against the trustees, or the funds under their management, on the part of individuals who suffer accidents by the negligence of surveyors or contractors, or persons employed on the road, while, on the other hand, they expressly affirm and recognize a right of action against these surveyors and other persons when guilty of such faults or negligence as lead to injury; and a form is prescribed by which those parties may be proceeded against in a summary manner. The absence of the slightest notice of a valid claim against the trust, with this recognition of a right of action against the parties offending, affords the clearest grounds for holding that the legislature never contemplated any such proceeding as that now adopted. The [919] terms used in the statutes in providing the remedy are, in point of legal construction, exclusive of any other manner of proceeding than that therein pointed out.

The statutes are in perfect consistency with the general principles of law applicable to such questions. The general maxim is, culpa tenet suos auctores. This maxim has been extended to infer vicarious liability only in cases where public policy imperatively requires that it should be so extended.

It is contended, however, that the law of Scotland establishes the judgment appealed from, and certain cases are cited to support that proposition. These cases do not apply. The question is not, how the law of Scotland has dealt with the maxim qui facit per alios facit per se; the question is, what is law of Scotland under the existing turnpike statutes; and none of the cases referred to can have the slightest application to this question. The appellant's argument in the Court below (as it is now) was almost entirely founded upon the particular enactments in the road statutes relating to this question, and yet it will be seen that the judges when delivering their opinions do not once allude to the statutes or any of the enactments in them. But even independently of the statutes the rule of law in Scotland in reference to the maxim qui facit per alios, is clearly adverse to the claim of the respondents (Linwood v. Vans Hathorn, 11th March 1817. Fac. Coll.).

There being no authority in the law of Scotland adverse to the plea of the appellants, and this being a case as to the construction of a British act of parliament, it is conceived English cases must be of perfect authority, the more especially as the meaning and import of similar [920] expressions in statutes relating to either or both countries must necessarily have been intended by the legislature to be the same (Humphreys, Man. and Ryl. 187; Hall, 2 Bing. 156; Harris v. Baker, 4 Maul. and Sel. 28; British Plate Glass Manufacturers, 4 T. R., 794; Bolton, 4 Dowl. and Ryl. 195; Everett v. Cooch, 7 Taunt. 1).

The appellant's defences and pleas in law, the form of the issue, the direction of the judge, the exception to that direction, and the judgment itself now appealed from, completely negative the argument attempted to be raised, to the effect that the appellant is excluded from urging the question of liability. This being a cause appropriated to the jury roll, the appellant had no opportunity of raising the question of liability before going to trial.

Respondent.—By the law of Scotland a master is civilly responsible for the negligence of a servant in the exercise of his calling (Fraser and other cases in Shaw's Digest, voce Reparation, Nos. 286. 288. 290. 292, 293, 294, 296, 297, 298, 301, 302). The circumstance that he is servant to a trustee or body of trustees makes no difference. Even although the trust should be public, the rule is the same, e. g. magistrates of a burgh are liable for the escape of a prisoner (Ersk. b. iv. tit. 3. s. 14. and notes by Ivory). The law of Scotland recognizes the broad general principle, that public funds raised by taxation are responsible for wrongs done to individuals in the execution of the public purposes to which such funds are appropriated (Innes, 1 Feb. 1798, Mor. 13189). There are various cases in which this principle has been enforced against road trusts, to the effect of attaching funds under the administration of [921] road trustees (Gunn, 28th Feb. 1820, 2 Murr. 194; M'Lauchlan, 14th May 1827, 4 Murr. 216; Millar, 17th July 1828, 4 Murr. 563). The same view of the law has been taken by the Court under police statutes (Nimmo, 8th July 1832, 10 S. and D. 844; Kelly, 22d Jan. 1833, 11 S. and D. 287; Mitchell, 1 Feb. 1838, 16 D., B., and M., 409). Such being the rule of law in Scotland, it is irrelevant to inquire into the law of England, even supposing that a different principle existed in that country. But the English cases founded upon by the appellant do not bear at all upon the present question. The object in these cases was, to render the parties against whom the suit was directed personally responsible for injury sustained by individuals, being the necessary consequence of works authorized by the legislature to be performed by them. The respondent, however, has not averred that there was misconduct on the part of the trustees which renders them personally responsible. There is no question raised on that point. The case of the respondent is, that in consequence of the negligence of those employed under the trustees the funds of the trust are responsible. [Lord Chancellor.—Can property be liable for damages without some party being found liable?] The parties guilty of the negligence may be liable for the consequences; the trustees will have their action of relief against them, but according to the principle recognized in Scotland in such cases, the party suffering the damage is entitled ante omnia to be indemnified from the trust funds.

It is said that the remedies given by the general turnpike act and the relative local statute are exclusive of any proceeding against the trust funds. It is humbly conceived that this is not so; on the contrary, the true principle applicable to both statutes seems to be, that [922] the public or their trustees draw a fund from the lieges for the purpose of maintaining good and safe roads, and consequently if they or their managers fail in this respect, the trust funds, or in other words the public, must, in the first instance, be answerable for the consequences, whatever claim of relief may remain against those by whose direct act an injury may have been done. The purposes for which the toll duties may be applied are large and comprehensive, and must be taken as including the police of the roads; i.e., maintaining them in a state free from obstructions. The statute imposes a penalty upon any party employed on the road for particular acts of negligence, but that penalty is over and above the damages which a party thereby injured may obtain against the fund which is legally responsible therefor.

The objection taken in the bill of exceptions is not within the record. The pleas in law do not raise the question of liability of the trust funds; the only question raised by the issue was damage or no damage, through the misconduct of those employed by the trustees. It is a mistake to say that the appellant had no opportunity of maintaining the irresponsibility of the trust funds as a defence. If such a defence had been originally made it would, if well founded, have entitled the respondent to absolver before going to trial. Under the thirty-third section of the judicature act and relative provisions of the statute 1 Will. 4. c. 69., the appellant might have obtained the judgment of the Court upon any question of law or relevancy going to exclude the action. Such a defence, however, comes too late in a bill of exceptions (Kerr v. Inglis, 6th July 1832, 10 S. and D. 774; Batty v. Shaw, 5 W. and S. 462; Laidlaw, 11th March 1831, 9 S. and D. 571), [923] the purpose of which is to have the direction of the judge upon matters of law arising out of the record reviewed. [Lord Chancellor.—The Lord President clearly thought that the question of liability was embraced in the issue.] The issue cannot be held to embrace a question not raised by the pleas in law.

Lord Chancellor (8th July).—My Lords, this case on the merits is one of very great importance, and I should be very sorry to be called upon to advise your Lordships upon it, without taking some time to examine into the cases which have been referred to. The point upon the merits is one startling to the ears of an English lawyer, namely, that for damage sustained by the conduct of persons in the execution of a public trust, the party sustaining the injury has a remedy, not against the immediate author of the injury, or against the trustees personally, but that he has a direct remedy against the trust fund, by suing, not the trustees, but the officer of the trustees who has the custody of the trust funds. It is admitted that the effect of this judgment, if it stands, will be, not to give a remedy against the trustees, who may be supposed to be the authors of the injury, but against the trust fund; and if that is exhausted in the payment of the damages, that it must be supplied by a taxation upon the public.

There is no such principle in the law of England, and though certain cases have occurred in the Court of Session apparently producing this effect, I have not heard any principle referred to which would have originally supported that decision. If that principle had been part of the law of Scotland, your Lordships may be assured the industry and learning of the counsel would [924] have furnished your Lordships with some instances of it; they have furnished instances in which the particular thing has been done, but no principle has been referred to, which, if brought under the consideration of the court, would have given weight to the adjudication. A number of years has elapsed since the first case in 1798 (see ante, p. 920) was decided, and it does not appear that any case has come up to your Lordships House upon the subject till the present, at least none in which the point has been expressly raised and decided. Your Lordships were told there was a case pending in this House (Mitchell, 1st Feb. 1838, 16 D., B., and M., 409), raising precisely the same question, against the commissioners of police of Edinburgh. I have had inquiry made while the argument was proceeding, and if it had been a case in which the question was likely to be raised, or further information could be obtained from the discussion, I should have thought it right that that case should be argued before this case was disposed of; but I find that that case is set down to be heard ex parte, and that your Lordships are not likely to derive much information from it; and it would not be fair, that a case to be heard ex parte should influence your Lordships in deciding this case, which has been fully argued on both sides. There is one point of this case with respect to which I may now state in what view it occurs to me. It is contended that the appellant cannot raise this question in the present state of the case, because it is said that the point was not raised by the pleas in law in the courts below, consistently with the judicature act, which requires that the party should state the whole grounds of his defence. The pleas in this record are [925] certainly as large as can be well conceived. The third plea appears to be a general plea of not guilty, opening to the party sued every possible ground upon which he could make out that he was to be discharged from the obligation sought to be imposed upon him by the pursuer; it is, that the injury complained of "not having arisen from misconduct on the part of the trustees or any person for whom they are in law responsible, or from any cause for which they are legally responsible, the defender is entitled to absolver." Thus, (leaving out that part which does not immediately refer to the present subject,) the proposition is, that the injury complained of was not sustained from any cause for which the defenders were legally responsible; it is in short a plea of not guilty, alleging that there is no cause of action.

Then upon that plea an issue was directed, and another question arises upon the terms of the issue, namely, whether it did not involve a proposition of law. The question sent to trial before the jury was, "Whether the pursuer and his son, while travelling in a gig along the said road, near the west half-way house, were overturned through the fault or negligence of the said trustees or others in their employment, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?" not simply whether the injury arose from the negligence of persons in the employment of the trustees, and what damage had been sustained in consequence of such injury, but whether it has been sustained "to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer."

Now it is said that, according to the acceptation of those terms in Scotland, it makes no difference in the import of an issue, whether the inquiry be if the act [926] done be simply to the damage, or whether it be further inquired if it be to the loss, injury, and damage of the party suffering. I do not find that it has been so understood; it is not so stated by the Lord President, nor by the judges before whom the cause was brought, and it would not be so understood in this country. A very peculiar case (Blakemore v. Glamorganshire Canal Navigation, 1 My. and Ke. 154) upon this subject occurred in my own recollection. I was counsel in the case; a complaint was made by a party who had a mill supplied by water; the water was taken to supply the Glamorganshire Canal, and the proprietor of the mill complained that the canal company had exceeded the power given to them under the act, and had deprived his mill of a portion of water to which he was entitled. It came on before Lord Eldon (17th and 23d Dec. 1824), upon a motion to dissolve an injunction which had been obtained ex parte; there was no doubt upon the point, whether the works carried on by the company were authorized by the act; but Lord Eldon directed this issue (see 1 My. and Ke. p. 169), "Whether the widening and deepening of the basin in the pleadings mentioned," etc. "did, or will to the damage and injury of the plaintiff, diminish the supply of surplus water" to the plaintiff's works: "Lord Eldon stated that his object in using those words was not only to ascertain what damage had been sustained, but whether it was such damage as that for which the defendants were responsible,—whether it was damnum absque injuria, whether it was to the injury of the party, whether it was injurious, in the sense which a court of justice puts upon the word.” He left it open to try the question [927] of the damage, and the liability of the party causing the damage to make compensation; and so I must understand the meaning of the terms here. I find that the Lord President lays down, as a proposition of law, that which according to the construction put by the respondent he had nothing to do with. If the respondent’s construction of the issue be correct, the jury had nothing to do but to ascertain the fact whether the injury was sustained in consequence of the act of the trustees, and the amount of the damage; but the Lord President lays it down, “that road trustees on a public road are liable for any injury which may happen to passengers in consequence of the negligence or improper conduct of the labourers or surveyors or other persons employed by the trustees, or by the officers of the trustees when engaged in any operation performed under the authority of the trustees.” Upon that ruling the bill of exceptions was tendered, and in the argument on the bill of exceptions it was never contended that this ruling was immaterial, that it was not within the province of the judge to lay down the law, or that it was immaterial how he laid it down. It is clear that it was not so argued in the Court below from the opinions of the judges, which are printed in the cases; but whatever is the meaning of the issue, if the judge in laying down the law lays down an incorrect rule for the jury to act upon, which is likely to have an effect upon the finding of the jury, the party against whom the verdict passes will have a right to complain that a rule was laid down which might influence the verdict under which he was suffering. I therefore cannot but think that your Lordships have the question to decide whether the rule of law laid down by the Lord Presi-[928]-dent at the trial of the issue is a correct rule of law, applicable to cases arising in Scotland, and you have also necessarily to consider whether the rule applying to the liability of trustees, which seems to have been adopted in Scotland for a considerable number of years, and which is directly contrary to any rule we have here, is a rule that ought to continue to prevail in Scotland, particularly when it arises under an act which clearly directs the application of all the tolls which may be received under the act. At the same time, in reference to this latter consideration, I do not think that the statute precludes this question, because, in directing the application of monies raised, it must be understood as dealing with those monies after paying all lawful demands out of the funds, all the expenses of the officers, and so on, which must be paid out of the funds; that is, the law throws the liability upon the funds, and it does not go so far as to say that they are not to be liable to pay this. The legislature can hardly be said to have had in view such an application of the funds; if the funds are legally applicable to the purpose, the statute does not so overrule the application of them, as to say that nothing shall authorize the laying such a burden upon the funds. For the purpose of considering the general question, I propose to your Lordships that the farther consideration of this case should be postponed.

Farther consideration adjourned.

Lord Chancellor (23d Aug.).—My Lords, in this case there has arisen a conflict of opinion in this country and in Scotland, upon a point arising under acts of parliament, very much depending upon the construction of those acts, and, as to which, the earliest decision referred to [929] in Scotland is of the year 1798 (see ante, p. 920), notwithstanding which the authority of the English decisions, as applicable to the rule to be hereafter followed in Scotland, has been objected to, as an attempt to overrule Scotch law by the weight of decisions in England. Nothing can be more important than to preserve the integrity of Scotch law in cases in which that country has law distinct from that of England.

The titles to property, and the rights and interests of individuals in Scotland, are regulated by the laws of that country, and, undoubtedly, all such laws ought to be maintained. But in cases in which there is no peculiar law of Scotland applicable to the subject matter of a contract between parties, when questions arise to which no preceding principle of law can be satisfactorily applied, there is great inconvenience, and a degree of reproach to the law itself, in the adoption in the two countries of different and inconsistent rules in the administration of justice; and this can never be more strongly felt than in cases in which the questions arise from enactments by the legislature which are common to both.

In looking through the papers in this case, and upon referring to the authorities quoted, I have in vain sought for any rule or principle of Scotch law, applicable to this question, which would lead to the adoption of a course of decision peculiar to that country. So far from finding any principle in the law of Scotland for making the liability of persons for the acts of others acting under their presumed authority greater than it is in this country, I find the rule laid down in Lin-wood v. Vans Hathorn (Fac. Coll., 11th March 1817), by a majority of the judges, much more restrictive of such liability than the rule adopted in the case of Bush v. Steinman (1 Bos. and Pull., 404). Let it, however, be assumed that such liability is regulated by the same rule in both countries; when questions first arise upon those acts of parliament which create trusts of money levied for public purposes, in both countries the courts have a common principle upon which to engraft such rules as it might be advisable to adopt in administering justice upon questions arising under those acts. In England it has been held by repeated decisions that trustees of a turnpike road are not liable for damage arising from the acts of those employed in carrying into effect works under the provisions of the statutes. The cases of Baker v. Harris (4 M. and Sel., 28), in 1815; Hall v. Smith (2 Bing., 156); Humphreys v. Mears (Man. and Ry., 187), in 1827; are conclusive upon that point. In all these cases it was held that the trustees, doing only that which by the statute it was their duty to do, and being guilty of no personal default, were not answerable for damages sustained by the acts or neglect of persons employed by them in the active execution of that duty.

Another class of cases establishes another rule under those statutes; namely, that trustees exceeding the authority which the statute gives them are personally liable for the consequences of the act done, but that keeping within that authority they are not liable for any damage which these acts may occasion to any other person; the person injured, if he cannot find a remedy in the [931] provision of the statute, is without redress. That was the decision in the British Plate Manufacturers v. Meredith (4 T. R. 794), and Bolton v. Crouther (4 Dow. and Ry., 195).

In the former class of cases the actions were in some, if not in all the instances, against the clerk or person provided by the statute for the purpose of being sued on behalf of the trustees; so that if the plaintiff had obtained judgment the remedy would have been against the trustees as such, and not against them individually. The opinion of the court in all those cases having been in favour of the defendant, it was not necessary to consider the effect of the judgment as against the trust fund; but the opinions of the judges, as reported, shew that they considered the course of proceeding adopted by the plaintiff to apply to the defendants in their official capacity, and not to infer personal liability. Lord Wynford, in Hall v. Smith, says, "We think that under these circumstances the commissioners are not responsible for the accident that has happened, and that the actions cannot be maintained against their clerk."

The first case referred to as having arisen in Scotland is Innes v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh, 6th February 1798 (Mor. 13189). In that case the injury, which the pursuer had sustained, arose from a defect in the streets created in the progress of works for rebuilding the university, under the direction of trustees, and he sued such trustees, and also the magistrates. The court held the trustees not liable; the liability of the magistrates was indeed estab-[932]-lished, but upon grounds which have no application to the present case, as it rested upon the supposed duties of the magistrates of Scotch burghs. At that time then, the rule, now considered as part of the law of Scotland, had not been established.

The next case appears to be that of the Airdrie Road Trustees, in 1820 (2 Mur., 194. 215), in which the jury found not that the trustees were liable for the original act of a stranger, (Waddell,) but that they did improperly allow or permit the stones to remain on the road for two or three weeks. This verdict was sanctioned by the court, but a new trial was directed as to the liability of Waddell, the wrong-doer; and as nothing further appears as to that case it is probable that it was afterwards settled. Now, whether this finding against the trustees was right or wrong, it does not much apply to this case; it found a culpable neglect or omission of duty in not removing the stones, which is very different from finding a liability from the unauthorized act of any person employed in the works.

The case of M'Lauchlan v. The Wigtonshire Road Trustees, in 1827 (4 Mur. 216), was what we should call in this country a nisi prius case; it was also a case like the last, of imputed negligence, in not effectually stopping up an abandoned road; and the claim was against the trustees personally; the Chief Commissioner saying, "The trustees are individually liable, and have no funds to pay the damages if found due." In Millar v. The Road Trustees (17th July 1828, 4 Mur. 563), that point was not taken. The case of Aitkin v. Peeblesshire Road Trustees, in 1836, (mentioned [933] in the respondent's case,) was compromised. The two last cases are instances in which the liability of trustees was assumed, but neither of them has the weight of decision, except in so far as in the former the opinion of the Chief Commissioner was expressed to that effect.

Several cases have been referred to of suits instituted against the Commissioners of Police of Edinburgh, and particularly one at the suit of Mitchell. I abstain from making any observations on those cases because much may depend upon the act of parliament under which those commissioners act; and because the latter case is now under appeal before this House; and it would, therefore, be improper to prejudge the merits of that case.

Such is the state of decisions in England and in Scotland upon this subject. The learned judges of the First Division state that the law has been fully established in Scotland; and upon that authority, and from what appears from the reported cases, there cannot be any doubt that there has been for some time past a course recognized in Scotland in conformity with the decision in this case; but when the cases which have occurred there are examined, it does not appear that there has been any solemn decision of the Court of Session establishing the law before this case. If the decisions had been of much earlier date, and of much more weight, from repeated recognitions by the Court of Session, it might still have been the duty of this House to correct an error which this House might find to have led to such a course of adjudication, but in the present case the House has not any such difficulty to overcome.

Independently, therefore, of authority, it remains to be considered what are the merits of the case upon the [934] statutes under which trustees act. It was contended, in the course of the argument, that the defenders had not properly raised the point upon which they now insist in the pleadings. I think, however, that the issue as framed raises the whole case; the terms are, "Whether the pursuer was overturned through the fault or negligence of the trustees, or others in their employment, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?" That word "injury" raises the question, as it implies responsibility in the defenders.

In a well-known case in the Court of Chancery (referred to, ante, p. 926) Lord Eldon directed an issue, in very similar terms, for the purpose of raising the question of right on the part of the plaintiff, and of liability on the part of the defendant. Under the issue in the present case, if the jury had been satisfied of the loss, and of the negligence of the trustees, or those employed by them, they would not have found a verdict in the affirmative, unless satisfied that the pursuer was entitled to redress as against the defenders; and so the learned judge must have understood the issue from the manner in which he expounded the law to the jury. The law was there laid down by that learned judge, that road trustees on a public road are liable for any injury which may happen to passengers in consequence of the negligence or improper conduct of labourers or surveyors, or other persons employed by the trustees, or by the officers of the trustees when engaged in any operation performed under the authority of the trustees. This is so stated in the bill of exceptions, by which all parties are bound, and if the law be inaccurately laid down the verdict found under such direction and exposition of the law cannot stand.

[935] Now, the law as laid down would amount to this, that road trustees (that is, the road funds under their control, for such is stated to be the character of the suit,) are liable for an injury happening to a passenger, from the improper conduct of any person when engaged in any operation performed under the authority of the trustees. That the conduct of such person was not in due execution of the purposes of the act constitutes part of the proposition, for otherwise it would not be improper.

The result, therefore, of such a rule of law would be, that (however improper the conduct of any person employed by the trustees or their officers, though wholly unauthorized by the trustees, and though unconnected with their employment,) all damage arising from such conduct would be to be compensated out of the funds of the public in the hands of the trustees,—a proposition not supported, by any principle of law, regulating the liability of trustees for the acts of their servants.

How much greater latitude is to be adopted in claims against the present trust fund will be best seen by referring to the statutes. The general turnpike act by the tenth section authorizes the trustees to appoint superintendents, surveyors, and other officers. This must include a contractor, by whom the work is to be carried on. So far then the trustees were acting under the powers of the statute. The 16th section authorizes suits against the trustees in the name of their clerk; the 101st section gives a remedy against any surveyor or contractor who may leave any materials improperly on the road, by means of a penalty of £5 in addition to the damages sustained. The particular statute, under which the defenders are trustees, authorizes the levying certain tolls and duties. The 4th section appoints trustees, very many in [936] number, including justices of the peace and other official persons, guardians of infants, curators of fatuous persons, and mandatories of female proprietors. The 16th section directs the tolls to be applied in repairing and improving the roads, and in paying the expenses of management and interest of money borrowed, advanced, and owing at the time, and that the surplus should be appropriated annually to extinguish the principal of the money so borrowed, advanced, and owing, and to no other purpose whatsoever.

It is impossible to suppose that the framers of these statutes contemplated that any part of these tolls and funds would be diverted from the purpose for which they were to be raised, in order to compensate for damages to arise from any improper act of any person whilst employed under the authority of the trustees. Such an application of the tolls and funds would not be in accordance with the 16th section, unless it could be shown that the law was clearly such, at the time the statute passed, as to justify the supposition that such an application had not been enumerated, because known to be incident to the execution of the trust.

But why should the trust funds be so liable? If the thing done be within the powers of the statute, the party sustaining any damage from it cannot be entitled to compensation unless the statute itself provides it, and for this reason, that upon this supposition the act creating the damage would be lawful; if then the thing done be not within the powers of the statute, either from exceeding these powers or from the manner of doing it, why should the public funds bear the burden of indemnifying the guilty party? Many cases may be supposed in which the trustees may be so far actors in the transaction [937] creating the damage as to render their property liable, but none in which the trust funds ought to be applied in satisfaction of the party injured.

Finding, therefore, the rule of law clearly established in England, and nothing in the law of Scotland which authorizes a contrary course of decision, I cannot hesitate to say that I think this is a case in which the practice in Scotland has been erroneous, and ought to be set right; and this, I think, ought to be effected in this case, by reversing all the interlocutors appealed from, the first of which is that which directed the issue, because, as the ground of defence, which I think ought to prevail, appears upon the summons itself, and in the defences as originally made, the cause was, before the interlocutor directing the issue, in a state which would have enabled the court to dispose of it. However, after the course of practice which has prevailed in Scotland, I do not think that the defender is entitled to any costs of the suit, and of course there can be no costs of this appeal.

Lord Brougham.—My Lords, I entirely agree in the view my noble and learned friend has taken of this case,—a case of no ordinary importance, whether we regard the law of that part of the kingdom where it was decided, or the rights and liabilities of trustees, bodies of men acting oftentimes in very difficult circumstances. I also entirely agree in the doctrine, that this, a Scotch law question,—referring to Scotch practice, decided in a Scotch court, and coming to your Lordships as judges of appeal from that court,—is to be disposed of by you as if you yourselves were judges in a Scotch court,—that the principles of Scotch law, whether to be found in text writers or in [938] the statute book, or in the decisions of judges in Scotland, must be the guide by which your Lordships should be governed. But though this would show that if there be any principle of Scotch law to support the present decision, if there be any authority in the text writers, if there be any decided cases, or if there be any dicta of judges heretofore laying down one rule, that rule must be followed in this case by your Lordships in preference to any opposite or different rule, which we might be disposed to adopt in the same question, arising as a question in courts in this country; yet I hold it to be equally clear, (as clear as any proposition can be,) that if, on the contrary, the Scotch law be silent upon this, if there be no cases decided, and no authority either of judges or of text writers at variance with the principles which would be adopted by the English law, and which would govern the decision of the English courts had the question arisen here,—we are bound to lean to the doctrine which would regulate us in our own courts, in order to avoid the manifest inconvenience, in the first place, of two nations who are living together in the intercourse which so happily subsists between our Northern brethren and ourselves, being governed in respect of our trade or other matters arising out of that intercourse by different laws; and in order to avoid, in the second place, the opprobrium which must arise from two systems of law being found to exist, without difference of circumstances, in two such countries upon directly opposite principles.

Now, in the present case there may either be decisions bearing directly upon the point, or there may be decisions which may govern the case, although no decision have yet taken place upon it; that there is [939] no case of a date prior to 1820 relating to turnpike trusts, and trusts of a similar description, is admitted; that therefore there is no rule of law solemnly recognized and laid down by the court as to the liability under such trusts, is not denied. But it may be that some general principle exists extending the liability of persons further, through their agents, than the law of England allows that liability to exist here. When we come to examine that, however, we find that it is quite otherwise, and that this liability, according to the general principles of Scotch jurisprudence, is more restricted than according to our principles of jurisprudence. The case of Bush v. Steinman (ante, p. 930) in the Court of Common Pleas was a decision which gave perfect satisfaction in Westminster Hall,—a decision perfectly consonant to a crowd of other cases,—and yet that case of Bush v. Steinman I take upon me to say would not have been so decided in Scotland.

The case was this: a person had employed a builder to do work for him; that builder employed a sub-contractor, that sub-contractor employed a person to bring the materials; the person who was to bring the materials, not the contractor in the first instance, or the sub-contractor in the second instance, but a person three off from the gentleman who had given the orders so to have the work done for him, brought the materials, and laid them down in a negligent and careless manner, so that an individual had his carriage damaged thereby; that individual brought his action against the gentleman who had employed the contractor to do the work, and the consequence was that he recovered damage. A motion [940] for a new trial was made, and the facts as they had appeared on the trial were these: that the person farthest off, that is D., being employed to furnish materials by C., he being the sub-contractor of B., who was employed to build the wall, and which B. had been employed by A., had been guilty of the negligence out of which the injury arose; and under these circumstances the court held that A., the person who employed B., which B. employed C., which C. employed D., was liable for the negligent laying down of the materials by D., though he, A., was neither the person who laid down the materials, nor the person who employed D. to lay them down, nor the person who contracted with C. the employer of D., but only the person who had set the whole going by contracting with B. to do the work, which had been done by D., the injury being owing to D.'s negligence. Consequently the rule may be stated thus: I am liable for what is done by the man whom I employed, nay, for what is done by the person whom he employs, nay more, for what is done by the person whom the other employs, as if I had done it myself; and for this reason, that I in effect employ him to do it; I set the whole in motion, and it was for my benefit as well as by my orders it was done.

I am, therefore, of opinion that neither by the Scotch law, by decided cases, by direct authority varying with the circumstances of the case, nor by general principles applicable to the question, which the Court of Session has laid down, can this judgment be sanctioned. Such being my opinion, and entirely agreeing with my noble and learned friend, I hold it to be my duty to set right the practice which has prevailed in Scotland, this not being the only case. It will reverse the decision in the case in [941] question; it will also destroy and abrogate the authority of the previous cases which proceed upon the same principle; it will set right the administration of the law, and make it inconsistent with no decision up to the period of 1820; and it will make it consistent with the general principle of Scotch law, and make the Scotch law in this matter not only consistent with its own general principles, with respect to the liability of agents and other persons, but it will likewise make it entirely consistent with the law of England.

I also agree with my noble and learned friend that all the interlocutors appealed from ought to be reversed, and I also agree with him as to costs. The costs of the appeal of course cannot be given, and it would be highly expedient and proper toward the parties that the pursuer should not be saddled with the costs in the Court below; he has not been so, and I apprehend he ought not to be.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said interlocutors complained of in the said appeal, of date the 10th of March 1837, and the 19th and 22d of June 1838, be and the same are hereby reversed, with this declaration, that neither party shall be liable to the other party in expenses in the said Court of Session.

RICHARDSON and CONNELL—DEANS and DUNLOP, Solicitors.

[942] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

EDWARD HOGGAN, Writer to the Signet, Appellant.—Pemberton—Sandford; ELIZABETH CRAIGIE, Daughter of George Craigie, sometime residing at Clan-Gregor Castle, Respondent.—Attorney General (Campbell)—James Anderson [23d August 1839].

[Cited, with approval, in Lyle v. Ellwood, 1874, L.R. 19 Eq. 107; and see Yelverton v. Longworth, 1864, 2 Macph. (H.L.), 58, 72; Leslie v. Leslie, 1860, 22 Dunlop, 1016, 1017.]

Marriage.—Circumstances held sufficient to constitute a marriage (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session). Per L. C. It is not necessary to prove the contract itself; it is sufficient if the facts of the case are such as to lead to satisfactory evidence of such a contract having taken place. Upon this principle, the acknowledgment of the parties, their conduct towards each other, and the repute consequent upon it, may be sufficient to prove a marriage.

Marriage (promise cum copula).—Question as to the application of the rule of law in reference to promise subsequente copula, in cases in which cohabitation has also preceded the promise. (See p. 971.)

Question as to the effect of a release of a promise of marriage intervening between the promise and a subsequent copula. (See p. 974.)

An intimacy had subsisted between the appellant and respondent, which resulted in the birth of a child in September 1832. The appellant, subsequent to this event, granted the respondent a letter settling £10 per annum on her during life. In January 1834 the respondent discovered symptoms of pregnancy. On the 8th March 1834 the appellant delivered to the respondent the following document:—“Dear Elizabeth, [943] Under existing circumstances I feel anxious to provide for you after my decease, as far as in my power, and with that view I shall, at my decease, leave a declaration acknowledging you as my lawful wife, which will secure to you the annuity payable from the Widows Fund of Writers to the Signet. It is of the utmost importance that this intention should not be made known, as utter ruin, in that event must fall on me, and were I to show or give you possession of the declaration, I would then be compelled to announce the fact to the Collector of the Widows Fund within three months, under forfeiture of the annuity. The declaration, therefore, shall only be delivered at my decease, in the event of the most strict secrecy being adhered to regarding this communication; and I hereby declare, that in the event of the contents of this letter being made known to any other person or persons, except your father and mother, the letter shall be of no avail, and shall in no manner of way be held as binding, or used as a document against me. I am," etc. This document was antedated 25th January 1824. On receipt of this document the respondent wrote and presented to the appellant the following:—"1834, March 8th. Dear Edward, I do hereby declare to take you for my lawful husband, in terms of the document which you have made out, and that I will not make it known to any but my father, mother, and those friends which I wish to be on terms of intimacy with. But should the fact become known, and I have no hand in it, I will not hold responsible, nor forfeit my claim. I will do all to conceal it. Yours," etc. In reference to this latter document it was averred on record by the appellant "that on perusing it, as it appeared to him to have been written for a sinister pur[944]pose, he instantly, and in the pursuer's (respondent's) own presence, threw it into the fire and burnt it."

* 15 D., B., and M., 379; S.C. 16 D., B., and M., 584.

On the 29th March 1834, the appellant delivered to the respondent the following additional document:—"29th March 1834. Dear Elizabeth, It is most assuredly my intention to provide for you to the utmost extent my means will permit, during the remainder of your life, while we are separate from each other. If I made any statement last night to your sister to the contrary, it was not my intention. Whatever allowance is made is gratuitous on my part, and any abuse or attempt to compel me to increase these payments will be attended with a contrary effect. I propose giving you £50 this year, in full of all expenses of maintenance, payable at two terms, and the remaining years to be regulated by circumstances. The doctor and nurse's expenses to be paid. Yours truly." In the first paragraph of this document after the words "remainder of your life" there was originally written "while unmarried," but the appellant, at the request of the respondent, substituted the words which conclude the paragraph as above. The above documents were the result of repeated applications by the respondent and her parents to the appellant to acknowledge the respondent as his wife. The respondent having obtained an opinion of counsel, advising her to obtain a publication of her marriage, the appellant on 1st April 1834 delivered to her the following additional document: "I hereby declare most solemnly before Almighty God, that I never granted a letter to any one, such as I have given to you, and cannot now grant any letter with such an obligation to any other person, as I consider myself bound by my letter." The appellant averred on record in reference to this document [945] that it "was written in order to satisfy the respondent about her annuity."

On the 2d of April the respondent applied to Mr. Robert White, W.S., as her law agent, and, in consequence, after consulting counsel, a summons of declarator of marriage was prepared. An arrangement then took place, the nature of which was very differently described by the contending parties: by the respondent it was stated that the appellant had agreed, in writing, to acknowledge her status in the most unequivocal manner; the appellant, on the other hand, averred that the only obligation on his part was, that he should make an adequate provision for the respondent by means of annuity. In terms of said arrangement (whatever might have been the true nature of it), the parties proceeded to the house of Mr. White together, on the 22d April 1834. The respondent went into Mr. White's house, and the appellant waited for her in the street. The respondent afterwards rejoined the appellant, when she informed him that she had obtained from Mr. White the summons and the letters above mentioned. The parties afterwards went to South Queensferry in a street coach, and lunched there. While there, the respondent showed the appellant the papers she had received from Mr. White; upon which the appellant observed, that Mr. White must be in possession of other documents. The respondent then transcribed and delivered to the appellant the following letter, addressed to Mr. White: "As Mr. Hoggan and I have now arranged the matter, I withdraw all proceedings, and request you to deliver the whole papers, originals, copies, and drafts, still in your possession, connected with this business, to the bearer, who will settle your account. I am," etc. The parties then agreed to cross the ferry, and before [946] going, the appellant addressed the following letter to the respondent's mother: "To prevent the unnecessary and very unpleasant exposure which must have taken place had the intended action gone on, Elizabeth and I have arranged and agreed to put a stop to all proceedings; and I hope, from the arrangements which I have made, there will be no cause to regret. We shall return to Edinburgh to-morrow or next day." The parties having spent the night together at the North Queensferry, they proceeded on the following day in a post-chaise to Burntisland, and the following is the respondent's statement of what took place there: "Having left Edinburgh unexpectedly, she had no trunk or secure place in which she might put the papers she had received from Mr. White, and the letter dated 22d April 1834, which had been written and delivered to her at Queensferry. The whole consequently remained in her reticule. In the course of the evening, having gone out of the parlour for a few minutes, she left the defender there, and the reticule with the papers in it lying on a chair. On her return she observed that the defender had gone out, and that the reticule was not in the room. She became alarmed, and searched the apartments carefully for the reticule and papers, but could not find them. During her search the defender returned to the room, and on being asked if he knew where the reticule was, he presented it to the pursuer, who instantly observed to him that none of her papers were there. Upon this he admitted that he had destroyed all her letters and papers, not, as he alleged, for the purpose of defrauding her, but merely in order to obtain the delay of some months in the publication of their marriage, for which he had so [947] anxiously besought her parents. He warned her, at the same time, that if she mentioned the destruction of the documents, he would cast her off entirely." The appellant denied this version of the transaction; he admitted that the letters, etc. were destroyed, but he averred that this was done with the respondent's express consent and approbation.

After moving about for some time to different parts of the country, and for a short time separately, the appellant took a house for the respondent in Edinburgh; but, on the morning after the respondent had entered the house, the appellant having peremptorily refused to acknowledge her as his wife, or to permit her to be addressed as such, she removed to the house of her parents. The present action of declarator of marriage was then instituted.

Upon closing the record a proof before the commissaries was ordered in support of the averments therein respectively, and the same having thereafter proceeded before the commissaries, the respondent, in the course of it, called Mr. Robert White, writer to the signet, as a witness, to whose admissibility the appellant objected; and she likewise called as witnesses George Craigie, her father, and Ann Craigie, her sister, to whose admissibility the appellant also objected. The commissary-examinator made avizandum with these objections to the Lord Ordinary, and his Lordship repelled in hoc statu the objection to the admissibility of the said Robert White as a witness, reserving the effect of what might be brought out in his examination in initialibus, and made avizandum with the debate on the objection to the admissibility of the said George Craigie and Ann Craigie, the father and sister of the pursuer, as witnesses. Mr. White having thereafter [948] been examined in initialibus, the appellant repeated his objection to his admissibility; whereupon the commissary allowed the examination of the witness in causa to proceed, and appointed the same to be taken apart, to be sealed up to lie in retentis, subject to the future orders of the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship repelled the objection taken to the examination of Mr. White in initialibus, and appointed his examination, as sealed up, to be opened and produced in process.

In the course of Mr. White's deposition as a witness in causa, he was interrogated, on the part of the respondent, on what ground, and for what purpose, she had requested him to give her up the documents before referred to, but the appellant objected to the interrogatory as incompetent, and the commissary-examinator allowed the question to be put and answered, but to be taken on a paper apart, and sealed up to lie in retentis, subject to the future orders of the Lord Ordinary.

On considering the objections taken by the appellant to the examination of the said George Craigie and Ann Craigie, the Lord Ordinary remitted to the commissaries to allow their examination to proceed, and in hoc statu, to seal up their depositions, that they might lie in retentis, subject to the future orders of the court.

The proof for both parties having been concluded, the Lord Ordinary appointed the parties to prepare and lodge mutual minutes of debate upon the competency of opening up the sealed depositions, and minutes of debate having been given in, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"26th Nov. 1836. The Lord Ordinary having considered the minutes of debate, in respect of the special circumstances of this case, as established by the documents in process, and the proof already taken, [949] repels the objections offered by the defender to the admissibility of the pursuer's father and sister, as witnesses: and also repels the objection to the question put to the witness, Robert White, and appoints the sealed packets referred to in the minutes to be opened, and to form part of the process." *

* "Note.—The Lord Ordinary, upon again considering the objection to the examination of the pursuer's father and sister, is rather confirmed than otherwise in his former opinion. The general rule unquestionably is that witnesses so circumstanced must be rejected, and the Lord Ordinary fully concurs in the opinion that actions like the present do not necessarily demand any relaxation of that rule. When a pursuer founds upon an alleged private and irregular marriage, it would be most dangerous to permit her to urge as a matter of right the secrecy of the transaction, as in itself a sufficient ground for obtaining the testimony of her near relations, the very persons who have the strongest motives for colouring or perverting the truth, and who, on the supposition of her averments being unfounded, are presumably the very persons with whose assistance the measures of the pursuer have been contrived. But the rule is not without exception. Even in the latest cause, mainly founded on by the defender, that of Stewart v. Menzies (post, p. 957), the Court, in expressing their opinions, took for granted that circumstances might emerge in the course of the proof warranting the examination of the witnesses objected to on the ground of relationship, and accordingly, on the strength of such circumstances, a brother of the pursuer was afterwards examined.

"Now, it does appear to the Lord Ordinary that the present case falls within the exception.

"It is established by the documents in process, at least by copies, of which the accuracy is admitted, that the defender did address several letters to the pursuer, which, to say the least of them, are of a very equivocal character. Independently of the sense attached to them by the defender, by profession a man of business, the construction put upon them by the pursuer, the comparatively inexperienced individual to whom they were addressed, especially if that construction was known to the defender, is a point which may be of very great importance. In this view it is essential to ascertain the whole circumstances relative to the acceptance by the defender of the pursuer's letter of the 8th of March, the terms of which are, for the first time, admitted in the minute. The defender, in his deposition as a haver, admits that he received that letter and burnt it, but the addition to that testimony that it was so burned in the presence of and with the consent of the pursuer, is clearly not conclusive evidence. The only information attainable upon all those matters is to be sought for in the examination of the pursuer's near relations, to whom, by the most positive injunctions of the defender himself, the pursuer's confidence was to be confined. In these circumstances it does appear to the Lord Ordinary that their testimony cannot be rejected without the greatest injury to the pursuer, while on the other hand the defender has by his own acts placed himself in a situation most justly barring all attempts on his part to shut out the only light which can be obtained on the subject. In canvassing the weight due to the testimony of those witnesses, regard will of course be had to the peculiarity of their situation, but in the meantime the Lord Ordinary cannot refuse their testimony.

"The second point relates to the question put to Mr. White as to the pursuer's reasons for asking from him the letters and documents, or, as the question is put in another form, his reasons for redelivering them. In general a statement made by a party would be inadmissible; but this is not exactly a fair mode of stating the point. It is admitted that those papers and documents were got up from Mr. White by the pursuer, for the purpose of being delivered to the defender, who was waiting in the neighbourhood of Mr. White's office. It is admitted by the defender that the delivery of those documents to him was not gratuitous or unconditional. He avers that the condition was the conveyance to her of a provision for life, while the pursuer avers it to have been the granting of a letter explicitly declaring her to be his wife, and thus superseding the necessity of the first action of declarator, and of the various documents on which it was founded.

"Both parties aver that a letter was written binding the defender to the condition, such as it was. That letter is not forthcoming. The defender has not examined

[950] Against the above-quoted interlocutor the appellant presented a reclaiming note to the First Division of the Court, and upon advising the same, their Lordships of this date pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having advised this reclaiming note, and heard counsel for the parties, refuse the desire of the reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against; find the pursuer entitled to the expense of [951] opposing the reclaiming note, and remit the account thereof to the auditor to tax the same and report, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed farther, as shall be just."

The cause was then debated on the merits, and avizandum having been made with the debate and whole process, the following interlocutor was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary:—"7th March 1837. The Lord Ordinary having heard parties procurators at great length, and thereafter considered the proof adduced, productions and whole process, finds facts, circumstances, and qualifications proved relevant to infer marriage between the pursuer and defender: Finds them married persons, husband and wife of each other, accordingly: Therefore, ordains the defender to adhere to the pursuer, and to cohabit with, treat, cherish, and entertain her as his wife, in terms of the conclusions of the libel, and decerns: Finds the defender liable in expenses; and allows an account thereof to be given in, and to be taxed by the auditor: Farther, and in regard to the conclusion for aliment in case of non-adherence on the part of the defender, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may be heard thereupon." * the pursuer as a haver, and on the other hand she states that it was burnt along with the other documents, which the defender admits he put into the fire at Burntisland, and, in the absence of any proof of its existence, there does seem to be some probability in this statement. The parties then being at issue in regard to the condition on which these papers and documents were to be delivered up, it rather appears to the Lord Ordinary that the expressions used by the pursuer to her agent, on asking for the papers, while the defender was waiting in the street to receive them, fall to be considered as part of the res gesta, as a circumstance taking place in the course of the transaction, which may be competently received."

* "Note.—The question will be found to depend in a great measure, if not entirely, upon the import of the writings which passed between the parties in March 1834. The Lord Ordinary has felt it to be one of considerable difficulty;—a difficulty arising from the very equivocal mode of expression used, and, as he cannot help thinking, intentionally used by the defender in these letters. They are certainly not the letters of a person intending to declare, without subterfuge or ambiguity, a present intention to contract marriage, merely qualified with the condition that it should be kept secret. They have as little the appearance of letters unequivocally intimating to the party to whom they are addressed that the connexion had been, and was to continue illicit, and undertaking merely an obligation for a pecuniary provision. There is, however, yet another object which the writer might have had in view, viz., to create an impression on the mind of the party receiving them, that they amounted to a declaration of marriage, while the mode of expression left the means of escape, if he found it convenient to deny their effect. The Lord Ordinary has found himself compelled to adopt the last supposition as the true one. But the mere circumstance of the defender's intention in this particular, is not conclusive. The questions will still remain,—1st, Whether the letters did admit of being construed as present declarations; 2dly, Whether the pursuer did receive and construe them as such; and lastly, Whether the defender knew that that construction was put upon them by the pursuer. For if these questions are answered in the affirmative, the defender will be bound, and cannot be allowed to plead the concealed and fraudulent intention with which the writings were framed, in defeat of the meaning put upon them, and known by him to be so put upon them, by the other party.

The first letter, bearing date the 25th January 1834, but of which the true date is admitted to be the 8th of March, is strongly indicative of some such intention as that already alluded to. In fact, it is impossible for the defender to give to it, according to his own view, any reasonable or consistent meaning. It sets out, no doubt, with stating his anxiety to provide for the pursuer, and promises to leave, at his decease, a declaration acknowledging her as his lawful wife. It then assigns.

[952] The appellant having reclaimed to the First Division, their Lordships ordered cases, and thereafter [953] pronounced the following interlocutor:—"17th Feb. 1838. The Lords, having resumed consideration of [954] this reclaiming note, with the revised cases and whole procedure, and having heard counsel for the parties, [955] adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 7th March 1837, and as a reason for not giving her instant possession of the declaration, that he would be compelled to announce the fact to the Collector of the Widows' Fund. Looking at the terms of the existing Statute on the subject of that Widows' Fund, it may well be questioned how far this last representation was correct. But what is of more importance, it is nearly certain that the defender must have been satisfied at the very time, that the obligation, according to his construction of it, was absolutely worthless. The defender is a writer to the Signet, and could not be ignorant on a point which, even amongst the comparatively uninitiated, may be now considered as a matter of notoriety, that unless marriage is contracted during lifetime, the mere declaration left at death will not confer the character of widow. If the defender then had a private object in this letter, different from that of an admission of marriage de presenti, it was not so much the object of defrauding the Widows' Fund, as that of defrauding the young woman he was addressing, not only of her belief of marriage, but of her hopes of a provision; but while this letter does not present any very clear or consistent meaning, if strictly construed, it might, when read more loosely, very easily create the impression that it admitted the existence of the marriage at the time, while it merely postponed the granting of a document in evidence of that existing marriage, in consideration of the defender's motives for keeping the marriage secret. Though far from being explicit, it is a letter which might have been written by a party, who, knowing and admitting that he was married, stipulated only for the delay of the delivery of a document, which would at once enable the other party to declare it. And with reference to this last construction, the circumstance of the antedating of the letter is not immaterial. It is admitted that this was done to please the pursuer; and as she was then pregnant, there was an intelligible object in the antedating of the letter, if it referred to an existing marriage; while, according to the view of the letter taken by the defender, the antedating is utterly inexplicable and unmeaning.

"But that letter must not be taken singly,—it must be combined with the rest of the correspondence. It was followed by the letter from the pursuer of the same day, commencing, 'Dear Edward, I do hereby declare to take you for my lawful husband, in terms of the document which you have made out,' etc. One fact regarding this letter is admitted, viz., that it was delivered to the defender, although he denies that he retained it, but avers that he objected to it, and threw it into the fire in the presence of the pursuer. Upon these last points there is no evidence on either side,—certainly no conclusive evidence. For the Lord Ordinary cannot view in that light, the inferences drawn respectively by the parties, from the statements made to counsel, and the correspondence which took place relative to the opinions of those counsel. The admitted fact, however, of such a letter being written and delivered to the defender, is evidence of the meaning attached by the pursuer to the preceding letter of the defender, and is also evidence of the communication by her to the defender of the meaning so put upon it; and it would rather appear to the Lord Ordinary that the defender was bound to produce something more conclusive than his own mere averment of his rejection of that letter. As the correspondence did not stop there, the continuance of it clearly allowed the opportunity of placing this matter beyond the reach of doubt. But it so happens that the remaining part of the correspondence fortifies the presumption that the pursuer's letter had not been repudiated by the defender, and is, according to every probability, nearly irreconcilable with his statement upon this subject.

"The next letter, that of 29th March 1834, begins, 'Dear Elizabeth, It is most assuredly my intention to provide for you to the utmost extent my means will permit during the remainder of your life, while we are separate from each other,' and it is admitted that the last member of this sentence stood originally 'while unmarried'; and was altered to the present form of expression, on the application of the pursuer, and that the alteration 'was made to please her.'

refuse the desire of this note; [956] of new find expenses due, and remit to the auditor to tax the account, when given in, and to report."

[957] Appellant.—The father and sister of the respondent were not, according to the law and practice of Scotland, admissible as witnesses in her behalf. The principle of the law of Scotland in regard to relations in the degree of father or

"Now, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that this was just the occasion on which the defender, if he truly had rejected the pursuer's letter of 8th March, must have adhered to the expressions originally used. It was the very opportunity for taking off, by a written qualification or denial, the effect of any erroneous construction put upon his former letter by the pursuer. Yet, instead of taking that opportunity, he agrees to the substitution of a certain form of expression, which, contrasted with that struck out, amounts very nearly to complete evidence of acquiescence in the view taken by the pursuer in her letter of the 8th March, of their relative situations. As it is admitted, then, that the pursuer's letter of the 8th March was written and delivered to the defender, as there is no evidence of his rejection of it, but, on the contrary, the adoption by him of a phrase in the letter of the 29th, nearly irreconcilable with such rejection, there is a preponderance of evidence in support of the presumption that her letter of the 8th had been received and retained without objection.

"Next comes the letter of the 1st April:—'I hereby declare most solemnly before Almighty God, that I never granted a letter to any one such as I have given to you, and cannot now grant any letter with such an obligation to any other person, as I consider myself bound by my letter.'

"The defender seems to think that this letter may be easily disposed of. According to his view, it merely stated that he considered himself bound to abide by, and fulfil the obligation which he had granted by the letter dated in January; which again, according to him, meant nothing more than to enable her to go against the fund of the Society of Writers to the Signet for the annuity, the question being here, not whether this was a proper or improper purpose, but whether it has not plainly the meaning of the letter. The Lord Ordinary must demur to this reasoning. In the first place, the words are not merely that he will not grant, but that he cannot grant such an obligation to any other person, words which clearly imply an indissoluble or irrevocable engagement. Secondly, the previous correspondence admitting, at least by possibility, of this last construction, it being proved that such a construction had been put upon it by the pursuer, and there being a strong presumption that he had acquiesced in that construction, the solemnity of the adjuration in the letter of the 1st of April enters deeply into the question as a question of evidence of intention. That the defender should call God to witness a legitimate but secret engagement, and which for this last reason might require and justify such an appeal, was perfectly natural and proper. But is any man to be allowed to state in a court of justice that his meaning was only to call Almighty God to witness his engagement to provide for his associate in an illicit intercourse, through the medium of what he himself admits to be a gross fraud? Can it be supposed that the pursuer could have viewed it in that light? Is it not, on the contrary, quite clear that the pursuer was entitled to consider an obligation so solemnly attested, as importing in the first place a legitimate engagement, and at all events an irrevocable engagement, neither of which conditions it will be observed can be possibly applicable to it, as explained by the defender.

"Such, then, being the letters, it only remains for the Lord Ordinary to consider the evidence of the pursuer's father and sister, whose examination has been authorized by the Court in the special circumstances of this case. It is needless to state that witnesses so circumstanced must be presumed to have a strong bias, and that their testimony, if unsupported, à fortiori contradicted, must be received with great hesitation. The testimony of these witnesses, however, seems to stand clear of any imputation on the score of appearance of partiality, and is in all its essential particulars consistent with the inferences which the Lord Ordinary has thought himself entitled to draw from the letters themselves. By the testimony of both these witnesses, it is clear that they conceived and expressed that belief to the defender, that it was the secrecy of the marriage and not the postponement of it, which they under-mother is, that in respect of their presumed partiality they are not to be credited in questions of contract. There is plainly no case to which this principle can apply more strongly than a case of status. Penuria testium is not held to render the evidence of such witnesses admissible in questions of irregular marriage, more than in any other sorts of contract; this exception is recognized only in questions of age stood to be his object in the letters. And it is equally clear, according to their evidence, that that view was admitted or at least acquiesced in by the defender. Upon the whole, then, the Lord Ordinary has formed the opinion that the letters, combined with the parole proof by the pursuer's father and sister, afford sufficient evidence of a de presenti declaration of marriage.

"As to the remaining part of the parole proof, and the whole proceedings of the parties after the raising and abandonment of the declarator of marriage, there seems to be a great difficulty in connecting them with the correspondence hitherto considered. This arises from the defect of the evidence of the conditions on which the action was abandoned. The defender alleges that it was in consideration of his becoming bound to grant the pursuer a pecuniary provision, while it is averred by her on the other hand that she agreed to abandon the action and give up the documents on which it was founded, solely in consideration of his engaging to give her an absolute and unequivocal acknowledgment of her status as his wife.

"As a mere question of probabilities, the Lord Ordinary has no hesitation in avowing his belief of the latter statement. Even in the most trivial question of pecuniary obligation, a party, a professional person, who contrived to transact with his adversary, an inexperienced young woman, under the cautious seclusion of her parents and legal advisers, could not well complain of any unfavourable construction being put on his conduct. But these unfavourable presumptions are incalculably stronger in the present case, where the defender must, from the nature of his connexion with the pursuer, have had a great influence over her, and where, having got her into his power, and having obtained, through her means, possession of all the documents considered to be of importance, he induced her to abandon, by her own unadvised act, that legal proceeding which she had commenced under the sanction and counsel of her natural guardians and legal advisers. But whatever may be the probabilities, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that there is no sufficient proof of the terms on which the pursuer agreed to give up the action of declarator.

"And it may be observed that this circumstance goes far to exclude the second or alternative view of the case maintained by the pursuer, viz., that the continued connexion between the parties after they left Edinburgh on the 22d of April 1834, when combined with the letters of the defender, must at any rate constitute a marriage, by the force of the promise followed by copula.

"These letters, viewed as a declaration de presenti, were beyond the reach of any recal or surrender by the parties; but if viewed as constituting merely a promise, that promise admitted of being retracted on the one hand, or abandoned on the other; and no copula, following on such retraction or abandonment, would be of any relevancy in a question of marriage. Now, here it is admitted that the letters were given up, and as there is no sufficient proof of the terms on which according to the pursuer, they were so given up, viz., in consideration of an absolute acknowledgment, it does appear to the Lord Ordinary, that there is here a defect in one indispensable link of the pursuer's chain of evidence.

"A remark of the same kind is applicable to the whole of those subsequent proceedings, in so far as they are founded upon substantively, as affording a proof of marriage by cohabitation, and habit and repute. The doubtful nature of the terms on which the pursuer agreed to abandon the action of declarator, throws a corresponding obscurity over the true nature of the connexion which afterwards subsisted between them. That connexion did not continue under circumstances to make it in itself conclusive. It is proved, no doubt, that they lived together as man and wife, and were so considered in the lodging-houses where they resided. But it is also proved that this took place under assumed names, a circumstance which goes far to neutralize the inference of marriage. As the assumption of the appearance of marriage may be easily accounted for, from a consideration of decorum and convenience, and may be ascribed to such considerations when the true names are con-and propinquity, or in the trial of crimes (Dalziel v. Richmond, 10th June 1790: Ball v. King, 21st January 1797; Stewart v. Menzies, 5th Feb. 1835; all in Fac. Coll.). It was incompetent to admit as evidence the statement made by the respondent to her agent, Mr. White, respecting her motives for demanding re-delivery of her documents from him. To render hearsay admissible at all to this [958] effect, it must be quite clear that the statement to be proved is made in circumstances in which there is no reason to suspect its truth, where no intelligible motives for deception can be supposed, and where consequently the statement made may, with reasonable certainty, be taken as throwing the light of truth upon the act to which it immediately relates. The declaration of a party, as explanatory of his acts, is therefore admitted to be proved, when it is adverse to his interest in the cause, and the statement of a third party, explanatory of an act, may in like manner be taken where it was made without interest in or anticipation of the cause in which it is offered to be proved and without any motive to misrepresent the truth. But the declaration of a party himself in his own favour never can be so proved, for it is impossible in any such case to have a reasonable certainty that the declaration is not false, and contrived with a view to the very case, in support of which it is afterwards offered to be proved. In the present instance it will be observed, too, that the declaration was not made till after the controversy had arisen, upon the merits of which it is brought to bear.

The respondent has not proved any de præsenti acknowledgment or declaration of marriage on the part of the appellant (Kennedy, 19th June 1747, Mor. 10457. Brown's Supplement, vol. v. p. 789; M'Innes v. More, House of Lords, 25th June 1782. Mor. 12683; Taylor v. Kello, 16th Feb. 1787, Mor. 12687; Anderson v. Fullerton, 13th Nov. 1795, Mor. 12690; M'Lachlan v. Dobson, 6th Dec. 1796, Mor. 12633; Stewart v. Menzies, 6th Dec. 1833, 12 S., D., and B., 179; Ferguson on Consistorial Law, and authorities there referred to). The respondent has not shewn that either of the parties had marriage in view throughout their intercourse, yet in such circumstances even a [959] regular and formal celebration in facie ecclesiae has been disregarded (Jolly v. M'Neill, 20th June 1828, 3 Wilson and Shaw, 85).

A promise of marriage has not been proved. This point must depend exclusively upon the construction of the appellant's letters, or rather of the antedated letter of the 25th January 1834, containing the alleged promise of which the subsequent letters are cealed; on the other hand, the assumption of feigned names is not absolutely conclusive the other way, as it is quite consistent with the notion of a really existing marriage, which the parties wish to keep secret. It certainly does not appear to the Lord Ordinary, that there is here any such inconsistency as to raise doubts of the true meaning of the letters forming the main ground of the pursuer's action. Even the expressions which she is said to have used at Dumfries admit of an easy explanation, when it is considered that her object was to obtain an unequivocal acknowledgment of her marriage; and that, after the abandonment of the action, and the delivery of the documents she had every reason to believe that she was at the defender's mercy. Neither is it to be thrown out of view, that there are some other circumstances in these subsequent proceedings, which the defender will find it difficult to explain. The taking of the house in Warriston Crescent, and the intimation of it to the pursuer's mother, are not very easily reconcilable with the notion of a mere continuance of an illicit connexion. Inferences still more strong may be drawn from the letter addressed to the pursuer's mother from South Queensferry, on 22d April, on their way from Edinburgh, and also from the letter of 1st May 1834. addressed by the defender to the pursuer in Glasgow.

"These letters are written with the defender's habitual caution; but no person, on the mere reading of these letters, and in the ignorance of any private views on his part, could for a moment suppose that they implied anything but a legitimate connexion between him and the party to whom the first of these letters related, and to whom the second was actually addressed. But the Lord Ordinary finds it unnecessary to remark farther on the evidence of the proceedings of the parties after they left Edinburgh. His opinion is formed on the letters of the month of March, corroborated as they are by the testimony of the two Craigies; and for the reasons already given, that opinion is in favour of the pursuer."

founded on as merely confirmatory. The promise contained in the letter of 25th January is, that "I shall, at my decease, leave a declaration acknowledging you as my lawful wife;" and is accompanied by an explicit intimation, that "the declaration shall only be delivered at my decease, in the event of the most strict secrecy being adhered to regarding this communication." Lord Stair defines marriage "to be the conjunction of man and woman, to be consorts for all their life, with a communication of rights, divine and human; so the essence thereof consists in the conjugal society, the special nature of which society appeareth by the state, interest, and terms that the married persons have thereby." The promise given by the appellant was of something exclusive of this essence of marriage, viz., a declaration not to be delivered till after his decease, by which the conjugal society could not be constituted (Stair, b. 1, tit. 4, s. 6; Cockburn v. Logan, 19th July 1670, Mor. 12386, Smith, 26th Nov. 1755. Mor. 12393; Harvey v. Crawford, 19th Feb. 1732, Mor. 12388; Anderson v. Fullerton, 13th Nov. 1795, Mor. 12690).

Supposing there was a promise of marriage, it was effectually recalled by the appellant before any subsequent copula took place between the parties (Stair, b. 1, tit. 4, s. 3; Ersk. b. 1, tit. 4, s. 3). The [960] promise was renounced by the respondent herself, by the transaction by which she agreed to redeliver his letters to the appellant.

The legal presumption of matrimonial consent having passed at the time of a copula subsequent to the promise, is excluded by the fact of such intercourse having also preceded the promise (White v. Hepburn, 18th Nov. 1785, Mor. 12686; McDowall, Feb. 1796, reported in Ferguson's Consistorial Law, 163-178; Summary of Cases, Ersk. b. 1, tit. 6, s. 4, p. 120, note 139, Ivory's edition).

The promise was so qualified as to be incapable, by any fiction, of being converted into the de praesenti consent essential to marriage, at any period during the lifetime of the parties.

The appellant and respondent never cohabited together as man and wife.

Respondent.—Under the circumstances of the case, the respondent's father and sister were admissible as witnesses. To maintain this proposition, there is no occasion to impugn the doctrine of the law of Scotland, that persons occupying so near a relationship are inadmissible as witnesses. The question presently under discussion does not turn upon that general rule. It falls under one of its best established, and most favourably received exceptions, namely, that the facts which these relations were called to prove, are of an occult nature, in re domestica, and as to which there exists an unavoidable penuria testium. Consistorial causes stand in no other situation than ordinary causes, farther than this, that they are of that nature, that the transactions to be spoken to are most likely to be occult, and a [961] penuria testium is most likely to exist in regard to them (Stair, b. 4, tit. 43, s. 8; Bankton, b. 4, tit. 30, s. 15; Ersk. b. 4, tit. 2, s. 26; Barber v. Stewart, July 1732, Mor. 16742; Young v. Arrot, 8th Dec. 1738, Mor. 16743; Stirling v. Hamilton, 11th July 1704, Mor. 16708, and 13th July 1706; Cumming v. Cumming, 5th March 1748, Mor. 16756; Boyd v. Gibb, 20th Jan. 1770, Mor. 3989 and 9583; Nicolson v. Nicolson, 6th Dec. 1770, Mor. 16770, and Hailes, Dec. 371-418; Martin v. Mackissan, 8th Feb. 1816; Bell v. Bell, 14th April 1819, 2 Murray 130; Spence v. Howden, 12th July 1819, 2 Murray, 167; Stewart v. Menzies, ut supra). That the penury of testimony is the result of the tortuous act of the appellant is a circumstance of itself sufficient to authorize the testimony in question. But although the witnesses had been inadmissible the appellant waived the objection by himself cross examining them (Corporation of Sutton Coldfield, 1 Vern. 254; Bland, 3 Bro. P.C. 620). The conversation between the respondent and Mr. White formed part of the res gestae, was explanatory of the conduct of the parties, and was therefore competent to be given in evidence (Starkie's Law of Evidence, 2d edit. vol. i. p. 36).

The letters amount to a de praesenti declaration of marriage, more especially when explained by the relative parole proof. The letters in March and April taken by themselves, amount to a de praesenti declaration. However cautiously they may be conceived, they were undoubtedly written and delivered by the defender to the pursuer as such. It is of no consequence what the characters were which the parties chose to employ in expressing their consent. If it be once made out what they intended to mean by the characters employed, effect will be given to the meaning and intention, rather than to the literal reading of the words. The respondent is quite ready to concede, in the [962] fullest extent, a proposition which the appellant labours to establish, viz. that however clearly expressive the words might be of marriage, where it can be shewn that neither of the parties had marriage in view, the Court would not give effect to the words. But the proposition overthrows the argument which it is sought to support; because on the same principle, the respondent would say multo magis, if it appear that the parties understood each other as meaning to declare a marriage, it would be valid and effectual whatever ambiguity or equivocation might lurk about the mode of declaring it. The appellant was not entitled to assume that his intercourse with the respondent previous to the date of the letters was illicit. On the contrary, the presumption is, that it was in consequence of a lawful connexion (per Lords Chancellor (Eldon) and Redesdale, in Cunninghams v. Cunninghams, 2 Dow, 502, 506, and 511). The letters explain the previous footing on which the parties lived, and also give a character and a consistency to their subsequent intercourse. This much is clear, that when the letters of March and April were interchanged, the parties were not conspiring together to effect any sinister purpose. In what they did and wrote they were unquestionably serious. The respondent was serious in acknowledging the appellant to be her husband, and the appellant was serious in acknowledging the respondent to be his wife, or what is the same thing, in leading her to believe that he so acknowledged her. Every statement made and every act done by the defender was a confirmation or iteration of the declaration made by the letters. To what other source than to the declaration in the letters, or rather to the [963] marriage which the letters declare, can the repeated admissions or acknowledgments of the appellant, that the respondent was his "wife," be ascribed? In what other capacity can their cohabitation be viewed than that of marriage? Were there any doubt about the terms of the letters, or about the meaning which the parties conveyed to each other by the letters, it would be removed by what followed on them. Every word the appellant spoke, or deed the appellant did, carried to the respondent a confirmation of the acknowledgment contained, or which she believed, and which the appellant knew she believed, to be contained, in the letters. It was the evincing to her, as well as to others, the consent of marriage, which made the contract (M'Adam v. M'Adam, 21st May 1813, 1 Dow, 189; Honyman v. Honyman, 3d March 1831, 5 W. and S. 133, 139, 144; Stewart v. Menzies, 6th Dec. 1833, 12 S. and D. 183).

There was no discharge or renunciation of the promise. The appellant possessed himself of the letters surreptitiously, and against the will or consent of the respondent, and it is impossible to hold that that amounted to a discharge or renunciation of the previous promise or obligation of marriage. But the parties slept together on the night of the 22d, and it was not till the 23d that the appellant got possession of the documents in the manner described. A marriage by promise and copula had therefore been effectually constituted before the appellant possessed himself of the letters; and it was beyond the power of either of the parties to recall it. It was indissoluble, except by death or divorce; and even although the respondent had voluntarily renounced the promise, her renunciation [964] would have been nugatory and unavailing. By that time she was the appellant's wife for better for worse.

The position, that the promise copula subsequente did not amount to marriage, because the parties had had intercourse before the letters were granted, is maintained on a mistaken notion of the true principle of the law (per Lord Stowell in Dalrymple, Dodson's Report, p. 60, 62). Marriage is held to be formed, not as a punishment on the seducer, or as a compensation to the injured female. The true principle is, that the copula is the actual fulfilment of the previous promise, as much as if a de presenti declaration had been given, or a formal marriage solemnized, and the marriage thus contracted may be declared and enforced, as well against the woman as against the man. The previous character or conduct of the parties has no bearing on the question. If they could have contracted the matrimonial relationship in any way, it is formed if a copula succeeds the promise (Stair, b. 1, tit. 4, s. 6; b. 3, tit. 3, s. 42; Bankton, b. 1, tit. 5, s. 2; Erskine, b. 1, tit. 6, s. 4). The principle on which marriage by promise subsequente copula depends is altogether independent of the consideration, whether the copula has or has not been the first to which the female has submitted. The previous promise is equivalent to the sponsalia of the Romans, the subsequent copula to the actual consummation of the matrimonial relationship. By the "natural commixtion," the promise "transit in matrimonium," from an inflexible legal presumption that the parties thereby interchange a consent de praesenti. And so strong is this presumption, that it obtains, even [965] although one of the parties should not consider himself or herself married (Pennycuick, 15th Dec. 1752; Shillinglaw v. McIntosh, 6th March 1829, 7 S. and D. 533; M'Kinnon v. Sandys; and Myles v. Sim, 20th Nov. 1829, 8 S. and D. 89). The case of M'Dowall (ante, p. 960), was entirely different in its circumstances from the present. The promise there given was not absolute, but qualified. It was made to induce the woman to submit to the man's embraces; and the promise was, that he would marry her if she fell with child. The Court held this not a promise subsequente copula, but a promise post copulam. The woman might not have conceived, and in that case no promise had been given. It was only when pregnancy took place that the promise came into existence, and there it remained unconsummated and unfulfilled.

The parties were habit and repute husband and wife, and cohabited together as married persons.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case the Lord Ordinary, and all the judges of the Inner House, concurred in the opinion that there had been a valid marriage between the parties, although there was a difference of opinion as to whether it was to be considered as resting upon a contract per verba de praesenti, or a promise of marriage copula subsequenti. It appears to me impossible for the appellant to escape from one or the other of these grounds; as to the first, it is not necessary to prove the contract itself, it is sufficient if the facts of the case are such as to lead to satisfactory evidence of such a contract having taken place; upon this principle the acknowledgment of the [966] parties, their conduct towards each other, and the repute consequent upon it, may be sufficient to prove a marriage, contrahuntur nuptiae consensu quomodo-cunque declarato, verbis aut factis (Voet, l. 23, t. 2, s. 2), according to the doctrine of the civil law, or according to Mr. Erskine, book 1, title 6, section 5, "Marriage may be entered into where the consent is not expressed, but is discovered rebus ipsis et factis." Everything, therefore, is pertinent and relevant in an inquiry like the present, which indicates the present or previous consent of the parties.

Upon examining the evidence of what took place between these parties in March and April 1834, so far as it is to be found in the written documents, (only with reference to this principle,) I think there is satisfactory proof of a previous contract binding upon the appellant; it seems, indeed, probable that he attempted so to manage his communications with the respondent as to satisfy her wishes, and put a stop to her importunities, and, at the same time, to keep open to himself the means of escaping from his contract. But this will not avail him if there be proof of a binding contract, and if the respondent understood it to be so.

In order fairly to try the import of the letters, and to ascertain whether they prove the case set up by the respondent, or are consistent with the case as represented by the appellant, it must be kept in mind that the respondent insists there had been a previous contract or promise of marriage, and that the appellant denies this, and says that the connexion had been altogether illicit.

The letters appear to me quite inconsistent with the [967] latter supposition. The letter dated the 25th of January but written on the 8th of March, (an ante-dating strongly corroborative of the respondent's case, but unexplained by that of the appellant,) states the writer's intention of providing for the respondent, by an annuity payable from the widows' fund of the Writers to the Signet, which he could not do unless she were his wife. He wished, indeed, that the declaration, acknowledging her as such, should not be made known until after his decease, but such declaration would have been wholly inoperative, unless there had been a marriage in his lifetime; a declaration of marriage made known at that time, he says, would be his ruin, which is quite consistent with a previous secret contract, but is absurd, as addressed to a woman pressing for marriage not previously contracted. If it is to be construed to mean "I will never marry you, but after my death you shall have a declaration which may enable you by fraud to obtain an annuity as my widow," would it not have been absurd in the circumstances to permit her to shew it to her parents? but if, as between themselves, it was a recognition of the respondent as the wife of the writer, it would naturally tend to relieve their anxiety, although the announcement of the marriage was refused.

Again, if the letter was felt by the writer to be a recognition of the marriage, his prohibition to make it known to any other person or persons is intelligible; but if it was only to announce an intended fraud against the widows' fund after his own death, by the publication of which the respondent alone would suffer, the concealment might safely have been left to her. The [968] only rational and consistent construction of that letter appears to me to be this, "As between ourselves I acknowledge you to be my wife, and you may, to satisfy your parents, shew them this letter; but it must not be made known during my life; I will, however, furnish you with the necessary evidence to enable you to obtain the annuity after my death as my widow." That the respondent so understood this letter, or professed so to understand it, is proved by her letter of the 8th of March, if legally proved, which I think it is, and is scarcely less evident from the appellant's admission, in his answer to the eighth article of the pursuer's condescendence, in which he says, that upon reading her letter it appeared to him to have been written for a sinister purpose, and that he threw it into the fire. With this knowledge of the appellant's construction, or assumed construction, of the letter dated the 25th of January 1834, he wrote the letter of the 29th of March, in which he at first expressed his intention of providing for her, "whilst unmarried," to which she objected, and he, yielding to the objection, instead of those words introduced the words "while we are separate from each other." The appellant's wish to use the words "whilst unmarried" may be consistent with his declared intention of keeping the marriage secret, but his yielding to the respondent's objection to these words proves at least that he knew that she considered herself as married to him, and that he acquiesced in such her representation of her status.

Knowing then that the respondent treated the letter of 25th January as an acknowledgment of their marriage, and that she had refused to permit any expression to be [969] used in the letter of 29th March calculated to throw any doubt upon it, the appellant wrote another letter, of the 1st of April, in which he says, "I hereby declare most solemnly, before Almighty God, that I never granted a letter to any one such as I have given to you, and cannot now grant any letter with such an obligation to any other person, as I consider myself bound by my letter." The appellant attempts to escape from the effect of this letter, by suggesting that it was only to satisfy the respondent about her annuity; there is not an expression in it consistent with such a construction; on the contrary, being written to a woman who he knew claimed to be his wife, and relied upon his former letter as a recognition of her marriage, that letter can receive but one construction, namely, that she might rely upon that letter for that purpose, and that he was himself bound by it.

Upon the evidence of those letters, therefore, without referring to any parts of the testimony upon which doubts have been raised, I think the case made out, of a written recognition of the respondent, by the appellant, as his wife, and admission of a previous contract of marriage having taken place between them. Whatever difficulty there may be as to the evidence of what took place when the respondent obtained the papers from Mr. White, or what took place at Queensferry on the 22d of April; the appellant's letter to the respondent's mother of that date, seems to me to make such evidence comparatively immaterial. The respondent had determined to institute a declarator of marriage against the appellant, with the concurrence of her parents. This proceeding she withdrew, and left [970] Edinburgh with the appellant on the 22d of April, and on the evening of that day he wrote to the respondent's mother in these words, "To prevent the unnecessary and very unpleasant exposure which must have taken place had the intended action gone on, Elizabeth and I have arranged and agreed to put a stop to it. From the arrangements which I have made there will be no cause for regret. We shall return to Edinburgh to-morrow or next day." On the night of that day the parties slept together, and it was not till the next day that the appellant got possession of the letters which, up to that time, had been in the respondent's possession. It is, therefore, quite immaterial by what means he so obtained possession of the letters, because cohabitation had clearly taken place whilst they were still in the respondent's possession.

If according to the opinion of the judges of the First Division the letters before referred to implied rather a promise of marriage than a contract per verba de presenti, there was a copula following such promise, and therefore all that is necessary to constitute a marriage according to the law of Scotland. In order to try the construction of those letters, as containing a promise of marriage, it must be assumed that there had been no previous contract, or at least none such as the respondent could rely upon.

The letter of the 25th of January was in terms a promise to secure for the respondent a provision which she would only become entitled to by a marriage. That which was to be postponed until after his death was the publication of the evidence of the marriage. What was the intention which was to be concealed, and which if [971] made known would be the utter ruin of the appellant? What was the fact which it would be necessary to make known within three months to the collector of the widows' fund? What was to be made known to the respondent's parents, and in what way was the letter to be used as a document against him? Those expressions have all a natural meaning if a marriage was the subject to which they refer, but are wholly inconsistent with the appellant's construction that a plan of defrauding the widows' fund was the only subject to which they referred.

The letter of the 1st of April puts this beyond all doubt. What was the obligation referred to in that letter, which after the letter of the 25th of January the appellant would not grant to any other person, and by which he considered himself bound? What but marriage? I think that those letters do recognize a previous contract of marriage, but if not, they clearly contain a promise of giving to the respondent the character of wife, which, followed by the cohabitation of the 22d of April, constitutes a marriage.

It has, however, been contended upon this latter view of the case that the above rule of law does not apply in cases in which cohabitation has also preceded the promise; some authority has been referred to in support of that proposition, particularly White v. Hepburn, 18th November 1785, Mor. 12,666, and the case of McDowall, in February 1800, Ferguson's Consistorial Law (1829) pages 167 to 178; but in the [972] latter case the promise appears to have been conditional upon the woman proving with child; and a contrary doctrine has been recognized in Shillinglaw v. McIntosh, 6th March 1829, 7 Shaw and Dunlop, 533; McKinnon v. Sandys; and Myles v. Sim, 20th November 1829, 8 Shaw and Dunlop, 89. In the view I take of this case it is not necessary to express any conclusive opinion upon this point. It has been further contended that if there had been any promise it was released by giving up the letter which contained it before any copula took place; the evidence proves the contrary, the copula having taken place on the 22d of April, and the possession of the letter by the appellant not having then taken place; even had this been otherwise it would have been necessary for the appellant to have proved the voluntary delivery of the letter to him by the respondent for the purpose, and with the intent of releasing the contract, which he has wholly failed in doing.

Finding sufficient in this case to support the judgment of the Court of Session without relying upon that part of the evidence which has been objected to, there is no necessity for saying much upon that point. If the ground of the rule of law in Scotland as to rejecting the evidence of near relations be the same as that upon which the rejection of the evidence of a husband and wife in this country rests, namely, the avoiding that invasion of domestic confidence which the admissibility of such evidence would occasion,—there may [973] be reason in considering a penuria of other evidence as an exception to the rule; but if it be founded upon the supposed want of credit of such near relations, it seems most unreasonable to reject such testimony, when its credit may be fairly tested by other evidence to the same point, and to receive it only when, there being no other evidence, the conclusion must be drawn from such evidence only. There is, however, no doubt of the rule and of the exception, and there cannot be a case more clearly falling within the exception; for not only is this a case of domestic transaction likely to be known only to members of the family, but the evidence of the father and sister become material in a great measure from the secrecy maintained at the instance of the appellant himself, and from the spoliation by him of written documents; the admissibility of the evidence, under such circumstances, appears to be established by the authorities referred to by the respondent.

The evidence of White, as to what the respondent said to him upon applying for the paper, does not appear to me to be at all material in coming to a conclusion upon the merits of the case. For these reasons I think that the interlocutors appealed from are right, and therefore move your Lordships that they be affirmed with costs.

Lord Brougham.—My Lords, I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend. I had no doubt respecting this case from the beginning, as I intimated during the argument at the bar, though I pressed the counsel for the respondent on several points for the purpose of having it fully argued. My opinion has [974] been confirmed by having since read the cases. My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friend that it is sufficient if there is a promise cum subsequenti copula; and in that view I am of opinion that there is evidence sufficient in this case to establish a marriage. Some law has been vented at the bar which I cannot agree to, but which it is wholly immaterial to decide, because the facts of the case do not raise it; it is not necessary for your Lordships to decide the question whether or not, if after a promise, and before the copula, a renunciation of that promise or a release of that promise took place, that would or not negative the marriage. If the copula took place no one has gone so far as to say that the subsequent release of the promise could have the slightest effect. Nay, it ought to be known, if there is the least doubt upon that point, that if not only one party, but both parties, were to agree after the copula had taken place, a promise having preceded it,—if the husband, who had given the promise, were to say “I will no longer abide by it,” and the wife, who had received it, were to say, “I no longer compel it,” they could not possibly divorce one another by that means. If a marriage has taken place it is a complete valid marriage, and the promise cannot be released. My Lords, it is wholly unnecessary, in the view I take of this case, to argue the point whether, if before the promise is followed by a copula, there is a release and renunciation by the promisee, that would prevent the subsequent copula from constituting a valid marriage; for in this case the copula took place previous to the alleged renunciation. I would not, however, be understood as at all giving my opinion in favour of the [975] doctrine that even if it had been proved that the promise had been renounced between the contract and the copula, there would not be sufficient to sustain the marriage, because I am inclined to think the sounder view is, that though the renunciation might bar an action for breach of promise of marriage,—if the copula took place after renunciation, the copula would revive the promise and repeal the renunciation. Where the copula takes place subsequently to the promise it is taken to be in execution of the previous promise.

It is unnecessary to enter into the other questions which have been discussed by my noble and learned friend, with whom I entirely agree. The letter of April, connected with the letter of the 25th of January, can bear no other construction than that which he has given them. One part of the case entirely fails, namely, that which relates to the supposition of an attempted fraud on the widows fund. I think a very slight attention to the case sufficient to shew that the facts do not bear out that allegation in the smallest degree, but that the facts are most consistent with the case made by the respondent. My Lords, without entering further into the reasons, or discussing the argument used at the bar or in the court below, I am of opinion, with my noble and learned friend, that the interlocutors must be affirmed, and of course with costs.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and is hereby dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutors therein complained of be and the same are hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered, That the appellant do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondent the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal, the amount thereof to be certified by the [976] clerk assistant: And it is also further ordered, That unless the costs, certified as aforesaid, shall be paid to the party entitled to the same within one calendar month from the date of the certificate thereof, the cause shall be and is hereby remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills during the vacation, to issue such summary process or diligence for the recovery of such costs as shall be lawful and necessary.

Salmon Fishing—Statutes 1424, c. 11, etc.—Stake Nets—Evidence.—At the trial of an issue as to whether certain stake nets and other engines were placed in situations prohibited by the statutes regulating the salmon fisheries, the judge in the course of his direction to the jury, after defining estuaries as spaces between the strictly proper river and the strictly proper sea, the waters of which were partly salt and partly fresh, proceeded thus:—"The mere name is of little importance. The thing to be looked to is the fact of the absence or of the prevalence of the fresh water, though strongly impregnated by salt. Now, where this fresh water prevails, though in the estuary, these structures are illegal." The Court of Session disallowed a bill of exceptions to the [978] direction. The House of Lords reversed this judgment, and remitted the cause with directions to allow the bill of exceptions, and grant a new trial.

Question raised,—Whether it was matter for exception that a witness had been allowed during his examination to use, for the purpose of reference, a printed copy of a report, with certain jottings and calculations recently made thereon, relative to the subject of his testimony, which report he had prepared on the employment of the party adducing him as a witness:—observed, per L. C.—It is clear that for some purpose at least the witness was at liberty to refer to the paper he produced, and that a bill of exceptions could not have been supported on that ground.

By a statute of Robert I., A.D. 1318, c. 12, it is enacted thus:—"Item ordinatum est et assensum, quod omnes illi qui habent croas, vel piscarias, vel stagna aut molen-dina in aquis ubi ascendit mare et se retrahit, et ubi salmunculi vel moliti seu fria alterius generis piscium maris vel aquae dulcis descendunt et ascendunt, tales croae et machinae infrapositae sint ad minus de mensura duorum pollicum in longitudine et trium pollicum in latitudine, ita quod nulla fria piscium impediatur ascendendo vel descendendo, secundum quod libere possint ascendere et descendere ubique."

Another statute, in the reign of James I., 1424, c. 12, enacts,—“Item, It is ordanyt that all cruifis and yairs, set in fresche waters quhair the sea fillis and ebbs, the quhilk destroys the fry of all fischea, be destroyt and put away for three yeirs to cum.”

Another statute, in the reign of James III., 1469, c. 87, enacts,—“Item, for the multiplication of fish, [979] salmond, grillsis, and trowtes, quhilk are destroyed by cowpes, narrow messes, nettes, prynes, set in rivers that hes course to the sea, within the flude mark of the sea, it is advised in this instant parliament, that all sic cowpes and prynes be destroyed and put away for three ziers.”

Another statute, in the reign of James IV., 1488, c. 13, enacts,—“It is statute and ordained, that all cruifis and fisch-dammys that ar within salt watyrs quhar the sey ebbs and flows, be utterly destroyed and put down, alsweil thai belongis to our soveregn lord, as utheris throw all the realme. And as anent the cruifis in fresche waters, that they be of sic largnes and sic days keepit as is containit in the actis and statutis maid thereupon of befor.”

Another statute, in the reign of Queen Mary, 1563, c. 3, ratifies the preceding statute, with the following addition:—"That is to say, that all cruives and yairs that ar set of late upon saunds and schauldes far within the water where they were not of before, that they be incontinent, tane down, and be put away, and the remanent cruives that ar set and put upon the water sandis to stand still quhil the first day of October next to cum, and incontinent after the said first day to be destroyed and put away for ever."

In 1828 the respondent, as proprietrix of salmon fishings in the river Conon, and her tacksman, Captain Hugh Munro of Teaninich, applied to the Court of Session, by bill of suspension and interdict, against several proprietors of fishings situated to the eastward of her fishings, on the ground, that they were fishing [980] illegally within the locality described by the statutes above recited. In support of this application it was averred, that the whole expanse of water between a point at or near the town of Dingwall and the two great headlands called the Sutors, which abut upon the ocean and form the entrance to what is known as the Frith of Cromarty, was subject to the prohibitions in the said statutes.

The application was opposed by Mr. Archibald Horne, accountant in Edinburgh, judicial factor on the estate of Cromarty, situated near the Sutors; and also by M'Leod of Cadboll, Mackenzie of Newhall, and others whose fishings are situated between the Cromarty fishings and those of the respondent. By these parties it was contended, that all the water below the line of lowest ebb tide beyond which the sea never recedes, whatever shape or form the contiguous coast might assume, was excluded from the operation of the prohibitions aforesaid.

The bill of suspension was passed; and a record having been made up, issues were adjusted for all the parties in a corresponding form, but it was agreed that the issue as to the Cromarty fishings should be held as the issue for all the others, mutatis mutandis, and that their interests respectively should be determined by the result of that issue. The following accordingly was the issue sent to trial, viz. "Whether the defender, Mr. Horne, or his predecessors in office, has or have wrongfully fished for salmon in the Frith of Cromarty, opposite to the lands and estate of Cromarty and others, during the years 1824, 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828, or any part [981] thereof, by means of stake nets, bag nets, yairs, or other engines, placed in situations prohibited by statute?"

The affirmative of the issue was with the respondents, the pursuers of the action. In the course of the trial a witness for the respondents, who had been employed to make a survey of the subjects in dispute, proposed to refer to a printed paper purporting to be a report of his survey, and containing also certain manuscript jottings on the margin. This was objected to by the appellants, but the objection was overruled, and the examination proceeded.

After a variety of evidence adduced by both parties, the judge directed the jury in point of law, and a verdict was returned for the respondents.

The above ruling of the judge in respect to the evidence, and certain parts of his direction to the jury in point of law, were then made the subject of a bill of exceptions.

The first ground of exception was thus set forth in the bill:—"The counsel learned in the law for the said defenders did object to the witness having before him a printed paper, while giving his testimony. And the witness being examined as to the said printed paper, deponed, that it was a copy of a report which he had made to the pursuers on their employment, and on the margin of which he had, two days ago, made a few jottings. The witness stated that he had his original note-book with him, and these jottings are not in it, though their materials are. He could, with a little time, repeat the calculations of which these jottings consist, but he happened to make them, [982] with a view to his own explanations as a witness, on the margin of the printed copy. His report is dated 1st November 1836. It is made from his original notes, but is not a literal transcript of them; but in substance it is the same. Whereupon the said counsel for the defenders did object to the said witness being allowed, while giving his testimony, to have before him, and refer to the said printed paper, and notes written thereon, which were not made at the time of making the survey or observations with reference to the Frith of Cromarty. But the said Lord Cockburn, after looking at the said printed paper and notes, repelled the objection, whereupon the said counsel for the said defenders did then and there except to the foresaid judgment of the said Lord Cockburn, and insisted that the said George Buchanan ought not, in giving his testimony, to be allowed to have the said paper and jottings thereon before him, or to refer thereto, and that such testimony so given could not be received as legal and competent evidence."

The direction of the judge in point of law was thus set forth in the bill of exceptions:—"Now, assuming the machines to have been used, the point is, whether they were so wrongfully? There are many circumstances which might have made the use of them wrongful; but the only ground on which they can be held to have been so under these issues is, that they were placed in illegal situations. Hence the full question put to you is, whether salmon were wrongfully fished by means of these engines, 'placed in situations prohibited by law.'"

[983] "It may naturally occur to you as odd, that a question so much involved in law should be put to you. But it was unavoidable. Because, though a Court may give the legal rule, which permits or condemns these machines, according to circumstances, the determination of the circumstances, that is, of the facts, to which the rule is to be applied, is the proper province of a jury. I shall therefore begin by giving you as much of the law as is necessary, and shall then leave you, with such observations as may appear to me to be proper, to apply this law to what you shall think the true import of the evidence.

"I say as much as is necessary: for it is not necessary, for the determination of this particular case, that I should give, or attempt to give you, a catalogue or a description of all the circumstances, even of situation, under which stake-nets may be lawful, or the reverse. Many of them have no application to this case; and it is needless to encumber ourselves with legal matter that is superfluous. Nor shall I trouble you by any observations either on the history or on the policy of the law. These may be useful to lawyers, by assisting them to put the right construction on disputed statutes; but they are of little or no use after the construction of these statutes is fixed, and least of all to juries, who, without any reasoning on the subject, must take the law as they receive it from the Court.

"Now I have to lay it down to you, in the first place, that the statutes, as explained by decisions, make these machines unlawful, if they be placed in what is usually known as a river in the ordinary sense of this word. You have heard enough in this case to [984] let you know that science and investigation may discover rivers where the uninformed eye cannot or does not trace them. Of this case I shall speak instantly. All I now say is, that this apparatus is prohibited by law if it be placed in a river.

"In the second place, there are many rivers which only join the ocean through a firth or through a long land-locked valley, where the fresh and salt waters meet. In this situation it will probably depend upon external appearances,—whether ordinary observers say that the space is occupied by the sea, or by the river, or by both. If it shall be so fully and distinctly occupied by the flowing fresh water as that it is really a river, though the common river features may be periodically effaced by the tide, it comes under the preceding rule; that is, being still a river, these machines are unlawful.

"Moreover, rivers have estuaries,—that is, spaces intermediate between the strictly proper river and the strictly proper sea. Through these partly fresh and partly salt estuaries, though its ordinary river features may be impaired, or at high tides even obliterated, the river still does in truth exist and operate; though its existence be only continued among sands and shaulds through which it has to work its way, struggling with the tide. Now these structures are also unlawful in these estuaries. Not that estuaries are specially mentioned by name in the statutes, neither are friths. But the estuary is a part of the river, and is included under this word. The mere name is of little importance. The thing to be looked to is the fact of the absence or of the prevalence of the fresh water, though strongly impregnated by salt. Now, [985] where this fresh water prevails, though in the estuary, these structures are illegal; and they are not only unlawful (meaning always within the ebbing and flowing of the tide) when placed in the channel of the estuary that is always covered with water, but they are so also if they be placed on the sands which are left dry by the ebbing of the sea.

"In these two situations, viz. in the river, or in its land-locked estuary, the contrivances are illegal. There are two situations of a different description in which they are lawful.

"For, in the third place, some rivers terminate without passing through any frith or estuary, and are lost in the open ocean almost so soon as they touch the salt water. In this case stake-nets are not prohibited, if they be placed away from the immediate mouth of the river, though situated where the sea ebbs and flows. The ebbing and flowing won't of itself render them unlawful, because they may be within the sphere of this phenomenon, and yet in the pure and undoubted sea.

"In the fourth place, there are examples in which the junction of the fresh water and the salt does not take place, as in the case last put, at the edge of the open ocean, but far up in the land, where the river loses itself in arms, or in bays of the sea. These portions of the ocean become what are called arms of the sea, merely because they happen to be enclosed within ridges, which guide their waters into the interior. But this circumstance does not make these arms identical with estuaries. They are the sea. And being so, these machines, if placed in or on arms of [986] the sea, as distinguished from estuaries of rivers, are not unlawful. What shall be held to be an arm, and what an estuary, is a question of fact for you. All I say as to the rule is, that if there be an arm distinct from an estuary, then, in that arm, or, in other words, in that portion of the sea, these fixed traps are not illegal.

"The substance of these rules is nearly this, that to make the particular engines, with which we are now dealing, unlawful, it must be proved that they are in a river or in its estuary, whether within the channel or on the sands made dry by the ebbing. It is the pursuer's business to prove that they are so placed. If he shall fail, the defenders may have nothing to do. But if, not content with relying on the pursuer's failure, the defenders choose, they may shew, and they have tried to do so, that their structures are truly in the sea; whether the open sea, or on one of its arms or bays; and if so, they are lawful.

"In short, a river does not lose its legal protection, in reference to salmon fishing, merely by being met by the advancing tide, provided this be within what are called (though usually by two Latin words) the jaws of the land, and provided the relative size of the river and the other circumstances shall satisfy a jury that, on the whole, the space is river, including in this term its estuary. And, on the other hand, the sea does not lose its privileges merely because a river flows into it, or flows through one of its arms or bays where the tide ebbs and flows, provided the relative smallness of the stream and other circumstances shall satisfy a jury that, on the whole, the space is sea and [987] not river, or the continuation of a river through its estuary."

This direction was excepted to, in the first place, as being in itself erroneous; and secondly, in respect the judge "did not direct the jury, that the prohibitions of the statutes could not extend lower down than to the point where the fresh water of the river joined the salt water of the sea at low ebb tide."

The Lords of the First Division, having heard parties upon the bill of exceptions, ordered cases, and thereafter pronounced the following interlocutor:—"21st Dec. 1837.—The Lords direct the cause to be laid before the judges of the other division of the Court and the Lords Ordinary, for their opinions upon both the grounds of exception contained in this bill of exceptions, and with that view appoint the parties to put into the boxes of the said judges printed copies of said bill of exceptions, record, and cases for the parties, together with the plan of Mr. Buchanan, and that quam primum."

The consulted judges thereafter returned in writing the opinions, which are subjoined.*

* Opinions signed by Lords Justice Clerk (Boyle), Glenlee, Meadowbank, Medwyn, Fullerton, Jeffrey, and Cuninghame.

"We are of opinion, that the first ground of exception, touching the evidence of Mr. Buchanan the engineer, cannot be sustained; and that the bill, so far as rested on this ground, should therefore be disallowed.

"As to mere calculations, or statements of averages or general results, we are clearly of opinion that these might with perfect propriety have been read from or referred to by the witness, though made out immediately before his examination. If not so made out indeed they probably must have been framed and reduced to writing while the examination was going on, to the great delay and embarrassment of the proceedings.

[988] The cause having come on, on 30th June 1838, for [989] advising upon these opinions, the following judgment [990] was pronounced by the Lords of the First

"With regard again to matters of fact and observation, it is admitted that the original notes made at the time might have been competently referred to; and the witness swore distinctly, that the report, to which [988] he did refer, was made up entirely from these original notes; and, though not literally, was 'in substance the same.' The defender did not attempt to test or discredit this statement, by calling for the original notes, or by any farther examination; and the statement must therefore now be taken for true. The result is, that he spoke from a transcript of the original notes, made carefully by himself.

"As to the separate objection, that the witness referred only to a printed copy of the report, and not to the original, and that there might have been variances or errors, in printing or transcribing, we are of opinion that the defenders have not put themselves in a condition to insist on this objection, inasmuch as they have not sought to ascertain, from the witness himself, or otherwise, in what way the accuracy of the copy had been tested. The witness expressly swears, that the print before him was a copy of the report prepared by him from his original field notes; and we are of opinion this must now be taken to mean that it was a correct copy; and that, if he had been farther interrogated on the subject, he would have proved this, by specifying the collations or other means by which its correctness had been established. The defenders, we think, having proposed no such interrogatories, are not now entitled to hold that, in positively swearing that it was a copy, the witness was swearing to a fact which he had no sufficient means of knowing, or to assume the existence of variances or errors, without proof, either of their actual existence, or even of its being possible, from the way in which the copy was prepared, that they might have existed.

"The report, it should also be observed, was not laid before the jury as a piece of documentary evidence, in which case the law as to primary and secondary evidence might have applied, but was merely referred to by the witness to refresh his memory, the only proper evidence on the matters which it might contain being his own oral deposition, and nothing more.

"As to the argument in the case for the defenders, that they were at all events entitled to see the paper referred to, and to cross-examine the witness on its contents, it seems to us to be a conclusive answer, that it is nowhere stated in the bill of exceptions that they ever asked to see that paper, or proposed to go into such cross-examination; and the bill being necessarily held to set forth all the facts on which exceptions are to be raised, it is plainly incompetent for the court now to go into any other averments, even if their truth were admitted (as it is here positively denied) by the opposite party.

"We are therefore clearly of opinion, that none of the grounds of exception as to Buchanan's testimony have been established; and that the bill as to these should be dismissed.

"2. With regard to the second ground of exception, or that relating to the directions in point of law which the judge addressed to the jury on the merits of the cause, there may, at first sight, appear to be a little [989] more difficulty; but, on the fullest consideration, we have come to the opinion, that the defenders have failed on this point of the case also, and that the bill ought therefore to be disallowed in toto.

"If we were satisfied, indeed, as the defenders have contended, that the true import of the whole direction in point of law was, that wherever a river terminated in an estuary the only thing to be looked to, in determining whether stake-nets placed in such estuary were legal or illegal, was, whether there was a preponderance of salt or of fresh water at the place, we should certainly have had great difficulty in finding this to be a correct exposition of the law. But we think it manifest, that such is not the import of the direction; and that it never can be supposed that the jury took this to be its meaning.

"In the first place, there is nothing whatever in the passage referred to, as to the comparative prevalence or predominance of salt or of fresh water in a river estuary, affording the only true criterion of the legality or illegality of stake nets in such a situation. What the judge says is to be looked to is, the absence or prevalence of the fresh water only. We think it quite impossible to hold, that prevalence here means presence only; especially when such a substitution would make the direction more questionable than as it stands. The word prevalence, in fact, is too plain to admit of interpretation; and the judge told the court in consultation, that he meant it in its natural and plain sense, as equivalent to predominance.

“Now, even if we could hold (as we certainly do not) that this single passage contained the only direction in law which the judge gave to the jury, and that it could not be qualified or explained by what went before or came after, we are not prepared to say that it would have been absolutely unsound or erroneous. It was confessedly applied only to the case of a river terminating in an estuary, intra fauces terrae; and is supposed to have been given as a criterion for judging whether that estuary was sea or river, in the sense of the laws about salmon fishings. Now if, in such an estuary, there is absolutely no sensible admixture of fresh water whatever, when the tides are ebbing and flowing (and it is plain that this is the only thing that could be meant by the absence of fresh water), we can scarcely conceive a more decided proof that an estuary of such a description could not be considered as a river, in the sense of the laws referred to. On the other hand, if, during the ebbing and flowing of the tides, and in the average condition of the waters, the fresh water actually predominates, or forms more than a half of the whole, it seems almost as difficult to hold that such an estuary could ever be regarded as the sea, or an arm or branch of the sea.

“But the substantial ground on which we have come to think that this exception must be disallowed, is, that this part of the direction must clearly be taken along with all that relates to the same matter in the context; and that, when so taken, it is quite plain that the absence or prevalence of the fresh water is not meant to be held as the only thing [990] to be looked at, but only as a very material circumstance to be attended to, along with all the other circumstances from which the jury were to form their own conclusion as to the question of fact. Whether, on the whole matter, the estuary in question partook more of the character of a river or of the sea!

“That this is the way in which such a direction is to be dealt with can admit of no doubt. Detached words are not to be separated from the context, nor inaccurate or imperfect expressions caught at, to obscure or apparently contradict, what every one must have seen to be the clear meaning of the whole, when taken together. There are other instances, perhaps, of such expressions in the direction now in question; as, where the judge, after describing estuaries merely as spaces intermediate between the proper river and the proper sea, and where salt and fresh water are mingled, says generally, and apparently without limitation, that such engines as the defenders’ ‘are unlawful in these estuaries.’—But though this seems to be absolutely stated as law, it is plain from what follows, that nothing more is meant than that they may be unlawful in such situations; for very soon after comes the passage so much relied on, where it is said that they are only unlawful, though in an estuary, if the fresh water prevails or preponderates, but not unlawful if there are indications of any fresh water, though in an estuary. The correction or qualification of the inaccurate expression follows here a little more closely after that expression than in the case now in dispute; but we think it is, in the last case, if possible, still more complete and decisive.

“In the first place, the judge states distinctly, in the very beginning of his exposition, that the law ‘permits or condemns those machines according to circumstances; and that the determination of these circumstances is the proper province of the jury.’ He then informs them, that in a proper river they are clearly unlawful;

* Further Opinions at advising (30th June 1838), by Judges of First Division:—

Lord President.—Two points were raised on this bill of exceptions: (1.) one in regard to Buchanan’s evidence; in regard to it we all agree; but there is another question, viz. (2.) as to the law contained in the charge. As to it, seven judges adhere, and Lord Moncreiff concurs, with an explanation, and Lord Cockburn adheres to his previous opinion.

[992] Mr. Horne and Mr. Mackenzie of Newhall appealed.

[993] Appellants.—(1st exception.) Although the appellants admit that Mr.

and proceeds to state the effect of their being in an estuary, in the way already referred to. He then speaks to the case of an arm of the sea, which has this much in common with an estuary, that it is intra fauces terrae; and distinctly tells them that what should be held to be an arm of the sea, and not an estuary, is a question of fact for them. But the most important and decisive passage is that which closes the whole direction, and in which, professedly resuming the whole substance of what had been previously said, and apparently for the very purpose of removing ambiguities or supplying defects, he again recurs, though in a different form of expression, to the absence or prevalence of the fresh water, but takes care, in this final summing up, to state, twice over, that it is not the only thing to be looked to, but is always to be taken along with the whole other circumstances of the case. The words are: 'In short, a river does not lose its legal protection merely by being met by the advancing tide, provided (1) that this be within what are called the jaws of the land, and provided (2) that the relative size of the river, [991] and (3) the other circumstances, shall satisfy a jury, that on the whole the space is river, including in this term its estuary; and on the other hand, the sea does not lose its privileges merely because a river flows into it, or flows through one of its arms or bays, where the tide ebbs and flows, provided (1) the relative smallness of the stream, and (2) the other circumstances, shall satisfy a jury, that on the whole the space is sea, and not river, or the continuation of a river through its estuary.'

"After this, it seems to us impossible to doubt that, when it was previously said that 'the thing to be looked to' was the absence or prevalence of fresh water, it was only meant, and must have been understood by all who heard the direction to the end, that it was 'the great or principal thing,' but to be taken into view along with all the other circumstances; not, in short, a legal or exclusive criterion, but merely a very important element in judging of the complex question of river, estuary, or sea. It is to be observed, that it is not said, even in the previous passage, to be the only thing to be looked to, but simply that it is the thing—a form of expression quite common for signifying the chief thing; as, when it is said that the thing to be looked to in a witness is veracity, or in a lawyer skill or learning; these expressions certainly could never be conceived to imply, that intelligence or exact memory was of no consequence in the former, or honour or honesty in the other. If the passage therefore stood unexplained by any other we should think that this was its fair meaning; but when the whole direction is resumed and summed up, in the anxious and accurate words which we have cited, we think there is not even a pretext for saying, that there could be any doubt or mistake about the matter.

"We are also very clearly of opinion, that the law as suggested in the bill of exceptions is not that which it was the duty of the judge to state to the jury as applicable to the case before them."

"I also concur in the second part of it, but with the following explanation: Taking the charge as an entire whole, and looking to the substance and result of it, I think that it amounts to this, that in this question the estuary of a river is to be considered as a part of the river; that stake-nets placed in such an estuary are illegal; and that the question, whether the particular place or part of the water condescended on is in the estuary of the river or in the sea, is a question of fact for the consideration of the jury, depending on all the various circumstances which may

Lord Gillies.—As the judge who presided at the trial has explained his meaning to be, that in using the expression "prevalence" of fresh water he meant by it predominance, I agree in the main with him; but if he had meant, as I understood it from the charge, to be mere presence of fresh water, I certainly could never agree, because in that way any body of salt water must be held to be a river, if the presence of any portion of fresh water could be detected. We could not stop short after

Buchanan was entitled to refresh [994] his memory in regard to the observations made by him while employed in his survey, he could only do so from authentic have been brought before them in evidence. Viewing it in this light, I have come to be of opinion that the observations made, or the mere form of expression employed, in pointing out any of the particular circumstances requiring attention, ought not to be regarded as laying down to the jury any unbending rule of law, in opposition to the whole scope and very precise conclusion of the charge, so as in any manner to control or fetter the judgment of the jury on the question of fact expressly left to their determination on the whole evidence; and therefore that supposing that there may be some inaccuracy of expression, according to the opinion of the court, in the particular passage of the charge excepted to, in so far as the learned judge may seem to have attached more weight than is justly due to one particular circumstance, as a test of the stake-nets being in the estuary of the river and not in the sea, that does not afford a good ground of exception to the charge generally, in so far as it is a charge on the law of the case.

"But I think it necessary to qualify my concurrence by observing, that in so far as it may be held to be laid down or strongly implied in the above opinion, that if that part of the charge wherein it is said, that, in the question whether it is the estuary of the river or not, 'the thing to be looked to is the fact of the absence or prevalence of the fresh water, though strongly impregnated by salt; now, where this fresh water prevails, though in the estuary, these structures are illegal,' had stood alone as the substance of the charge, it would not have been liable to exception. I cannot agree in that opinion, because I think that the fact thus rested on is both in its nature exceedingly loose, as affording any legal or decisive rule in the question, and even when definitely ascertained is not such a test as could invariably or in all circumstances lead a jury to a correct result.

"But being on the whole inclined to think that that particular part of the charge ought not to be so considered, I am, on full consideration, of opinion that the exception should be disallowed.

"I have no doubt that the law suggested in the bill of exceptions is not that which, consistently with the decisions, it could be the duty of the judge to lay down to the jury."

Lord Cockburn.—"I have only to state, that the construction put upon the charge in the preceding opinion gives it the meaning which it was intended to convey; and that, thus understood, I have not seen ground for thinking it wrong."

that, and refuse to call the Frith of Forth a river; and indeed in that way the Mediterranean would become a river, or estuary of the Nile.

Lord Mackenzie.—On the whole, I am inclined to adhere to the opinions delivered.

Lord President.—I have gone over the whole of the statutes referred to. Some of them talk of salt waters, and others of waters, and fresh water that ebbs and flows, and so much confusion prevails in the mode of expression, that it is exceedingly difficult to make sense of any one act.

Lord Corehouse.—I certainly agree with the opinions of the consulted judges, but under the explanation given by Lord Moncreiff. It did not appear to me that it would be just to set aside the verdict of the jury because the charge referred to the prevalence of fresh water, as I did not consider that the prevalence of salt or fresh water was the chief circumstance to be regarded, and I don't think that this was decided in the Tay or other cases. There were other matters in the charge, on which the jury may have proceeded. Therefore, with the caution contained in the charge, I am inclined to hold that we cannot allow the exception to the law; for I consider the law in the charge to have been properly ruled, and it appears to me that the charge is exceedingly well expressed, and I agree that it was a most fitting question for a jury.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur with what has just been expressed by Lord Corehouse: and I ought to have said previously, that it is entirely under the explanation given by Lord Moncreiff that I coincide in the opinions of the other judges. I think the explanation of Lord Moncreiff is very necessary.

Dean of Faculty moved for expenses.

sources. It was not competent for him to refer, in regard to this matter, to an elaborate report prepared by him at the distance of months. He neither consulted, nor proposed to consult, his field-book, or even his original report. All that he looked at was a printed paper, of which the appellants neither knew nor were allowed to know any thing, but which they were told was a printed copy of the report. To sanction a reference to such a document by a witness when under examination is a latitude hitherto unknown in practice. There are many intermediate stages between the principal copy and the print, in all of which there is much likelihood of error; a manuscript copy must, in the first place, be made from the principal, and a printed copy from the manuscript. It is impossible to tell how many errors there may have been in the manuscript, and how many additional errors in the print. There was not a [995] vestige of evidence to show that either the manuscript or the print had been compared with the original or with each other. What apology was there for Mr. Buchanan reading from a document, which, as regards authenticity, was utterly worthless, more especially as it must be presumed that the best evidence, viz. the field-books and original notes, were within his reach? The very circumstance that the report contains a detail of many observations and many results in numbers, is one of the strongest reasons that can be urged for the strictest enforcement of all the rules as to authentication. It cannot be supposed that Mr. Buchanan could carry in his memory all those numerical results, and it was therefore impossible for him to check the accuracy of the copy. Blunders might pass unnoticed, and he might give in evidence with the utmost bona fides, on the strength of the printed report, results and observations totally at variance with the truth. It would be dangerous in the extreme to put testimony in jeopardy by such laxity of procedure. Even supposing the report had been duly authenticated, it cannot be regarded otherwise than a plan, a book, or a deed, and ought to have been produced eight days before the trial (Act of Sederunt, 29th Nov. 1825, s. 29). In this way it might be made evidence, but it would be both unwarrantable and inex-

Lord Gillies.—This has been a question of very great difficulty indeed. So I do not see why you should get your expenses. It is not the ordinary case where you would be entitled to expenses. Indeed, I consider that the result is contrary, not only to justice, but it is contrary to common sense, to make a river of the Cromarty Frith.

Lord Mackenzie.—I certainly am against allowing expenses, for it was a question attended with great difficulty.

Lord Corehouse.—I should rather be inclined to give expenses. There was a very ingenious argument by Mr. Solicitor General, but I think after the decision in the Tay case it was clearly made out to my mind that the law in the charge was well laid down by the presiding judge. So I think expenses should be given, and that too where the judges are so unanimous.

Lord Gillies.—I cannot think that the case was so clear, for we took the opinions of the other judges after ordering cases. I cannot think it is right to say that the case was clear.

Dean of Faculty.—They may be reserved till the issue of the motion for a new trial; but the practice has always been to give expenses to the gaining party where the exceptions in a bill are disallowed.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am not for laying it down as a rule abstractly, that in no circumstances should we allow expenses after advising a bill of exceptions; but certain circumstances may arise in consequence of which we may take the reason of the thing into view, and I don't think here that we ought to give expenses, from the difficulty attending the case.

Lord Corehouse.—I am far from laying down any inflexible rule; but it did appear to me that the law was clear, and that after an unanimous opinion of the whole judges sustaining the charge expenses should follow.

Lord President.—I rather concur with Lord Corehouse, that the expenses should be given, as I was inclined to think that the matter was decided in the Tay case.

Lord Mackenzie.—I must say I am against giving expenses.

Lord Gillies.—So am I; and as that is the case the point will require to be sent to the consulted judges.

pedient to allow a witness to give his testimony from what ought (if admissible at all) to have been treated as documentary evidence. It gives him an advantage which no witness whatever is entitled to claim. The ordinary rules of evidence afford the strongest analogy on this subject. There is no rule in practice better settled, than that secondary evidence will not be admitted, where the best may be obtained. And [996] it is a familiar illustration of this rule, that the copy of a document can never be given in evidence, when the principal document is within reach, or at all events, never without a due authentication of the copy. Thus, if a party tendered in evidence a printed copy of a charter, without any verification of it, while the principal could have been obtained without difficulty, is it not a matter of trite law, that it would be instantly rejected? A common case is that of a shorthand-writer's notes. To prove what occurred on a former occasion, one is not bound to produce his notes; but the usual course is, to call the shorthand-writer, and ask him if he had made a transcript from the original. If the opposite counsel object to the transcript, the shorthand-writer must read from the original. The same may be said in regard to entries made in a ledger from a waste-book. Whatever a person sees, and commits to writing, either in his own or the handwriting of another, at the time when the transaction is fresh in his mind, may be used. But a witness cannot refer to a paper made subsequently to the time when the matter was under his consideration. The question is not, as put by the consulted judges, whether the copy is accurate or not accurate, but between a copy and the original. A witness who is compelled to apply to documents in order to aid his memory is as apt to be misled by errors in an unauthenticated copy, which may give a false colour to his whole testimony, as where the documents themselves are tendered as matters of direct evidence to the jury.

(2d exception.)—The direction is objectionable in respect it lays down that stake nets are forbidden in estuaries, and at the same time defines or attempts to define the forbidden locality as consisting in the pre-[997]-valence of fresh water, although neither the term nor definition used are to be found in any of the enactments on the subject. The question is not within what locality is there the presence, the prevalence, or the absence of fresh water; but the question is, what is meant by the term aquae, as distinguished from the term mare, i.e. what is the aqua within which the sea ascendit et se retrahit. The meaning of the term has been established, by a totally different criterion from that given by the learned judge, by our standard institutional writers (post, p. 1017). But not only so; in the Don case (post, p. 1017), the Lord Chancellor, in reviewing the salmon fishing statutes, comes to the following conclusion:—"Taking the latter acts in connexion with the earlier acts, and the whole subject together, construing one with the other, I think I am justified in recommending to your Lordships to come to the conclusion that the whole body of the acts, taken together, refer not to the sea coast, but to rivers and to continuations of rivers. And therefore I should recommend to your Lordships to confirm the judgment of the Court, as far as relates to the construction of those acts of parliament."

That the term aquae denominates the river can therefore no longer be disputed. But it also includes the continuation of the river; and what is the continuation of the river, as distinguished from the river, but that part of the river which continues to flow after the sea has receded from it. This definition corresponds precisely with the term ostium fluminis, which, in the Spey case (as stated by Lord Kames) (post, p. 1017), this House judged to [998] comprehend the space betwixt the lowest ebb and the highest flood mark. Even if the learned judge, in using the term estuary, meant to indicate the ostium fluminis, his definition was clearly at variance with the legal one. A river ceases to be a river or the continuation of a river when it ceases to descend to the level of the sea. [Lord Chancellor.—At low or high water?] At low water.

But again, there is a further criterion by which to determine the forbidden territory. The statute says also, "ubi salmunculi," etc. (ante, p. 978). The avowed object of the prohibition was to protect the fry. This demonstrates how anxiously the attention of the legislature had been directed to this subject. They had observed, that the cruives and yairs set in rivers were very injurious to the salmon fry in their descent to the sea. This was the great evil complained of. But farther, the other facts connected with the natural history of salmon could not have escaped their observation. At first the fry keep the shallow water about the sides of the river; but as their strength increases they are seen on the middle of the river descending with the stream. The first flood or fresh which occurs at this period hurries them to that part of the river affected by the tide which is protected by the statutes, where for a time they remain in the tideway, ascending and descending with the flux and reflux of the tide, till, having gained additional strength, they at once sink down into the bed or channel of the sea or firth, and go off to the ocean. They do not swim about the shallow parts of the firth, but proceed at once to the ocean from the place where the river joins the sea [999] at low ebb. Their natural instinct seems to lead them to select the deep water at that point, because they are more secure from interruption or disturbance, occasioned by the ripple arising from the constant flux and reflux of the tide. Experience and observation would shew to the early Scottish legislators that yairs or other stationary engines could not obstruct the descent of the fry below the line of low ebb tide.

Looking to the declared object as well as to the express provisions of the statute, —to the habits of the salmon as well as to the leading features connected with the flux and reflux of the tide,—that no line can be pointed out, the boundaries of which quadrate so nearly with the enactment, as that contended for by the appellants. Below the line of low ebb tide the sea never recedes. It never withdraws itself. It constantly occupies and holds possession of that space. Above that point the contending influence of the river becomes apparent. There is a periodical balance between the force of the ascending tide and that of the descending fresh water stream, which maintains the river in a state of comparative quietude, certainly favourable to the motion of the fry, "ascendendo et descendendo ubique." Within that locality it may be said that the fishings are in aquis ubi ascendit mare et se retrahit; and it may be said, with equal truth and accuracy, that they are situated ubi salmunculi vel smolti ascendunt et descendunt; and where such fry and smolts, when they approach the sides, would be interrupted in their course and destroyed.

Much reliance seemed to be placed by the respondent on the statute of James IV., 1448, c. 13 (ante, p. 979). The parti-[1000]-cular sorts of apparatus mentioned in that statute of themselves sufficiently indicate the local situations referred to. It is on all hands admitted as the very essence of a cruive-fishing, that there be a mound or dike stretched across the river from side to side, and it follows of course that such fisheries must be peculiar to rivers properly so called. The same thing is equally true of what are called fish dammys. A dam is a mole or bank to confine water. A fish dam is therefore a mound erected across the stream for the purpose of intercepting and catching the fish, by means of some apparatus of the nature of a cruive inserted into it. But such an erection, it is obvious, could be made only in rivers by cutting the stream across from bank to bank. When, therefore, by this statute it was ordained that all cruives and fish-dams should be destroyed, "that ar within salt watrys, quhar the sey ebbis and flowis," the epithet "salt" must have been introduced merely for the purpose of contradistinguishing those fisheries from the "cruiffis in fresch waterys;" that is, in the higher parts of rivers where the tide does not reach, to which a different class of regulations were to be applicable. In this view the lower portion of a river, ubi ascendit mare et se retrahit, may, without any violence or impropriety, be denominated the salt part of a river; for with every return of the tide, its own proper fresh water is not merely re-stagnated, but is also strongly impregnated with the salt water of the ocean, which then flows into it. That "the salt waters" of this statute do not mean the salt waters of the sea itself, is abundantly obvious from the structure of the remaining clause, "quhar the sey ebbis and flowis." It is impossible, indeed, to read the whole clause, without being [1001] satisfied that these words are used in contradistinction to each other. They cannot be read as implying the same thing, without involving an absurdity. To say that cruives and fish dams are prohibited in the sea where the sea ebbs and flows, is ludicrous; for it is the characteristic of all sea, that it is always in a state of ebb or flow. It is clear, therefore, that the term "salt waters" was employed to denote something different from the sea; and it is equally clear that this prohibition cannot extend below the line of low ebb-tide; because the engines here denounced cannot, from the very nature of their construction, be erected below it.

The Tay case (post, p. 1017) proceeds on specialties. One important specialty is, that it went entirely upon the terms of the statute 1581, c. 15, which, in appointing conservators for the protection of the fishings, fixed the limits within which this protection was to extend. Another important specialty was the fact of the bar of the river being below the Drumly Sands; whereas, in the present case, there is no bar or alluvial deposit below the town of Dingwall. The non-existence of yairs in the Tay was also strongly relied on. The extent therefore to which fishing by yairs has been carried in the Frith of Cromarty, while it demonstrates the general understanding in favour of their legality in these localities, serves to distinguish it from the case of the Tay in one of its most important features. The last but not the least important of these specialties is rested on the title deeds of the several proprietors. If the Court had not been satisfied as to the position of "the natural bar of the river," and if there had not been before them any evidence of the existence [1002] of a special office of conservator for the protection of the salmon of the river, and if in other respects the case had been presented as a perfectly pure and abstract case of legal construction on the statutes themselves, who can take it upon him to say what would have been the decision of the Court in the Tay case? None of the other decisions referred to in the slightest degree interfere with the interpretation of the prohibited locality above contended for. But, apart from this, the respondents have examined the whole of the cases with the utmost minuteness, and they affirm, without fear of contradiction, that throughout these multifarious processes, beginning with the Tay and proceeding onwards to the South-Esk, the Don, the Beaully, the Dornoch, and the Nith (post, p. 1017), there is not a finding in any interlocutor, or even the opinion of a single judge, which sanctions the notion now promulgated as law for the first time, that the absence or prevalence of fresh water is the thing to be looked at in determining what waters fall under the statutory prohibitions. In not one of them was it laid down that this was the test to be adopted.

But again, the arguments of the respondents, as well as the proceedings on the bench in considering the bill of exceptions, show distinctly that it will admit of a doubt whether the expressions used by the learned judge import presence or prevalence of fresh water. If this be so, the direction given was not a fitting direction for a jury. From its obscurity it was calculated to mislead them. What was stated had been so misapprehended, that reference was actually made to the learned judge for an explanation of his meaning. But the jury [1003] had got no such explanation; and who can tell what construction they had put upon the expressions?

(2d branch.)—If the interpretation of the statutes above contended for be the true one, it follows of course that the learned judge should have directed the jury that the prohibitions of the statute could not extend lower than the confluence of the river with the sea at low ebb tide.

Respondents.—(1st exception.) The objection to Mr. Buchanan's examination clearly rests upon an attempt to confound the different objects and purposes for which a witness may refer to a manuscript. Reference to manuscript to enable a witness to speak correctly as to facts, is altogether different from the object and purpose Mr. Buchanan had in view, and hence the authorities referred to on the other side do not apply. Measurements, soundings, etc., are not occurrences or facts as to which a witness is to speak from recollection. Whether the witness saw strata or rocks of a particular character in the course of his survey, whether he found sea-weed or marine plants, etc., in different parts of the frith, these may be matters of fact as to which he is either to speak from recollection or from notes made at the time. But measurements, soundings, analyses of water, etc., are not matters of recollection at all. They are the witness's experiments, and if the witness has before him that which he deposes to be the record of such experiments, it is not for the purpose of refreshing his recollection that he refers to the paper, but of enabling him to report to the Court the experiment made by the witness, and which the court and jury could not see made.

[1004] Again, if from a variety of soundings an average is to be struck and stated, such calculation is not the recollection of an occurrence, and in using materials for giving that calculation, the witness is not refreshing his memory, but he is reporting to the court and the jury that which he himself had previously done, instead of making the calculation on the spot. In fact the calculation was not made at all at the time of making his survey and taking his field notes. The rule that a copy of a document cannot be taken when the principal document exists, has no application to this case. There is no question as to the admissibility of documents; there is no document sent to the jury; there is a witness before the jury. He has before him a report or document entirely of his own creation, made for the sake of accuracy, and as the result of scientific inquiry. He has with him the original rough notes from which that report is prepared; and why should he not refer to that which is in substance the same, and which for the sake of convenience and ready reference has been printed? It is ridiculous to liken this to the tender of a printed copy of a charter instead of the charter itself. That would be a muniment wholly independent of the witness. The notes and report, on the other hand, were made by the witness for the sake of giving evidence. It is of the very nature of this kind of evidence that it must be so got up. The notes are not the evidence, like the charter; they are ancillary to the testimony of the witness given by parole, which parole testimony is the matter, and the only matter put in evidence. The witness speaks partly by recollection and knowledge, abstracted from his notes and report, and partly from the aid of that report. He knows [1005] the truth of his statement, and he knows the accuracy of his report. He may have erred in his calculations when he made them on the field,—he may have erred when he checked them in his closet. But this is nothing more than an observation on his accuracy, which is quite open to make to the jury, or in the motion for a new trial, but is wholly unavailing as matter of legal exception.

(2d exception.)—The Spey case (post, p. 1017) has no bearing whatever upon the present discussion; the question there was not as to the interpretation of the statutes, but as to the meaning of a term used to denote the boundary of certain fishings in a river by private grant. Assuming that the term "ostium fluminis" was rightly defined in that case, it merely denotes the termination of the river proper; there is an expanse of water between the proper river and the sea; i.e. between the ostium fluminis and the sea proper, which is also part of the forbidden territory. It may be true, as has been stated, that in the Don case (post, p. 1017) this expanse of water has been denominated the continuation of the river; but it does not on that account follow, that it is not distinguishable from the river proper. So far as that case went the question was just as open as before, what is and what is not the continuation of the river. The words used in the statute are, not "in rivers," but "in aquis." This is something different from the river proper, and the defenders are right in saying that it was fixed in the Don case (post, p. 1017) to be something different from the sea proper. It is in waters where the sea ascends and draws itself back. Surely this does not mean the point of low water ebb. It means in waters where the sea is filling and ebbing. There must be river, and [1006] there must be sea. But if there be both in the valley or channel, and if the sea is ebbing and flowing within that valley, this is all that is required to characterize the prohibited ground. The statute is intended to describe the space both upwards and downwards, and if it be water where the sea ascends and descends—ebbs and flows—this is all that the act requires. The sea proper is excluded, because although it ebbs and flows upon the open coast, "ascendit et se retrahit," it does not ebb and flow "in aquis."

But, say the appellants, it is not only where the sea fills and ebbs, it is also "ubi salmunculi" (ante, p. 979), etc. Now, how can this apply to the point of the lowest ebbing of the tide? It is where not only salmon fry, but the fry of all other fish, whether of the sea or of the fresh water, descend and ascend. The fry of salmon, in point of fact, never ascend. When the salmon come up to spawn, or when the fry come down, they regulate their motions in no degree by the point of the lowest ebb. On the other hand, do the fry of sea fish, which are equally protected by the statute, come up where they could not exist.

Again, in the statute 1488, c. 13 (ante, p. 979), the expression "salt" is used in contrast to the "fresche watteris." The salt water cannot mean the river, it clearly means something different from both the river and the sea proper. In which of the statutes is it set forth, that the confluence of the river and the salt water at the low ebb is the boundary of the prohibited territory towards the sea? Had an inflexible rule been fixed, such as that contended for on the other side, the matter ought not to have been settled by a jury trial at all. Besides, the point fixed on by the appellants is one to be disclosed by the ingenuity [1007] of modern science, not known or capable of being acted on in a comparatively rude age, when the statutes on this subject were passed; and it would lead to results of a most startling description, as applicable to various rivers,—results for which no reason either in law or sound policy can be assigned.

The general position contended for by the appellants, was expressly and solemnly overruled in the Tay case (post, p. 1017). It was so completely overruled, that the Court, finding that there was no exclusive test, were obliged as a jury to enter into consideration of the whole circumstances of the case, and to fix the boundaries as to that frith, within which the stake-nets were illegal. That case has been regarded ever since in Scotland as a leading case on this subject. The same rule was followed in the case of the Clyde in 1813 (post, p. 1017)—of the South Esk (post, p. 1017)—of the Beaully (post, p. 1017) and the Dornoch (post, p. 1017) in 1817 and 1818,—and then followed the Don (post, p. 1017) case, in which it was held that stake-nets were not illegal in the sea proper, as contrasted with rivers, friths, or estuaries, or continuations of rivers. The whole train of decisions, therefore, has conclusively fixed that stake-nets, although legal in the sea, are unlawful in rivers or estuaries: and whether any particular place is to be held as forming part of a river or frith, estuary, or continuation of a river, on the one hand,—or part of the sea proper on the other,—is a question depending on a variety of circumstances connected with the locality, which question is fitted for the determination of a jury. It has been ruled over and over again, that there is no fixed and absolute criterion which in law determines whether the place be a prohibited place or not, and it [1008] has been specially determined that the meeting of the salt and fresh waters at low ebb is not a criterion which is adapted for determining the legality or illegality of the position of stake-nets.

The presiding judge properly and legally directed the jury to take into view the whole circumstances proved in evidence. His Lordship treated it throughout as a question of circumstances. He did not state that the absence or presence of fresh water, although a circumstance of material importance, was to form the rule, or to exclude from consideration other material circumstances. The direction throughout was abundantly clear and explicit, and in no respect whatever calculated to mislead. It was the duty of the judge to give the jury some direction to guide them in their finding, whether the places in question were within the estuary of the Canon or not. The consideration of the quality of the water, whether salt or fresh, its existence in certain quantities, more or less,—was but an ingredient in the investigation, and had only been so put to the jury. No difficulty had been raised by the jury. It did not appear that the judge was asked by the court to give any explanation of the sense in which he had used the expression, in order to solve any doubt which the consulted judges had as to the sense in which the words were used, or as to the jury rightly apprehending the import and meaning of the words, coupled with the whole charge, but rather with the view of satisfying their own minds by the authoritative declaration of the judge as to the actual res gestae on the trial.

(2d branch.)—Had the learned judge directed the jury in the terms suggested by the appellant, it is clear from what is above stated, that his direction would have [1009] been directly at variance with the established law of Scotland.

Lord Chancellor (16th April).—My Lords, this case seems to be one of very considerable importance, both as to the question upon the evidence, and upon the merits.

As to the point of evidence, this case lays down a rule which will have the effect of securing a uniform practice, in the course of proceeding in the courts of Scotland, similar to that which prevails in the courts in this country. The results of this case however do not depend upon this rule.

With respect to the principle which has been discussed in reference to the main question, it is one of very considerable importance, and the property in these salmon-fisheries is of very considerable magnitude. I cannot but think that a great deal of difficulty has arisen from the introduction of terms very difficult of definition, nowhere to be found in the statute. Arguments are used, and discussions take place, upon the meaning of the word “estuary,” and even upon what is the meaning of the word “river;” and neither of these words is to be found in the statutes. The matter of law involved is neither more nor less than the construction to be put upon the statutes; and to that extent the party had a right to have the opinion of the learned judge. Whether the particular water in question in the particular suit does or not come within the definition, (if any definition can be found,) is matter very properly within the province of the jury.

The first question will be, whether your Lordships can, by any reasonable rule of construction, drawn from the statutes themselves, at once ascertain whether the [1010] learned judge has accurately explained to the jury the definition to be fairly inferred from the provisions of these statutes. If your Lordships find that has not been the case, however desirable it may be to lay down the rule, it is not the province of your Lordships to do so, and it may not be safe to attempt it. The point is, whether the rule laid down is the proper rule, within the meaning of the act.

If there had been no decisions of your Lordships' House, and it had been a new question, and merely turned upon the observations of the learned judge, compared with what appears to have been the objects of the statutes, your Lordships might not feel it necessary to postpone the further consideration of this matter. But, my Lords, that is far from being the fact: much litigation has taken place; and your Lordships' House has proceeded to adjudication upon cases similar to the present; and, in any course your Lordships may think fit to take, it is undoubtedly most important to ascertain the course adopted by this House when the former cases were brought before it.

In order to proceed accurately in the examination of what has been done upon this subject, I should propose to adjourn the further consideration of this case to a future day.

Further consideration adjourned.

Lord Chancellor (26th August).—My Lords, this appeal is from a judgment of the Court of Session disallowing a bill of exceptions. The whole case, therefore, must be found within the bill of exceptions; and the question is, whether the direction of the learned judge to the jury was right in law.

[1011] The issue was: "Whether the defender, or his predecessors in office, has or have wrongfully fished for salmon in the Firth of Cromarty, opposite to the lands and estate of Cromarty and others, during the years 1824, 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828, or during any part thereof, by means of stake-nets, bag-nets, yairs, or other engines, placed in situations prohibited by statute."

These latter words comprehend the whole question; viz., what are the situations prohibited by statute? If it was the duty of the House to lay down a rule upon this subject, and to prescribe the principles upon which this question ought to be tried, it would be necessary to consider carefully, not only the words of the statute, but the various decisions which have taken place. That, however, is not, at this stage of the cause, the duty of this House, nor would it be proper to do so. All that this House has to consider is, whether the rule, as laid down to the jury by the learned judge, was correct.

That learned judge, after mentioning that estuaries were spaces intermediate between the strictly proper river and the strictly proper sea, and that they were partly fresh and partly salt, stated that the structures in question were unlawful in those estuaries, and then proceeded thus: "The thing to be looked to is the fact of the absence or of the prevalence of the fresh water, though strongly impregnated by salt. Now, where this fresh water prevails, though in the estuary, these structures are illegal."

The learned judge, when the case came before the court upon the bill of exceptions, stated, that by the word "prevails," he meant "predominates;" but the question is, not what he intended, but what the terms [1012] used were calculated to impress upon the jury. The word "prevalence" is put in opposition to "absence;" if it meant "predominates," why were the words added, "though strongly impregnated by salt?" In speaking of the predominance of one thing over another, the presence of the minor is assumed; but absence and predominance are not properly put in contradistinction. Predominance, therefore, if necessary to the proposition, should have been distinctly expressed in terms.

That the jury understood the term to mean presence I have no doubt, for such is the natural construction of the sentence; and the respondents, in their printed case

(see page 26 of printed Appeal Case for respondents), (signed by three most learned persons,) insist that such is the true construction of the sentence. After quoting the sentence, inter alia, they say, "In doing justice to the meaning of these sentences, it is plain from the context, that the word prevalence must mean presence, which is one of the most common and most appropriate significations of the word, as opposed to the expression absence; and the meaning of the whole is just this, that in estuaries, where these structures are unlawful, there is always some portion of fresh water."

The word prevalence then, as used by the learned judge, was by the respondents understood as presence; the consulted judges however say, that it is quite impossible to hold that prevalence means presence only; Lord Gillies says expressly, that if prevalence was to be understood as mere presence, he could not agree to the direction.

From this, I think, it may be assumed, that if the [1013] word presence had been used instead of the word prevalence, the court would have held the direction to be erroneous, as, beyond all doubt, it would have been. But the judges seem to have been influenced by the explanation of the term used by the learned judge who directed the jury, as if the question were, whether the judge was right in his view of the law, instead of being, what it really and solely is, whether the direction was in terms calculated to lead the jury to a right understanding of the law. I have no doubt but that the jury understood the word prevalence to mean presence, and that, so understood, the direction was erroneous. Let it, however, be assumed that it means predominance, I think it scarcely less erroneous.

The consulted judges say, that if they were satisfied that the true import of the whole direction, in point of law, was, that the only thing to be looked to was, whether there was a preponderance of salt or of fresh water at the place, they should certainly have had great difficulty in finding it to be a correct exposition of the law; and the Lords Moncreiff and Cockburn say, that if the sentence had stood alone as the substance of the charge, it would have been liable to exception; and Lords Corehouse and Mackenzie say, that they did not consider that the prevalence of salt or fresh water was the chief circumstance to be regarded.

I quite agree with the consulted judges and others, who thought, that if the direction was to be considered as implying, that the fact of the absence or predominance of fresh water was the only thing to be looked to, or, in other terms, was the thing upon which in their opinion the verdict was to be founded, it would be erroneous; but I totally differ from them in thinking [1014] that such is not the natural and obvious construction and meaning of the words used. The question is, not what was the meaning of the author of these words, to be collected from different passages, but what effect the words spoken were calculated to produce upon the jury. And when we find that they were told, that the thing to be looked to was the fact of the presence or of the prevalence of fresh water, it must be assumed that they understood that such was the test upon which they were to try the question between the parties.

But were it otherwise, if the words imported only that this was an important subject for consideration, I could not agree that the direction would be sound in point of law. I see nothing in the statutes, or in any authority, to justify the putting the legality or illegality of the act upon such a test; and on principle there is nothing to support it. If this were the test, the legality of the act at any particular place would depend upon the state of the tide, and the right of fishing would belong to one party at high tide, and to another at low tide. Suppose a small river flowing into a large estuary, at low water there might at any particular place be scarcely any salt water, whereas at high water the presence of fresh water might be scarcely perceptible. Whereas in a large river the fresh water might predominate long after the junction with the sea. The large rivers of America are perceptible at a great distance from the shore, and in the Mediterranean ships take in their water from the Rhone in the open sea. The test suggested is therefore, I think, erroneous, whether it be treated as exclusive, or as an important ingredient in the consideration of the question.

If your Lordships should agree with me in this view [1015] of the direction of the learned judge, it follows that the bill of exceptions ought to have been allowed, and that the judgment of the court below ought therefore to be reversed. It is therefore unnecessary, and would be improper, to pronounce any opinion or decision as to what ought to have been the direction. But as there is much of uncertainty in the decisions which have taken place, and much doubt appears to exist as to the proper rule to be followed, I think it may be useful to throw out some suggestions, to which those who may have to decide upon the merits of this and other similar cases, in the first instance, will give such weight as they may think them entitled to.

The statute of Robert the First, in the year 1318, speaks of waters in which the sea rises and falls, and in which the fish descend and ascend. The waters mentioned must be distinct from the sea, and this the Don case (Earl of Kintore v. Forbes and others, post, p. 1017) has established. They must also be waters above the level of the sea, at least at low water, because otherwise the sea could not rise in them, nor would the fish, having the level of the sea, be said to ascend in such waters.

In the subsequent statutes the expressions vary, but it being decided that none of these include the sea proper, I do not apprehend that they in fact extend the limits beyond those prescribed by the statute of Robert the First.

In those waters which are above the point at which the river reaches the level of the sea at low tide, all the circumstances described in the statute of Robert the [1016] First concur, but in no others. Down to the point of low tide the waters of the river descend, but no further. Into these waters the sea rises, and the fish ascend, which cannot be said of any part beyond that point. This also is a point capable of being ascertained with much precision. The definitions in Lord Stair, Lord Bankton, and Mr. Erskine, coincide very much with this view of the case; and the decisions of the House of Lords, in the case of The Earl of Moray v. The Duke of Gordon, (Spey case,) deciding that the "ostium fluminis" comprehended that space betwixt the lowest ebb and the highest flood mark, and in Lord Kintore v. Forbes, (Don case,) seem strongly to confirm their authority. Finding, however, that the learned judges of the court below rejected this as the proper rule, I abstain from expressing any opinion upon the subject.

If your Lordships shall concur with me in thinking, that upon these grounds, there must be a new trial, it is unnecessary to come to any decision upon the point of evidence raised by the bill of exceptions. I am, however, clearly of opinion, that for some purpose at least the witness was at liberty to refer to the paper he produced, and that the bill of exceptions could not have been supported upon that ground.

I therefore move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed, and the bill of exceptions allowed.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, that the said interlocutor complained of in the said appeal be, and the same is hereby reversed; and it is further ordered, that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, [1017] with directions to allow the bill of exceptions, and to grant a new trial, and to proceed further in the said cause as shall be just, and consistent with this judgment.

[1018] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

JAMES PEDIE, Appellant.—John Stuart; ARCHIBALD SWINTON and others, Respondents.—Tinney [26th August 1839].

[Arnott v. Brown and Common, 1847, 9 Dunlop, 497.]

Nuisance—Interdict.—An application being made for suspension and interdict against the erection of slaughter-houses, the party complained against, after interim interdict, alleged that he had discovered a mode of conducting the proceedings in these houses which would prevent their being a nuisance. The Lord Ordinary (Corehouse) passed the bill, but in respect the party complained against “desired to go on with the erection of the buildings at his own risk, and agreed that his doing so shall not be considered as affording him any plea of favour when the question of nuisance shall be determined,” recalled the interdict in so far as it prohibited the erection of the buildings, but quoad ultra continued the interdict. Upon discussing the expedite letters, the Lord Ordinary (Fullerton) found that the erection of shambles or slaughter-houses in the situation proposed would be a public nuisance, and therefore sustained the reasons of suspension, and continued the interdict, and found the respondent liable in expenses. The court, upon a reclaiming note, after ordering a condescendence of the precautionary measures the respondent (appellant) meant to adopt, and having examined plans and models of the buildings, adhered to the interlocutor of Lord Fullerton. The House of Lords (the party complaining having intimated that he had no desire to foreclose the party complained against [1019] from having his case reconsidered upon a change of circumstances,) declared, that the appellant ought to be interdicted in the terms of the interlocutor of the Lord Corehouse; and that liberty be reserved to the appellant to apply for an opportunity to try the experiment, whether he can conduct the business of slaughtering cattle upon his premises, mentioned in the appeal, without creating a nuisance.

The appellant and respondents were proprietors of adjoining grounds near Stockbridge, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh. A bill of suspension and interdict was presented to the Lord Ordinary on the bills, at the instance of the respondents, setting forth that the appellant was about to erect, upon his property, a range of shambles or slaughtering houses, which they alleged would prove a nuisance to their property, and would tend to pollute a mill-lead which passed in the neighbourhood. The bill prayed that the appellant should be interdicted “from proceeding with the erection of said houses and buildings at present in progress on his property aforesaid, as shambles or slaughterhouses for the slaughtering of cattle and other beasts, and from erecting any other buildings thereon for the said purposes; and from letting, using, and occupying all or any part of his said property, and the buildings erected and to be erected thereon, as slaughterhouses or shambles, for the purposes aforesaid; and from emptying or depositing the offals or other impure matter therefrom into the mill-lead aforesaid, or in any other matter thereby prejudicing the interests and properties of the complainers.

When this bill was presented an interim interdict was granted, ex parte, by the Lord Ordinary, in general terms. A hearing then took place before the Lord Ordinary [1020]nary, in consequence of which a minute was presented for the appellant, stating that he did not object to the passing of the bill upon caution, for the purpose of trying the question of nuisance; and with regard to the interdict, that he did not object to its being continued, in so far as related to the pollution of the mill-lead. He farther represented, that in case the Lord Ordinary should be of opinion that the interdict ought in the meantime to be continued to any greater extent, it ought at least to be recalled in so far as related to the erection of the houses and other buildings at present in progress, or any other buildings, and ought to be confined to the letting, using, or occupying all or any part of his said property, and the buildings erected or to be erected thereon, as slaughter-houses or shambles for the purposes aforesaid. That he was perfectly aware that the erection of these buildings must now, in consequence of this judicial challenge, be at his own risk. But he was confident that he would be able to prove to the satisfaction of the court that his projected operations, in a new and improved form, would constitute no nuisance such as to entitle the respondents to interfere. The following interlocutor was thereafter pronounced by Lord Corehouse.

"The Lord Ordinary, having considered the bill and answers, with the minute for Mr. Pedie, and having heard counsel for the parties, and inspected the premises in question, passes the bill; but in respect that Mr. Pedie desires to go on with the erection of the buildings at his own risk, and agrees that his doing so shall not be considered as affording him any plea of favour when the question of nuisance shall be determined; recalls the interdict, in so far as it prohibits [1021] the erection of the buildings, but, quoad ultra, continues the interdict."

The record being closed upon reasons and answers, and pleas in law, the Lord Ordinary (3d March 1836) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary (Fullerton) having heard parties procurators, and considered the closed record, and visited the ground, finds that the erection of shambles or slaughter-houses, in the situation proposed by the respondent (appellant), would be a public nuisance, and therefore sustains the reasons of suspension, and continues the interdict, and decerns; finds the respondent (appellant) liable in expenses; and remits the account thereof when lodged to the auditor to tax the same, and to report." Note. "It has been repeatedly decided that the slaughtering of cattle in the suburbs of a town, or in the immediate neighbourhood of inhabited houses, is a common nuisance. Whether or not it be possible to devise means by which the various offensive consequences of such operations may be mitigated, or entirely avoided, it is not for the Lord Ordinary to determine; prima facie, it does not seem likely; but at any rate, if there be such a possibility, it was incumbent on the respondent (appellant) to show how it was to be accomplished. But the respondent (appellant), though perfectly apprized by the proceedings in the Bill Chamber of what would be expected of him, gave no explanation, but merely avers in general 'that the shambles are to be erected on a new and improved plan, by which there will be nothing offensive to the sight or smell,' etc. In these circumstances [1022] the Lord Ordinary thinks the interdict must be continued."

Against this interlocutor the appellant presented a reclaiming note to the First Division of the Court, and their Lordships pronounced this interlocutor:—6th Dec. 1836, "The Lords, having advised this reclaiming note, and heard the counsel for the parties, appoint the reclaimer to lodge in process plans of the buildings he proposes to erect, and a special condescendence of the precautions he means to adopt, in order to satisfy the Court that his shambles will not be a public nuisance."*

* The following was the condescendence lodged for the appellant:—"The condescender herewith produces a ground plan and an elevation plan of his proposed buildings, part of which are already erected; and he has also prepared a model in wood, on a large scale, of such a portion of the building as will enable any one who examines it, to understand the details. The slaughter-houses are to consist of two ranges of buildings, parallel to each other, running from east to west, at the distance

[1023] Thereafter the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, having resumed consideration of this reclaiming note, with the condescendence ordered, and answers thereto, and the plans and models of the buildings, and heard counsel, adhere to the interlocutor of Lord Fullerton of 3d March 1836, and refuse the desire of the note, but find no ex-[1024]penses due since the date of said interlocutor; of new, remit the account,' etc.

Against the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary of 3d March 1836, and of the Court of 9th March 1837, the appellant entered his appeal, contending that the effect of these interlocutors was to exclude him from making a trial of his slaughter-houses, with a view to determine the question, whether they would create a nuisance:

of about twenty feet from each other. The interposed space, which is to form a court, being flanked with high walls on the east and west, will be entirely excluded from view. The only access to it is to be by an opening in the northmost range of buildings, where there is to be a gateway. This opening establishes a communication between the court and a stable-lane, which is to run parallel with the court, and the two extremities of which, on the east and west, open out to public roads or lanes. This stable-lane is interposed between a range of stables and coach-houses on the south, and a range of byres on the north. Still farther to the north, the ground between the byres and the public road is to be occupied by a range of self-contained dwelling-houses, with back greens attached to them. The eastern end of the stable lane opens upon a parish road running north and south, by means of which cattle coming from the eastward may be introduced. The western end of the stable lane opens upon a lane which is shewn upon the plan, etc. The slaughter-houses consist of several separate killing places, which all open into the court, and have windows in the roof. The buildings consist of stone and lime, and the roofs are slated. The court is causewayed with whinstone causeway. Each killing place occupies an area of about nineteen feet square within walls; the floors consisting of the best and strongest Craigleith ashlar pavement, eight inches thick, squared and jointed, and broached or drowed on the surface. The walls immediately above the pavement, all round, are coursed, and the stones laid square, so as to be perfectly tight. The pavement is not laid horizontal, but forms an inclined plane; so as that any liquid spilt upon the floors, will immediately find its way into the cess-pool. By this means the floors can be made perfectly clean by merely pouring water upon them. Between each pair of killing places a cess-pool or dung-pit is constructed, which is somewhat like a closet of six feet square, the floor of which is sunk considerably below the level of the adjoining pavement, and consists of a hewn stone trough, well jointed, and neatly broached, so as to be perfectly tight. Into this trough, whatever liquid is spilt, or water is poured upon the pavement of the killing places, will find its way, by means of a small aperture. No liquid can ever escape from the killing places to the outer court; but from the inclination of the floors, and the construction of the doors of access, the whole is immediately discharged into the cess-pool. The upper part of this square closet is completely shut in, and excluded from the outward air, there being merely an opening to each of the killing places, for the purpose of discharging into it any refuse, which opening can be shut by a close lid. These cess-pools are to be cleansed every second day by the farmer to whom the manure is let, before five o'clock in the morning. For this purpose there is an access from the outer court into the cess pool by a locked door, of which he has a key. The cattle are to be brought into the killing places at a very early hour in the morning, so that there will be no such thing as danger from the driving of the cattle, either in the street or in the lanes. By means of these contrivances there will be neither danger nor offence either to the sight or smell. It will be perfectly impossible for any one on the outside of the establishment to see any thing that goes on either in the slaughter-houses or in the court. Even in the court itself there will be no appearance of filth or of blood, and from it there will be no immission into the mill-lead, of any filthy or offensive substance whatever. There will be no smell of an offensive kind even in the court, and far less on the outside of the buildings, or in the neighbourhood. This will be effectually prevented by keeping all the refuse from being exposed to the action of the outer air, and by its being regularly and frequently taken away."

that this was unjust, because it was impossible to determine, without a trial, whether such nuisance would be occasioned; and that it was also illegal, because, by special act of parliament, the determination of questions of nuisance are, in Scotland, appropriated exclusively to the cognizance of a jury.

Lord Chancellor (25th June 1838).— My Lords, according to the facts, as they appear before the House, and according to the natural construction I should put upon the interlocutor complained of, I have no difficulty in suggesting to your Lordships that the course ought to be pursued which has been suggested at the bar. I therefore do not propose, at this moment, to move your Lordships judgment, but to give the appellant an opportunity, if he can, of satisfying your Lordships that the course of proceeding would not be open to him, which, from the papers before the House, I apprehend would.

The suit in discussion is to prevent the appellant from proceeding to erect slaughter-houses upon a very large scale. Now, the erection of slaughter-houses, generally speaking, would be a nuisance according to the law of Scotland, which is not disputed. Several decisions have established that it is so; and it is accord-[1025]-ing to the practice of the law in Scotland, when erections are made which, if completed, would amount to a nuisance, to interdict the proceedings of the party, for the purpose of protecting persons interested, and the neighbourhood, from any injury that might be sustained from such a nuisance. The course of proceeding in Scotland is similar to the course of proceeding in this country. In England the Court interferes by injunction, or finally by a discontinuance of that injunction, if there is any doubt of the fact of a nuisance, for the purpose of enabling the parties to try it.

The appellant in this case, not pretending to dispute the rule of law, that generally speaking a slaughter-house would be a nuisance, suggests various modes by which the nuisance might be avoided.

Now, it so happens that these plans which are suggested would not depend upon any mode of proceeding which would prevent the nuisance independently of the act of the party; he says he means to clean out the cess-pools every second day, and that the cattle are to be driven by a certain hour in the morning: all that entirely depends upon his volition, and is not a fact which can be tried, if the question were sent to a jury. An inquiry, before a jury, to ascertain whether if this thing were done there would be a nuisance or not, could lead to no conclusion at all affecting the rights of the parties. On the other hand, if the suggestions were of the same nature as in Trotter's case (see post, p. 1027), then indeed the Court could see grounds upon which it might safely proceed.

The orders, as they stand printed, undoubtedly would shew that the appellant is not prohibited from continuing the erection of these buildings; but if the appellant [1026] can satisfy your Lordships to the contrary, it will be material before you finally dispose of this case. It appears that, in the first instance, he was prohibited from erecting the buildings at all. That was altered by an order, which, as printed, is thus: "But in respect that Mr. Pedie desires to go on with the erection of the buildings at his own risk, and agrees that his doing so shall not be considered as affording him any plea of favour when the question of nuisance shall be determined, recalls the interdict, in so far as it prohibits the erection of the buildings." The moment that interdict was pronounced it stood good as an interdict against what was alleged to be nuisance, but it was no interdict against continuing the buildings. In March 1836, the Lord Ordinary sustained the reasons of suspension, and continued the interdict. The only interdict was the one I have just stated. The question came before the Inner House; and the Court adhered to the interlocutor of Lord Fullerton, namely, of the 3d March 1836, which was the interlocutor I last stated; and the result of that would show, that at this moment there is no interdict against continuing the building. If however the appellant is able to show your Lordships that some mistake has been made in the mode in which the interdict is printed, and that there is an interdict against continuing the building, he might possibly induce your Lordships to alter the interlocutor in that respect.

What he says is in substance, "I am so satisfied that I can prevent any nuisance, —and I will satisfy the Court of Session, or this House, that no nuisance will arise in carrying on the business of a slaughter-house in these premises,— I am willing to be at the [1027] expense of erecting slaughter-houses, taking the chance of being able to carry on the business.” Certainly, so far, there is room for confidence that he will be able ultimately to succeed in carrying on the business without creating a nuisance. The court however were not satisfied that that which he suggested was sufficient to enable him to call upon them to rescind the interdict altogether; and I am clearly of the same opinion. The business itself is declared and recognized by the law of Scotland as a nuisance; and certainly, that he means to carry it on in a particular form, is not a reason why the Court of Session ought to entrust him with a power to expose the interests of the inhabitants to that which the law considers a nuisance.

Then comes the other question to which I would also wish to draw your Lordships attention. It has been argued at the bar, that he is precluded from saying to the Court at a future time that he has devised means by which he will be able effectually to prevent the nuisance. In the case of Trotter (Trotter v. Farnie and others, 7th Dec. 1830, 9 S., D., and B., 144; affirmed, 1st Oct. 1831) I find that this House adopted the course which, subject to what may hereafter be shown by the appellant, I should advise your Lordships to adopt; but, practically, notwithstanding the judgment of the Court, in the first instance, and of this House affirming it, the party was permitted to show that by pursuing the mode he intended to adopt, that that which, prima facie, would be a nuisance, would not be a nuisance. I cannot doubt therefore, but that in the present case the same course of proceeding might be open to the appellant, as was practically proved to be [1028] open to the appellants in the case to which I have referred. There the party was about to erect a building for the purpose of boiling whale blubber, which by prior cases had been held to be a nuisance. It was suggested to the Court, that although, prima facie, that was a nuisance, and, if conducted in an ordinary manner, would be a nuisance, yet he had the means, from a particular form or system of carrying it on, to prevent it being a nuisance. The Court of Session were not satisfied that the course suggested would be sufficient to protect the property of persons in the neighbourhood, and they interdicted him “in so far as regards the boiling whale blubber in the premises in question;” and this House (1st October 1831) affirmed the interlocutor, and prevented further proceeding. So far the cases are similar. He afterwards procured the assistance of a gentleman of great eminence (Professor Leslie), who suggested means by which they were enabled to apply to the Court of Session for that purpose; and I have no doubt that a similar course is open to the appellant in the present case. It is quite impossible to suggest a mode at the present time for trial, according to the suggestion of the appellant.

I am anxious, undoubtedly, to give the party an opportunity of satisfying your Lordships that the interlocutor would prevent him from applying to the Court of Session for a discharge of the interdict, upon the ground that he has discovered the means of avoiding the nuisance, and can satisfy the Court that he might safely be permitted to proceed with his work and his business, securing those whose interests are likely to be affected. If he can satisfy your Lordships that he cannot [1029] do that as the matter now stands, there may be a reason for a variation of the interlocutor.

For the purpose of giving the appellant an opportunity to communicate further information to your Lordships upon the points to which I have alluded, I will now suggest that your Lordships should abstain at this moment from finally disposing of the case. But, undoubtedly, unless the appellant can satisfy your Lordships upon those points, considering the circumstances of the case, I will advise your Lordships to dismiss the appeal, with costs. If it become necessary for counsel to attend here, of course you will give them the opportunity. If the appellant hand in a written statement, the House will then say whether the other side shall have an opportunity of answering it.

Statements were thereafter given in on both sides, the only part of which material to notice will be found in the following speech:—

Lord Chancellor (26th Aug.).—My Lords, at the hearing of this appeal I expressed my opinion that the Court was right in continuing the interdict under the then existing circumstances. But, as the Lord Ordinary's interim interdict, whilst it prohibited the nuisance, permitted the appellant to go on with the buildings at his own risk, (he agreeing that his doing so should not be considered as affording him any plea of favour when the question of nuisance should be determined,) was founded upon a representation on the part of the appellant, that he should be able to show that from the manner in which he proposed to conduct the business of slaughtering cattle, all nuisance to the neighbourhood would be avoided, I thought it unjust, after [1030] the appellant had proceeded upon the faith of such an arrangement, that any interdict should be subsequently pronounced, preventing the further building of the projected premises, or which should not be capable of being relaxed, (for the purpose of enabling the appellant to try the experiment by which he hoped to be able to prevent the nuisance usually arising from his business,) and, if necessary, ultimately recalled.

How far the existing interlocutors were consistent with this view of the case was the subject of a difference of opinion. The case therefore stood over for the purpose of ascertaining that point. The result has been a statement on each side, contending for directly opposite positions: but on the part of the respondents an offer has been made which precludes the necessity of coming to any conclusion upon that subject; for after contending that the interdict, as it exists, does not prevent the appellant from proceeding with the building, they say that they have no desire to foreclose the appellant from having his case reconsidered upon a change of circumstances, and the interdict recalled upon cause shown, or a remit to the Court, with power, if they shall see cause, to entertain and dispose of such an application.

The appellant has not shown that the existing interdict prevents his continuing the erection of the building, nor has he succeeded in proving that he should be able effectually to prevent the nuisance, if permitted to commence the business of slaughtering cattle; and yet he has appealed against the whole of the interlocutor granting the interdict. In this he was, I think, wrong; but I am by no means satisfied that the interlocutors are altogether right, because I think they ought, after what had before [1031] taken place, to have been so framed as to give to the appellant an opportunity of applying in the cause to the Court for liberty to try the experiment he has suggested, and that there should have been reserved to the Court the power of dealing with the interdict as might be just after such experiment had been tried.

I therefore think that the right order for the House to make will be to declare that the appellant ought to be interdicted in the terms of Lord Corehouse's interlocutor, which will enable him to proceed with his intended buildings, if he shall think proper to incur the risk of so doing; and that liberty ought to be reserved to the appellant to apply to the Court for an opportunity to try the experiment, whether he can conduct the business of slaughtering cattle upon those premises without creating a nuisance; and that power ought to be reserved to the Court to recal, alter, or vary the interdict, and to make such order therein as shall be just, after the result of such experiment shall have been ascertained. And with this declaration the cause ought to be remitted to the Court of Session to be reviewed, and to have such alterations, if any, made as may be necessary for these purposes. There can be no costs of the appeal.

The House of Lords declared, That the said appellant ought to be interdicted in the terms of the interlocutor of the Lord Corehouse, Ordinary, pronounced on advising the minute of the appellant; and that liberty be reserved to the appellant to apply to the said First Division of the Court of Session for an opportunity to try the experiment, whether he can conduct the business of slaughtering cattle upon his, the appellant's, premises, mentioned in the appeal, without creating a nuisance; and that power be reserved to the said First Division of the Court of Session to recal, alter, or vary [1032] the said interdict, and to make such order therein as shall be just, after the result of such experiment shall have been ascertained: And it is ordered, That with this declaration the cause be remitted back to the First Division of the said Court of Session, to review the said interlocutors, and to have such alterations, if any, made therein as may be necessary for the said purposes, and as shall be consistent with this declaration.

[1033] APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

Sir WILLIAM FRANCIS ELIOTT of Stobs and Wells, Bart., Sir JAMES BOSWELL of Auchinleck, Bart., and Others, his Trustees, Appellants.*—John Stuart; JAMES CLEGHORN Esq., of Halkburn, and GEORGE CLEGHORN Esq., of Weens, and the Trustees of the late JOHN WILSON Esq., of Hallrule, Respondents.—Attorney General (Campbell)—Sir William Follett [27th August 1839].

Et è contra.

Entail—Statute 42 Geo. 3. c. 116—Restitution.—An heir of entail having sold certain portions of an entailed estate, under a warrant from the Court of Session, applied the purchase money, 1st, in redemption of the land tax; 2d, in payment of entailer's debts; and, 3d, in payment of provisions to younger children. The sales were set aside as irregular at the instance of a succeeding heir. In an action of declarator, repetition, and damages, by the purchasers, —Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), 1st, that the estate should be liable to an annual payment corresponding to the land tax, redeemable on payment of a sum specified as the value thereof; 2d, that in so far as the prices of said lands were applied in payment of debts of the entailer, the same should form real burdens upon the estate; and 3d, that such should also be the case with the sums applied in payment of provisions, although the same might not have been kept up by assignation. Farther, that the heirs of entail should not be liable to personal diligence for payment of the principal sums of any of said provisions, but that they should be personally liable successively for payment of the interest [1034] of such sums during their possession of the estate respectively. Further, that the same forms of diligence should be competent for the debts of the entailer as if the same had been still subsisting in the persons of the original creditors; and also, that the same form of diligence should be competent for any of the sums of provisions for younger children which would have been competent if the same had not been discharged; "declaring always, that this decree shall be subject to all the provisions and declarations of the deed of tailzie of the lands in question, etc.; and declaring all the said findings to be without prejudice to any questions which may arise as to the effect of any particular form of action or diligence which may be raised in any particular case in virtue thereof."

The late Sir William Eliott, professing to take advantage of the statute 42 Geo. 3. c. 116, which authorizes entailed proprietors to sell a portion of the entailed estate for redemption of the land tax, made an application accordingly to the Court of Session in May 1803, and having obtained their warrant to sell certain parts of the entailed estate specified in the application, Sir William himself became the purchaser, at the price of £15,420. Sir William afterwards sold the same lands in different lots to the respondents, and thereby obtained an advance of price amounting in the whole to £23,912 10s. Besides redeeming the land tax (which amounted only to £56 8s. 7½d.) for the sum of £1183 9s. 5d., various burdens upon the estate were paid off, viz, two debts of the entailer, amounting respectively to £1111 2s. 2d. and £111 2s. 2d.; provisions to three children of a former proprietor, Sir Francis Eliott, of £1170 each; another provision to a son of a previous proprietor, amounting to £2500; and likewise provisions by Sir William himself, amounting to £5483 0s. 4½d. Of these four classes of debts, the first three were paid during Sir William's [1035] life-time of simple discharges. The debts forming the fourth class were paid after Sir William's death, and assignations were taken.

In 1812 Sir William died, and was succeeded by the present appellant, who brought an action of reduction of the sales, founded on various violations of the statute. The Court of Session (7th June 1825) reduced the whole of the sales, and their judgment was affirmed on appeal, 2d May 1828 (3 Wilson and Shaw's Appellants).

* Fac. Coll., 2d June 1837.

Cases, p. 68). In the meantime the purchasers brought an action of relief and damages against Mr. Riddell, the statutory trustee, alleging that he, as agent and trustee, was bound to have seen the proceedings regularly carried through under the statute; but Mr. Riddell was assoilized from that action, reserving liberty to cause Mr. Riddell to repeat and pay back any parts of the sums received by him, and not applied for the purposes above specified, on a proper process to that effect. The purchasers then raised the summons, (dated and signeted 3d January 1827,) which has given rise to the present appeal, directed against the appellants and Mr. Riddell's trustee (he having died), which, after stating in detail the leading facts above mentioned, subsumes, 1st, that the defender Sir William Francis Elliott, as representing the late Sir William, is liable for the whole sum of £23,912 10s. paid by the pursuers; 2d, that the heirs of entail are liable for the original price of £15,420 paid by the late Sir William, or for such part thereof as was applied beneficially in terms of the act of parliament; 3d, that in so far as the £15,420 was not applied beneficially in terms of the act of parliament, the representatives of Mr. Riddell, the trustee, are liable, and then [1036] concludes, 1st, against Sir William Francis Elliott, as representing the late Sir William, for the said sum of £23,912 10s., and for £10,000 of damages; 2d, in the event of the first conclusion not being successful, against Mr. Riddell, for the original price of £15,420, in so far as the same may not have been applied strictly in terms of the statute; 3d, against Sir William Francis Elliott and the other heirs of entail to repeat and pay back the original price of £15,420, or at least such part thereof as had been applied in terms of the statute. There is also a conclusion that the entailed estate is liable and may be adjudged in payment of the said price of £15,420, or at least such part thereof as can be shown to have been applied beneficially in terms of the statute.

In defence it was pleaded for the appellant, 1, that he, as representing his father in no other character than that of heir of entail, is only liable in payment of entailer's debts, and debts which may have been subsequently created upon the entailed estate in virtue and in terms of the deed of entail; 2, that the pursuers are not vested in the right of any of the entailer's debts or other debts legally affecting the entailed estate, and consequently are not entitled to sue for payment of the same, either directly or indirectly; 3, that at the time of the defender's succession to the estate of Stobs, none of the debts specified in the condescendence, excepting the provisions to his younger brothers and sisters, affected that estate, or the portion thereof which had been sold to the pursuers, and it is not competent to claim payment of any debts from the defender as heir of entail, under any of the conclusions of the present summons; 4, that the defender Sir William Elliott, as heir of entail, is not liable for any debts or burdens paid, or any outlay or expendi-[1037]-ture made by the pursuers or their authors upon the estate, the same having been paid and expended in reliance on the security of the late Sir William Elliott, with whom the authors of the pursuers dealt in the character of fee simple proprietor.

For Mr. Riddell's trustee it was pleaded, that it is res judicata that Mr. Riddell was not liable in damages to the pursuers for alleged misconduct as Sir William Elliott's agent, or as trustee in regard to the matters set forth in the summons, and consequently his trustee cannot be bound to make good any part of the loss sustained in consequence of the sales being found ineffectual.

Upon the report of Lord Moncreiff, the following judgment (dated 18th January and signed 7th February 1833) was thereafter pronounced by the First Division of the Court of Session:—"The Lords having advised this cause, with the cases for the parties, and heard counsel, Find the pursuers entitled to repetition of the several sums of money applied in payment of burdens and of debts affecting the entailed estate of Stobs, or for which the said estate was liable to be affected: Find that the following sums were so applied; viz. the sum of £1183 9s. 5d. for redemption of the land tax of the said entailed estate; the sum of £1111 2s. 2d. paid in extinction of the debt of the entailer Sir Gilbert Elliott to the Countess of Hyndford; the sum of £111 2s. 2d. paid in extinction of a debt of the said entailer to William Calderwood, advocate; the sum of £1170 in extinction of a provision made by Sir Francis Elliott in favour of Miss Mary Elliott, his eldest daughter, paid to the Countess of Hyndford; the sum of £1170 in extinction of a provision made by the said Sir Francis Elliott in favour of Miss Anne Elliott his youngest daughter, [1038] paid to the Countess of Hyndford;

the sum of £2500 in extinction of a provision made by Sir John Elliott to Anne Elliott, his only child, paid to the Edinburgh Friendly Insurance Society; the sum of £1170 in extinction of a provision made by the said Sir Francis Elliott in favour of John Elliott his second son, paid to Charles Elliott's trustees; the sum of £5483 Os. 4 4-12d., being the amount of provisions granted by the late Sir William Elliott in favour of John Elliott his second son, Gilbert Elliott his third son, Bethia Mary Elliott his eldest daughter, and George Augustus Elliott his fourth son, in terms of the entail, and for which the said entailed estate was liable to be affected: Finds, that for the above-mentioned sums the said pursuers are just and lawful creditors of the heir of entail of the estate of Stobs, now in possession thereof, and of each succeeding heir of entail of the said estate who shall obtain possession thereof, while the said debts shall remain unpaid: Find and declare that the pursuers, as creditors foresaid, are entitled, omni habili modo quo de jure, to adjudge the said entailed estate of Stobs in payment and satisfaction of the said sums applied as aforesaid, and decern: And farther, decern and ordain the said Sir William Francis Elliott, as heir of entail in possession of the said estate, and the heirs of entail who shall succeed to him in the right and possession thereof as they shall respectively attain possession, to make payment to the pursuers of the foresaid several sums of money: And in respect of the preceding findings assoilzie Claud Russell, the trustee for the creditors of the late William Riddell, and all others the representatives of the said William Riddell and of Edgar Hunter, his cautioner, from the con-[1039]clusions of the libel to the extent of the said several sums of money, and decern: Quoad ultra, remit to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties farther as to the sum of £622 8s. 1d. alleged to have been expended by Sir Francis Elliott on improvements on the entailed estate; likewise as to the several dates from which interest on the said several sums shall run; also as to the balance still due by the late Mr. Riddell and his cautioner, and their representatives; and as to what farther sums fall to be charged against the entailed estate and heirs of entail; and generally, as to all other remaining points of the cause, and to do therein as shall be just: Find the defenders, Sir William Francis Elliott, and Sir James Boswell, George Sinclair, and James Brown, his trustees, who have sisted themselves as parties to this action, and that only qua trustees, liable to the pursuers in the whole expenses hitherto incurred by them in this action, and ordain the account thereof to be given in; and when so given in, remit to the auditor of Court to tax the same, and to report."

This judgment formed the subject of an appeal by the appellants, and a cross appeal by the purchasers against the present appellant and also against Mr. Riddell's trustee, in so far as it fell short of the conclusions of their summons, upon which the House of Lords pronounced the following judgment (8th Sept. 1835):—"After hearing counsel, as well on Monday the 14th, Tuesday the 15th, and Tuesday the 22d days of April 1834, as on Monday the 31st day of August last, and Tuesday the 1st day of this instant September, upon the original petition any appeal of Sir William Francis Elliott of Stobs and Wells, baronet, and of [1040] Sir James Boswell of Auchinleck, baronet, George Sinclair esq. (now Sir George Sinclair baronet) younger of Ulbster, and James Brown esq., accountant in Edinburgh, trustees of the said Sir William Francis Elliott, complaining of an interlocutor of the Lords of Session in Scotland, of the First Division, dated the 18th January and signed upon the 7th day of February 1833, and praying that the same might be reversed, varied, or altered, or that the appellants might have such relief in the premises as to this House, in their Lordships' great wisdom, should seem meet; as also upon the cross appeal of James Cleghorn esq., of Halkburn, and George Cleghorn esq., of Weens, and David Watson, esq., writer in Edinburgh, their commissioner; and Edward Filder, esq., of Mellington Hall, Montgomeryshire; the Reverend James Glen of Argyle Place, London; Henry George Watson, accountant in Edinburgh; and William Wilson, clerk to the signet, trustees of the deceased John Wilson esq., of Hallrule (which said cross appeal was, by an order of this House of the 17th of May 1833, amended, by omitting the names of Bethia Mary Elliott, Captain John Elliott, Gilbert Elliott, Daniel Elliott, George Augustus Elliott, Russell Elliott, Alexander Elliott, Euphemia Elliott, William Elliott, Georgina Elliott, Elliott, Elliott, Anne Elliott, and Gay, and Gay, her husband, as parties respondents), complaining of an interlocutor of the Lords of Session in Scotland, of the First Division, of the 18th of January (signed 17 th [7th] February) last, in so far as Claud Russell, the trustee for the creditors of the late William Riddell, and all others the representatives [1041] of the said William Riddell, and of Edgar Hunter his cautioner, are assoilzied, and praying that the same might be reversed, varied, or altered, so far as complained of, or that the appellants might have such relief in the premises as to this House, in their Lordships' great wisdom, should seem meet; as also, upon the answer of James Cleghorn esq., of Halkburn, and George Cleghorn esq., of Weena, and David Watson, writer in Edinburgh, their commissioner; and Edward Filder esq., of Mellington Hall, Montgomeryshire; the Reverend James Glen of Argyll Place, London; Henry George Watson, accountant in Edinburgh; and William Wilson, clerk to the signet, trustees of the deceased John Watson esq., of Hallrule, put in to the said original appeal; and also upon the answer of Sir William Francis Elliott of Stobs and Wells, baronet; and of Sir James Boswell of Auchinleck, baronet; George Sinclair esq., of Ulbster; and James Brown esq., accountant in Edinburgh, trustees of the said Sir William Francis Elliott; and also upon the answer of Claud Russell esq., accountant in Edinburgh, trustee for the creditors of the late William Riddell esq., of Camieston, severally put in to the said cross appeal; and due consideration had this day of what was offered on both sides in these causes: It is ordered and adjudged, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, that the said cause be remitted back to the said First Division of the Court of Session, to review their interlocutor complained of in the original appeal; and farther, to state to this House whether, in pronouncing the same, they have had regard to the eighth finding of the interlocutor [1042] pronounced by the Court of Session of the 7th day of June 1825, in the action of reduction brought by the defender Sir William Francis Elliott, which finds it proved, by the terms of the dispositions to the defenders in that action, that they were made aware that the act of parliament had not been followed out (see 3 W. and S. 68): and also to state to what extent, and under what form of diligence, the present defender Sir William Francis Elliott, as heir of entail in possession of the said estate, and the heirs of entail who shall succeed him in the right and possession thereof, as they shall respectively attain possession, may be compelled, according to the law of Scotland, to make payment to the pursuers of the several sums of money in the said interlocutor mentioned: And it is further ordered that the said First Division of the said Court, in reviewing their said interlocutor, do order the matter thereof to be heard before the whole Judges of the Court of Session, including the Lords Ordinary: And this House does not think fit to pronounce any judgment upon the said appeals until after the said Court of Session shall have reviewed their said interlocutor according to the directions of this order."

In consequence of the preceding judgment the cause was heard before the whole judges of the Court of Session in February 1836. Thereafter the following interlocutor was pronounced (1st July 1836):—"The Lords of the First Division having considered the letters of the Lord Chancellor to the Lord President, with the letter by the Earl of Devon to the Lord Chancellor, explanatory of the remit by the House of Lords in the case of Cleghorn and Wilson v. Sir [1043] William Elliott, direct the said letters to be printed and laid before the Lords of the Second Division and Lords Ordinary, in order that they may furnish the First Division with their opinions in writing on the points contained in the said remit, as explained by the letter of the Earl of Devon, transmitted by the Lord Chancellor."*

* The letters referred to were as follow:—

"House of Lords, 27th June 1836.

"My Lord,—Having instituted an inquiry into the circumstances of the case of Sir William Elliott of Stobs v. Cleghorn and Wilson, and having for that purpose thought it right to apply to the Learned Lords who gave their particular attention to that appeal, when argued before this House, I have obtained from the Earl of Devon a letter in explanation of the terms of remit, as made to your Lordship and the other judges of the Court of Session, of which I have the honour to inclose a copy. I should also state, that I have communicated upon the subject with Lord Denman, who concurs with the Earl of Devon in the explanation offered in that letter, and which I trust will be satisfactory to your Lordship and the other judges.—I have the honour to be, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient humble servant, (Signed) COTTENHAM."

"To the Right Honourable the Lord President of the Court of Session, etc. etc."

In obedience to this interlocutor the consulted judges (Lords Justice Clerk (Boyle), Glenlee, Meadowbank, [1044] Medwyn, Corehouse, Fullerton, Moncreiff, Jeffrey, and Cockburn) returned the following opinion:—"We understand that this cause having been remitted by the House of Lords, in order that the interlocutor of the First Division of the Court, under appeal, might be reviewed generally, subject to the particular instructions given, as explained by the letters of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Devon now laid before us, our opinion is [1045] required on the general merits of the case, with particular reference to the question, 'To what extent, and under what form of diligence, the present defender, Sir William Francis Elliott, as heir of entail in possession of the said estate, and the heirs of entail who shall succeed him in the possession thereof, as they shall respectively attain possession, may be compelled, according to the law of Scotland, to make payment to the pursuers of the several sums of money in the said interlocutor mentioned.'

"With reference to the state of the case as thus presented to us, we have considered

June 11, 1836.

"My Dear Lord Chancellor,—I am sorry that accidental circumstances have prevented my sooner writing to you upon the subject of the case of Elliott v. Cleghorn, with reference to the letter of the Lord President. I have now carefully gone over the papers, and think that I can explain with confidence what was the view with which Lord Brougham and the Lords who assisted him framed the judgment in question. The case was first argued during the time that I sat at the table as clerk; but the last argument took place after I had taken my seat as a peer, and I attended to it, and had much conversation with Lord Brougham upon the case.

"The printed copy of the petition to apply the judgment gives the general history of the case. The short substance appears to be this:—

"An action was raised by Cleghorns and others to recover from Sir William Elliott certain sums of money alleged to have been paid by the pursuers as the price of certain lands and estates purchased under a judicial sale thereof, made at the instance of a preceding heir of entail, but which sale had been in the year 1825 reduced and set down as irregular.

"The Court of Session sustains this claim to a considerable extent by the finding set forth in page second of the printed petition.

"This judgment being brought under review by appeal, the House of Lords thought that it might assist them in coming to a right conclusion upon the case, if they should be informed, first, whether the judgment in question was pronounced with or without reference to the fact that the parties claiming repetition were aware of the irregularity of the sale in respect of which their claim is now made; and secondly, to what extent, and by what form of diligence, the claims which are declared valid by the judgment, can, by the law of Scotland, be made available against Sir William Elliott, and succeeding heirs of entail. There was some discussion at the bar upon this latter point. It is not necessary, nor am I competent to say in what manner the information thus sought for would affect the ultimate judgment of the House.

"It is sufficient to say that it was conceived that such information might throw light upon the case, and I cannot think that there will be any difficulty on the part of the Lords of Session in giving their answers, when the object of the inquiry is explained.

"The consulted judges can of course give no assistance to their brethren of the First Division, in answering the first of the special inquiries; but, upon the second point, the opinion of the whole may be given, and the whole judgment (which may, I should think, include within it the answer to the special inquiries) will be in point of form the judgment of the First Division, as in the case of an ordinary remit for consultation of the whole judges.

"This particular form of remit being, as the Lord President observes, unusual, there is not any particular form in which the judgment given upon it should be framed; but any form of words which, after reviewing the former judgment in the ordinary way, conveys an answer to the first inquiry, and gives the opinion of the court upon the second, will, I think, be satisfactory to the House, and enable it to come to a final decision upon the case.—Yours faithfully, (Signed) Devon."

"To the Lord Chancellor, etc."

the written pleadings of the parties, and the arguments of counsel in presence of the whole court, and now beg leave to deliver our opinion as follows:—

“1. We are of opinion, that the claim made by the respondents, in their action directed against the appellants and the heirs of entail in the estate of Stobbs, in so far as it is a claim for relief, or restitutio in integrum, is, in its general substance, a well-founded claim in equity, to which this court, as a court of equity, ought to give effect, to such extent, and in such manner, as the circumstances will admit of consistently with the general principles of law and justice. The case, divested of all specialities, is, that the lands in question, having been offered for sale under warrants of this court, proceeding on the statute for redemption of the land-tax, were purchased by the respondents or their predecessors; and that, on the faith of having obtained a good title to these lands, they paid the prices in the manner set forth in the record. And the sales having been reduced and set aside in respect of irregularity in the proceedings, [1046] and the lands restored to the heirs of entail, while, in the meantime, the money of the respondents had been applied to relieve and disburden the entailed estate of debts and charges, which previously stood as real and effectual burdens affecting the estate and the heirs of entail, the respondents claim, by their action, relief or restitution to the extent of the money so paid and beneficially applied. The conclusions of the summons go farther than this, in regard to the form and mode of redress which is sought. But, on the general merits of the claim, we are of opinion, that the defender and the other heirs of entail are not entitled to take benefit by the transaction which has been reduced, to the manifest loss of the respondents in the specific sums of money ascertained, and that there is a good right in the respondents to be restored against it.

“Without entering into any argument on the subject, it may be proper to mention, that in forming this opinion, we have not overlooked the eighth finding of the interlocutor of the First Division of the Court in the process of reduction, or the fact therein referred to, that from the dispositions received by the respondents one irregularity in the execution of the statute, though not that on which the sale was reduced by the House of Lords, might have been discovered. But that circumstance does not affect our opinion as to the equity of the present claim, so far as it appears to us to be in other respects just and competent.

“2. Being of opinion, that the principle of liability, on which alone the action can be maintained, is that of restitutio in integrum, in as far as the powers of the court, and the circumstances of the case, will admit [1047] of it, we farther think, that that principle necessarily requires, that the appellant and the heirs of entail shall in no case be placed in a worse situation, than that in which they would have stood if no such transaction had taken place; and that, in so far as there may be, in any of the particular objects or purposes to which the money may have been applied, a legal impracticability of recalling or replacing it as paid by the respondents, the loss or inconvenience of a less perfect remedy must be borne by the respondents.

“3. We are therefore of opinion, that the respondents are not entitled to obtain any decree against the defender Sir William Francis Elliott, personally or individually, for payment of the several sums of money concluded for, by which any greater or more direct liability to diligence for payment thereof might be incurred, than that to which he might have been subject, if the sales had never taken place, and the burdens on the entailed estate, as they previously stood, had remained unaltered. We think, that, merely as the party at whose instance the sales were reduced, he did not incur any such personal liability; and that it is only in respect of the direct and defined benefits to the estate, to which he has succeeded in the first instance, and the other heirs of entail may eventually succeed, that the claim of the respondents is just and well founded against him or them. Being of this opinion, we so far differ from the judgment under appeal, in respect of the findings and personal decerniture therein expressed, that we do not think that the respondents are entitled, according to the principles of equity on which they found, to any decree for payment in such terms.

[1048] “4. The sums of money, for payment of which the summons concludes, are of three descriptions: 1. The sum paid for the redemption of the land-tax, being £1183 9s. 5d.: 2. Various sums, stated to be the amounts of entailer's debts, or debts which were effectual burdens on the entailed estate, as created within the powers of the entail, and which have not by any deeds of assignation been kept up against the estate: And 3. A sum of £5483 0s. 4½d. of provisions stated to have been made effectual burdens on the estate, but which have been duly kept up by assignments. It is unnecessary to say anything of the last sum, as it is not now in dispute. The other two classes require particular notice.

"One of the most difficult points in the case, as it now stands, appears to us to be that which relates to the money applied for redemption of the land-tax. We think that neither Sir William Elliott nor the heirs of entail can be required to repay the capital sum so applied; because that would be to place them in a much worse situation than that in which they would have been if the sales had never taken place, contrary to the principles above laid down. For no one of them could ever have been compelled to pay any such sum in redemption of the land-tax; and to require them now to pay it would not be restitutio in integrum, but something much more to their prejudice. And, as the land-tax, once actually redeemed, cannot be precisely replaced with the legal remedies applicable to it, this raises a serious difficulty in the means of extricating this part of the case.

"But if the principle of equity be once settled, there seems to be no want of power in the law of Scotland [1049] to provide a mode of giving effect to it. The justice of the case is, that there should be again laid on the entailed estate, and the heirs of entail successively, an annual burden equal to the amount of the land-tax as it formerly stood, viz. £56 8s. 7½d.; and that it should be found, by decree of this court, that this burden shall subsist in favour of the respondents against the defender and the other heirs of entail,—subject, however, to one contingency. That contingency is, the possible, however improbable, event, that the land-tax in Scotland should be repealed or diminished. Subject to that possibility, the existence of which ought justly to exempt the heirs of entail from all liability, because they would have got the exemption if no sale had taken place, we are of opinion, that the said sum of £56 8s. 7½d. may still, by decree of this court, be declared an annual burden on the estate, and on the defender, and every succeeding heir of entail. The court cannot give the precise remedies which were competent for the recovery of the land-tax: but they can declare the annual sums as they fall due to be recoverable by all the ordinary diligence of the law of Scotland, without prejudice to the provisions of the entail as to the obligations of each heir successively in respect of the substitute heirs. It farther appears to us, however, that, in any such decree to be pronounced, power ought to be reserved to any heir to redeem the burden by payment of the sum of £1183 9s. 5d.

"The six sums of £1111 2s. 2d., £111 2s. 2d., £1170, £1170, £2500, and £1170, concluded for successively, and particularly described in the summons and interlocutor appealed from, consist of pay-[1050]-ments either of debts which were the entailor's proper debts, or of provisions stated to have been effectually appointed under the powers reserved by the entail; all of which would have been burdens on the estate, and the heirs to some effect, if no sale had been made. It appears to us, that the deeds executed for establishing the provisions were sufficient to have enabled the children, in whose favour they were granted, to make them effectual as burdens on the estate, according to the power reserved by the entail. It is therefore clear as matter of fact, that, in so far as the money of the respondents was applied in the payment and extinction of such debts and provisions, the estate was, by means of that money, to that extent relieved of burdens, which must otherwise have now affected it; and, if the principle laid down in the first part of this opinion be correct, we are necessarily brought to the conclusion that the respondents, upon reduction of the sale and eviction of the lands, are entitled to restitution in regard to all these sums, in so far as the court, as a court of equity, can give it, consistently with the just rights of the appellant and the other heirs of entail.

"In the precise remedy to be given, there may be a difference between the two sums of £1111 2s. 2d. and £111 2s. 2d., which were entailor's debts, and the four sums of £1170, £1170, £2500, and £1170, which consisted of bonds of provision. The former were proper debts equally against the estate and against every heir succeeding to it; and it will do no injustice to find that in restoring the respondents against the counterpart of the transaction of the sale reduced, the same sums shall still form burdens pre-[1051]-cisely to the same effect, and to give decree for payment of them against the defender, without prejudice to his right to keep them up as burdens on the estate, as the entail does indeed in express words permit. But with regard to the sums of provisions, as the entail only authorizes the heirs 'to burden and affect the lands with such provisions,' we are of opinion that the remedy to be afforded to the respondents can go no farther than to find and declare the sums paid in extinction of them to be still burdens on the entailed estate.

"Subject however to this distinction, we are of opinion that the Court has power, and that it is just and necessary as a matter of equity, to declare that these several sums shall subsist and be of equal effect as burdens on the estate and the heirs of entail, as the debts to the payment of which they were applied would have been if they had not been paid.

"With regard to the forms of diligence which may be competent for the sums thus to be declared to come in place of the bonds of provision, we are of opinion that those sums, when established by decree as burdens on the entailed estate, must be considered as standing in all respects in the same condition with the other sums amounting to £5483, etc., which, though paid to the original creditors, have been kept up as burdens on the estate by direct assignments of the bonds; and that the same forms of diligence for making the burden effectual will be competent in the one case which would be competent in the other. As we do not think that the equity of the case will admit of any personal [1062] responsibility being laid on the defender or any other heir, to which they would not have been liable for the debts as they originally stood if no sale had taken place, we are of opinion that the nature and extent of the diligence which will be competent must depend on the special terms of the entail, and the legal effect of its provisions. The clauses of the entail of Stobs are very peculiar in their application to this point, and it is not perfectly easy, and might be attended with serious inconvenience, to attempt to define beforehand what shall be taken to be the precise operation of them. In general, but reserving our judgment if any case of the kind shall come before us for trial, we think that personal diligence will not be competent for compelling the defender or any individual heir to pay the principal sums of such provisions; that he may be liable to such diligence for the annual interest becoming due on them during his own possession of the estate; that adjudication, and probably inhibition also, against the estate, may be used for the principal sums as debts, subject to the effect of the very peculiar clause of the entail, providing that if any adjudications shall be led 'for debts to be contracted,' the heir 'shall be obliged to redeem the same within the space of eight years' after deducing and leading such 'diligence,' in as far as that clause may be held to be applicable. But the precise operation of such a provision, as well as the legal effect of deeds held to be duly executed under the power of appointing provisions for younger children by this entail, may involve questions of so much difficulty not necessary to be resolved in the decision of this cause, that we do not [1063] think that any judgment to be pronounced in it should be made to embrace any of these points."

The Lords of the First Division having concurred in the foregoing opinion, the following judgment was pronounced:—

"The Lords, having considered the judgment of the House of Lords, find and declare, that in the interlocutor appealed from they had fully in their view, and had given due attention to the fact, that it might have been discovered from the terms of the dispositions accepted of by the pursuers, that one particular irregularity in the execution of the statute had occurred, though of a nature not held to be sufficient to affect the validity of the sale; and having consulted with the other judges, and heard counsel in presence of the whole Court, and reviewed the opinions of the Lords of the Second Division of the Court and of the Lords Ordinary, recal their former interlocutor appealed from, find that the pursuers are entitled in respect of the sales of the lands made to them and the payment of the prices thereof, and of the subsequent reductions of the said sales on account of the irregularities in the proceedings alleged against them, to be restored in integrum against the effects of the sales being reduced, in so far as the circumstances of the case and their powers as a court of equity enable them to give such restoration: find, that under any statement now before the Court in the record, it must be assumed that the land tax redeemed cannot be brought back, or of new made a burden on the lands with the remedies for execution therewith connected; but find that in equity the heirs of entail are bound to bear a corresponding [1064] burden, and that the sum of £1183 9s. 5d., for which the said land tax so affecting the lands was redeemed, must still form a burden on the estate and on the heirs succeeding thereto, and find, decern, and declare accordingly, and grant warrant for recording this decree in the register of sasines and reversions; but find and declare that this decree shall be subject always to these conditions and provisions, that in case the land tax at present exigible from all the lands of Scotland shall be abolished or diminished, the said burden shall also entirely or proportionally cease; and further, that it shall always be in the power of any heir of entail in possession of the estate to redeem and extinguish the said burden by payment of the foresaid sum of £1183 9s. 5d., but that until the same be paid, the burden shall subsist to the effect of each succeeding heir being bound to pay the sum of £56 8s. 7d. annually to the pursuers, being the amount of the sum exigible previous to the said redemption; and that all the ordinary diligence of the law shall be competent for the payment thereof, but that neither the individual heirs nor the estate shall be liable to any diligence for payment of such principal sum: find, that in so far as the prices received from the pursuers for the lands in question were applied in payment of debts of the entailor, and specially of the debts of £1111 2s. 2d., and £111 2s. 2d., specified in the record, it ought to be found and declared, and find and declare accordingly, that these sums shall form real burdens on the lands and estate in question; and the Lords decern for payment thereof against all the heirs succeeding to and possessing the said lands, [1055] without prejudice always to any heir of tailzie, on his paying such debts, keeping them up by assignation or otherwise against the said estate, as permitted by the entail: find, that in so far as the said prices of the lands have been applied in payment of the provisions for children of the family successively made by the heirs in possession, as set forth in the record, although the same have not been kept up by deeds of assignation, the sums thereof being £1170, also £1170, also £2500, and £1170, these sums, together with the sum of £5483 0s. 4<sup>8</sup>/<sub>11</sub>d., being the amount of provisions granted by the late Sir William Elliott in favour of John Elliott his second son, Gilbert Elliott his third son, Bethia Mary Elliott his eldest daughter, and George Augustus Elliott his fourth son, which has been kept up by assignation in favour of Messrs. Douglas and Bell, must still all form real burdens on the entailed estate to the same effect, but no farther, as if they had not been so paid, but had still stood as outstanding debts of the estate according to the terms of the deeds constituting them, and decern accordingly, and grant warrant for recording this decree in the register of sasines and reversions, that all may take notice thereof; but find, decern, and declare that neither the defender, nor any other of the heirs of entail, can be made liable by personal diligence for payment of the principal sums of any of the said provisions for younger children; and find that they are and shall be personally liable successively for the payment of the interest of all such sums accruing during their own possession of the estate respectively: find, decern, and declare that the same forms of diligence [1056] shall be competent to the pursuers for all the debts of the entailor hereby declared to be still subsisting, notwithstanding any discharges granted which could have been by law competent if the said debts had been still subsisting in the persons of the original creditors; and find that the same form of diligence shall be competent to the pursuers for any of the sums of provisions for younger children, paid as aforesaid from the prices of the said lands, which would have been competent to the children in whose favour such bonds or deeds of provisions may have been granted, if the same had not been discharged; declaring always, as it is hereby found and declared, that this decree shall be subject to all the provisions and declarations of the deed of tailzie of the lands in question, not inconsistent with the equity declared by the findings and decernitures in this interlocutor, and declaring all the said findings to be without prejudice to any questions which may arise as to the effect of any particular form of action or diligence which may be raised in any particular case in virtue thereof. And in respect of the preceding findings, assoilzie Claud Russell, the trustee for the creditors of the late William Riddell, and all others the representatives of the said William Riddell, and of Edgar Hunter his cautioner, from the conclusions of the libel, to the extent of the said several sums of money, and decern. Quoad ultra, remit to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties further as to the sum of £622 8s. 1d. alleged to have been expended by Sir Francis Elliott on improvements on the entailed estate: likewise as to the several dates from which interest on the said several sums shall run: also as to [1057] the balance still due by the said William Riddell and his cautioner and their representatives; and as to what farther sums fall to be charged against the entailed estate and heirs of entail, and generally as to all other remaining points of the cause, and to do therein as shall be just: find the defenders Sir William Francis Elliott, and Sir James Boswell, George Sinclair, and James Brown, his trustees, who have sisted themselves as parties to this action, and that only qua trustees, liable to the pursuers in the whole expenses hitherto incurred by them in this Court, and remit the account thereof, when lodged, to the auditor to tax the same, and to report."

Appellants.—The judgment appealed from is at variance with the summons; it gives that which was never demanded or concluded for. The summons is at variance with itself; it concludes for repetition of sums applied in terms of the statute, and yet the groundwork of the action is, that the terms of the statute were not complied with at all. New and unprecedented burdens are attempted to be imposed upon this estate, which are utterly inconsistent with the subsistence of a valid entail. In the first place it reimposes the burden of the land tax, or rather it imposes an annual burden, not the land tax, but to be subject to some of the conditions and laws which would have applied to the land tax,—a new species of burden upon property, and a new species of right reared up against property not concluded for in the summons, and it is believed never before known in the history or practice of the law of Scotland. The burden thus imposed is even worse than the land tax, because the heirs of entail might have sold part of the entailed [1058] estate to redeem the land tax, but they have no power to sell any part of the entailed estate to redeem this new burden, and nothing less than an enactment as authoritative as the statute for redemption of the land tax can give them such power. In the second place the interlocutor makes and imposes other real burdens upon the entailed estate in a manner alike unsparing and unprecedented; for instance, certain debts of the entailer had been paid off and discharged, and the present heir of entail entered into possession of the entailed estate free of these burdens. They were not kept up by assignation or otherwise. The Court of Session however has, of its own authority, and against the will of the heirs of entail, done that which the heirs of entail themselves could not have done if they had been willing, and which the respondents never thought of asking in the summons; it has imposed a new real burden upon the entailed estate in favour of the respondents to the amount of the debts which had been paid off and discharged. In like manner the interlocutor has done the same thing in regard to other sums, being the amount of the provisions in favour of younger children, which had been paid off. It is apprehended that the Court had no power to do this, and, at all events, that it was not competent for the Court to do it, under the present action. The foundation of the claims of the respondents, as stated by themselves, and as dealt with by the Court, is, that the debts paid off were so paid in pursuance and professed implement of the provisions of the statute. But if so, they must have been permanently and finally paid off and extinguished out and out, and could not be revived, it being an acknowledged principle of the law of Scotland that debts once extinguished cannot by any device be revived. Indeed, [1059] the Court has not revived them; but, finding the entailed estate clear, it has of its own accord done that which is not only at variance with the former precedents, but which nothing short of an act of parliament could effect, viz., created and put upon it a new real burden in favour of the respondents, with all the qualities of the debts that were paid off. The heirs of entail are made personally liable for sums of money which are the personal debts of a preceding heir of entail whom the appellant (the heir of entail) does not represent, which are not legal burdens upon the estate entailed, and for which neither the present heir of entail, nor those who may succeed, incurred any liability either personally or by representation. The judgment appealed from purports to do what has not hitherto been attempted to be done by the Court of Session, either as a court of law or of equity, is contrary to the principles and practice of the law of Scotland, and wholly unsupported by any authority or precedent. To give the respondents a right to recover the sums concluded for, either from the appellant or any of the heirs of entail, or out of the entailed estate, is directly inconsistent with the right of the heirs of entail, sustained and given effect to in the former action to reduce the sales as a fraud upon the entail, and contrary to the act of parliament, and practically denies benefit to the heirs of entail from the judgment they have already obtained reducing such sales.

While the Court of Session has recalled and altered its former judgment, while it has not given to the respondents that which they asked under their summons, but has devised a remedy for them in something which they did not conclude for, it has found them entitled to the whole expenses of the litigation, [1060] contrary, as the appellants humbly conceive, to the principles which ought to regulate the awarding of costs. Nay, it has even found the respondents entitled to recover from the present appellants the separate expenses which the respondents have incurred in this cause in the discussion between them and Riddell's representatives, in which discussion too the respondents have not been successful.

Respondents.—Nothing can be more clear and distinct than the tenor and object of the summons. It is distinctly averred in the summons that Mr. Riddell was named and approved of as statutory trustee in terms of the act of parliament, under the application for sale at the instance of Sir William Elliott. It is then averred that Mr. Riddell, as statutory trustee, received, directly from the respondents, or out of the monies paid by them, the sum of £15,420, which, with the exception of a small balance, he avers that he duly applied, in the execution of his duty, in terms of the statute, and under warrant of Court, to the redemption, in the first place, of the land tax, and next to the payment of debts which affected the entailed estate, as being either entailer's debts or debts contracted under faculties reserved in the entail. The action proceeds upon this ground, that either the statutory trustee on the one hand, or the heirs of entail and entailed estate on the other, are responsible to the pursuers for this sum of £15,420, the latter being responsible in so far as it has been applied by the statutory trustee for the benefit of the entailed estate, in the manner prescribed by the act, that is to say, in redemption of the land tax, or in payment of debts and burdens affecting the estate, and the former [1061] in so far as it has not been applied by him as statutory trustee, or, in other words, in so far as it remains in his hands, or has been applied otherwise than under warrant of court, and to the purposes prescribed by the statute, namely, the redemption of the land tax and the payment of debts and burdens on the estate. When the respondents speak of sums applied in terms of the statute, they use the words designative, and as elsewhere used in the summons, to mean the sums appropriated by the trustee in payment of entailer's debts, redemption of land tax, and other burdens for which the estate was liable. The respondents do not seek to constitute against the entailed estate, or against Sir William Elliott, as heir in possession, or against the heirs substitute, any new or extraordinary or enlarged responsibility, or any liability of any kind, or to any effect higher than attached to the entailed estate, and the heirs of entail under the various burdens and debts, in payment of which the price received by the statutory trustee has been applied. The heirs substitute of entail were not called as defenders, in order to obtain any direct or personal decree against them, but only in respect of their interest as heirs substitute in the entailed estate, and to the effect merely of constituting and declaring such responsibility against the entailed estate, and against the heirs succeeding to and holding it, as the estate and those heirs were previously under, in respect of the burdens and provisions which may have been paid by the statutory trustee. In like manner, as against Sir William Francis Elliott, the heir in possession, the conclusions proceeding on the supposition which forms the basis of the present argument, that he does not generally represent his father, are directed against him only as heir in possession, and to the extent [1062] to which he was liable for the debts and burdens in question. For some of them he was clearly liable personally, out and out, as, for example, for the bonds of provision in favour of his brothers and sisters, granted by his father, under the power of providing for younger children, conferred by the entail; and for which provisions he had given his own personal bond of corroboration, which stands at this moment assigned to trustees. Quoad ultra, the respondents did not demand decree against Sir William Elliott, beyond that liability which, as heir of entail in possession, he had already contracted for the debts and burdens affecting the estate and heirs in possession, and to which the trustee applied the price. For such burdens as entailer's debts, or debts contracted in execution of powers reserved or created by the entail, and as to which there exists no entail, or at least no entail which can exclude the creditor, the estate itself is very clearly liable. Some discussion there may be about the extent of the personal liability of the heir in possession, so far at least as regards the principal, but in no view can there be any discussion about interest, which it is the peculiar duty of the heir in possession to keep down during the term of his possession (Campbell v. Campbell, 29th Nov. 1815, Fac. Coll.; Erskine and Others v. Lord Mar, 7th July 1829, 7 S. and D., 844). Generally, with respect to the principal also, the respondents apprehend it to be plain that an heir of entail, by taking possession of the entailed estate, though he may not be liable ultra vires of his succession, does incur direct and immediate responsibility to the extent of his succession, and so far as he is lucratus by it, for all debts, which, being contracted by an entailer or by former heirs of [1063] entail under powers and faculties created and reserved by the entail, form a necessary burden on the succession. The mere circumstance of the party interested not having taken an assignation, as he confessedly might have done, is not of itself sufficient to extinguish the debt, or justify the plea that it does not subsist, and cannot be made effectual to any intent or purpose whatsoever (Temple and Halliday v. Gairns, 22d Feb. 1706, Mor. 15355; Gordon v. Sutherland, 29th January 1731, Mor. 11534; Scott of Harden, 20th Dec. 1751, Mor. 15394; Kerr v. Turnbull, 15th Feb. 1758, Mor. 15551).

There can be no doubt that the late Sir William Eliott could have taken assignations, and kept up all these debts. The respondents are in all respects in right of Sir William Eliott, and, through him, in right of the price, and consequently of all those debts or securities affecting the entailed estate, which have been paid by that price. Under the circumstances, the fact that no assignation was taken cannot deprive the respondents of the security which, through an assignation, they might unquestionably have obtained. The case of Sloane Lawrie v. Donald is a clear authority for the respondents on this point. That case is noticed by Mr. Shaw, under dates 1st June 1825 and 7th December 1830, but is only partially reported by him. It is understood, however, that the facts of the case, so far as necessary to be now considered, are very shortly these:—Mr. Walter Lawrie entailed two estates, Redcastle and Bargattan, by two separate entails, which, with respect to the concluding part of the destinations, were not identical, so that the estates came ultimately to descend to different parties. Sloane Lawrie was the heir in possession of both estates in 1799, and in that year, under the authority of the existing statutes for redemption of the land [1064] tax, he sold Edgarton, a farm of Redcastle, but for the purpose of redeeming the land tax payable not out of that estate only, but also out of Bargattan. Sloane Lawrie became himself the purchaser, through a trustee. The price was applied in redemption of the land tax of both estates, and in payment of debts due by Walter Lawrie, the common entailer, and with respect to several of those debts there was not an assignation taken, but simply a discharge and renunciation. Sloane Lawrie possessed for some time after this sale, and was succeeded by Kennedy Lawrie, upon whose death the two entails divided, Bargattan going to Kennedy Lawrie's dispoonees, he having been the last substitute in that entail, and Redcastle, part of which had been sold, going to another party, the substitute in that entail. In the meantime Kennedy Lawrie, who immediately succeeded Sloane, had brought an action of reduction of the sale, which was afterwards insisted in by the heir succeeding to Redcastle, and decree was obtained, first, in the Court of Session and afterwards in this House, reducing the sale. An accounting then commenced between the parties in right of Bargattan, which had now become a fee simple estate, and the heirs succeeding to Redcastle. The Court found, or at least proceeded on the assumption, that although the entailer's debts had been paid out of the price, and some of them not upon assignation, but upon discharge and renunciation, they were yet not extinguished, and accordingly they gave Mr. Sloane Lawrie's representatives, who had come also to possess the estate of Redcastle, relief of those entailer's debts against the heir of Bargattan, according to the relative value of that estate, the heir of Redcastle being liable for the remainder; and in like manner they found [1065] the heir of Bargattan liable in the money which had been expended in redeeming the land tax of that estate.

To show the injustice which would result from an opposite rule, suppose that the purchaser at the sale had himself been a previous creditor, and that in part payment of the price he had granted precisely such a deed of discharge in extinction of his debt over the general estate, as those upon which the appellant here founds, could it ever have been maintained that an heir of entail could set aside the sale, thereby depriving the purchaser of his lands, and at the same time withhold from the purchaser, in his quality of previous creditor, the right to have his original debt revived, and this forsooth upon the notable argument that because the heir who made the sale had taken a discharge and not an assignation, the debt was extinguished confusione? The price of the lands sold, or what is purchased with the price, whether land tax or previous debts or other lands or money securities, is to be regarded as constituting in some sort a surrogatum for the lands. The heir of entail who challenges the sale cannot have both the lands and their surrogatum. The party who is entitled to the surrogatum, the lands being re-vindicated, is not the party who gets back the lands, but the party with whom the lands were at the date of revindication, and from whom by force of that revindication they have since been taken. As between him and the heirs of entail revindicating the entailed estate, there can be no sort of question. The rule of law is universal: "Nemo debet ex aliena jactura lucrari" (Stair, b. 1, t. 8, s. 607. See to same effect, Ersk., b. 3, t. 1, s. 10 and 11; Bankton, b. 1, t. 9, s. 4; Pothier, tom. iv. p. 474-5 (Du Droit de Propriété, pp. 343-345)).

[1066] Upon the dependence of the present action, the respondents raised an inhibition against the appellants, dated 6th June and executed 7th June and 3d July, and registered 15th July 1828. When the judgment of the Court of Session, of 18th January 1833, was pronounced, the appellants presented an application for recall, on the ground, inter alia, that the judgment had sufficiently secured the right of the respondents to any debt which was due to them, and that the appellant had since succeeded to the estate of Wells, rented at £3000 per annum, which would also be affected by the inhibition; upon which the Court pronounced the following interlocutor (4th July 1833):—"The Lords, having heard counsel for the parties, refuse the desire of the petitioner; find expenses due to the respondents, and remit."

This interlocutor was also made the subject of a separate appeal.

The Lord Chancellor, after stating the import of the judgment of the House of Lords remitting the cause to the Court of Session, and the judgment of that Court thereupon, observed that the equity was clear in favour of the respondents, and nothing had been urged against the judgment appealed from which in any degree impeached its accuracy. His Lordship therefore moved an affirmance.

The House of Lords ordered and adjudged, That the said original appeal be and the same is hereby dismissed this House; and that the said interlocutor of the 31st of January (signed 2d June) 1837, by which the said interlocutor of the 18th of January (signed 7th February) 1833 was, upon [1067] the said remit from this House, recalled, be and the same is hereby affirmed: And it is further ordered and adjudged, that the said cross appeal be and the same is hereby dismissed this House.

REPORTS OF CASES determined in the House of Lords, on Appeals and Writs of Error from the Courts of England and Ireland, and Questions of Peerage, decided during the Sessions 1839, 1840, and 1841. By MARTIN JOHN WEST, Barrister-at-Law.

BARONY OF BRAYE.*

Sir HARRIS NICOLAS and Mr. LEWIS for Mrs. SARAH OTWAY CAVE, Claimant; Dr. LUSHINGTON and Mr. DENNES for Sir PERCIVAL HART DYKE, Claimant; The ATTORNEY GENERAL for the CROWN [15th August 1839].

[Mews' Dig. x. 311, 314, 316; S.C. 6 Cl. and F. 757, q.v. See also Parl. Pap. 1895, 272, p. 5.]

Evidence of Title to Peerage—Writ of Summons—Sitting in Parliament.—Held to be a settled rule in questions of peerage, that where it is proved, after a careful search of all the depositories in which a patent of peerage would have been likely to have been found, that there is no trace of any patent, the writ of summons, and sitting in Parliament by the ancestor under it, shall [2] be evidence of the title to the peerage descending to the heirs of the body, including females.

Attainder of Co-heir during Abeyance of Peerage—Forfeiture of Dignity by Descendants.—During the abeyance of a barony descendible to the heirs of the body, one of the co-heirs is attainted for treason; an Act of Parliament is afterwards passed for the restoration in blood of the children of such co-heir: Held (after consulting the judges) that the previous attainder of the co-heir did not effect a forfeiture of the abeyant barony, and that the Crown may determine the abeyance in favour of the descendant of such attainted co-heir.

The petition of Mrs. Sarah Otway Cave of Stanford Hall in the county of Leicester, widow, to His late Majesty, praying that His Majesty would be graciously pleased to determine the abeyance of the barony of Bray in her favour, by His Majesty's letters patent, or in such other manner as to His Majesty might seem proper, together with His Majesty's reference thereof to this House, and a report by the Attorney General thereon annexed; and also the petition of Sir Percival Hart Dyke of Lullingston Castle in the county of Kent, Baronet, praying that His Majesty would be pleased to determine the abeyance of the said barony in his favour, by directing a writ of summons to him to attend His Majesty in parliament by the style and title of Baron Bray; were severally referred to the Committee for Privileges.

The result of the evidence adduced was, that it appeared to the committee that Mrs. Otway Cave had proved her descent from Elizabeth, the second daughter of Edmund

* The Reporter was favoured with this and the following Peerage Case by Mr. Robinson.

Lord Braye, who appears to have sat in parliament in the reign of Henry the Eighth; and that the other claimant, Sir P. H. Dyke, appears also to [3] have made out his pedigree as descended from Frideswide, the third daughter and fourth child of that Edmund Lord Braye.

In the course of the investigation two questions of law occurred; one of these was held to have been settled by former cases,—as stated by their Lordships in their opinions postea; that is, that evidence of a sitting in this House under summons by writ, where it has been proved, on careful examination of all the depositories where a patent would have been likely to be found, that there is no trace of any patent, the summons, and a sitting under it, shall be evidence of the title to the peerage descending to the heirs of the body, including females.

The other question raised by the Attorney General, and which was argued in the presence of the judges, was this:—During the abeyance of this barony, descendible to the heirs of the body, one of the co-heirs was attainted for treason; an act of parliament was afterwards passed for the restoration in blood of the sons and daughters of the party attainted. Suppose A. claims the dignity through the co-heir who was so attainted, and B. claims through another co-heir, whether it is competent to the Crown to determine the abeyance in favour of A.; and, whether it is competent to the Crown to determine the abeyance in favour of B.

The arguments adduced, as well as the grounds on which the judges answered the questions in the affirmative, will be found in the following opinion delivered by the Lord Chief Justice Tindal:—

“During the abeyance of a barony descendible to heirs of the body one of the co-heirs was attainted for [4] treason; an act of parliament afterwards passed in the following terms:

"A. claims through the co-heir who was so attainted. B. claims through another co-heir.

"First. Is it competent for the Crown to determine the abeyance in favour of A.?

"Secondly. Is it competent for the Crown to determine the abeyance in favour of B.?"

The judges requested time to consider these questions.

The Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas delivered the unanimous opinions of the judges, in the words following; videlicet,

"My Lords, in the questions proposed by your Lordships' House to Her Majesty's judges, it is first supposed that during the abeyance of a barony descendible to the heirs of the body one of the co-heirs is attainted for treason; and after reference made to a certain act of parliament passed in the first year of [9] Queen Elizabeth, intituled 'An Act to restore in blood the sons and daughters of Edward Lewknor, Esquire,' it is further supposed that A. claims through the co-heir who was so attainted, and B. through another co-heir; and your Lordships then require the opinion of the judges on these two points; viz., first, is it competent for the Crown to determine the abeyance in favour of A.; and, secondly, is it competent for the Crown to determine the abeyance in favour of B. And although the consideration of the questions submitted to us involves some matters of curious learning, upon which no direct authority is to be found in the books, yet, looking at the principle by which we conceive the subject matter of those questions is to be governed, and reasoning by the analogy to be derived from the decisions of our courts of law, so far as they can be held to apply to inheritances of so peculiar a nature as those under consideration, and still further bearing in mind the decisions of this House on cases which have been brought before it, the judges,* who have heard the argument at your Lordships' bar, have arrived at the unanimous opinion that both the questions proposed to us are to be answered in the affirmative.

"My Lords, the general rule by which the abeyance of a dignity or title of honour is governed was not disputed at your Lordships' bar. It has been indeed the established and undoubted law upon this subject from a very early period of our history, that in the case of a barony descendible either to the heirs [10] general or to the heirs of the body, if the baron die, leaving only daughters or sisters or other co-heirs, the dignity is in abeyance so long as more than one of such co-heirs is in existence, but so nevertheless that the Crown, the sovereign of honour and dignity, may at any time during such abeyance determine it by conferring the dignity on whichever of the co-heirs it pleases; but if the Crown do not exercise such prerogative, and the lines of all the co-heirs but one become extinct, then the abeyance is at an end, and such only surviving co-heir is entitled as a matter of right to the enjoyment of the dignity. Lord Coke, indeed, in his First Institute, 165 a., seems to think that such has been the law from the time of the Conquest; but it has, at all events, been acted upon at the least as early as the reign of Henry the Sixth, who in the case of the Lord Cromwell dying without issue male, and leaving several daughters, preferred the youngest; and in more modern times this exercise of the royal prerogative has been repeatedly put in force, as, amongst many others, in the case of the earldom of Oxford in 1625, and that of the barony of Grey of Ruthin. (See Collins's Claims, etc., pp. 175, 248.) But the great contention at your Lordships' bar has turned, not upon the fact, but upon the nature and qualities of this abeyancy, and upon the legal consequences of the attainder of one of the co-heirs pending such abeyance; it being contended on the one part that the attainder of one co-heir operates as a forfeiture and extinguishment of the dignity as to all, and consequently as a restraint of the exercise of the royal prerogative in giving a preference to any of the unattainted co-heirs; whereas [11] it is argued on the part of the claimants, that it can have no effect whatever upon the unattainted line, but at the utmost restrains the Crown from conferring the dignity on any descendant in the attainted line so long as the corruption of blood by means of the attainer continues.

"Now, the argument upon which the forfeiture or total extinguishment of the dignity rests for its support is this, that the abeyance of a dignity means no more than that the person who shall enjoy it is at the time in uncertainty and expectation, not that the inheritance itself is in suspense, but that such inheritance in the meantime descends to and vests in all the co-heirs equally, and that the dignity being so vested jointly and equally in all the co-heirs, and being at the same time in its own nature indivisible and impartible, the attainder of one co-heir works the forfeiture of his share, and all the parts or shares in the barony being essential to the constitution of the dignity of baron, and one of them being forfeited, the whole becomes necessarily extinguished; and the authority which has been principally relied upon in support of these positions is the very learned speech of Lord Chief Justice Eyre when called upon to deliver the opinions of the judges in answer to the question proposed to them by this House in the year 1795 on occasion of a claim to the barony of Beaumont, in one part of which speech that learned person has expressed himself that 'the title of the co-heirs of a barony is that of unus hæres and unum corpus—it is unitas juris—they must take it, and it must vest in them as the heir of the ancestors.'

"Now, before entering upon any discussion of the [12] points submitted to us, it is to be observed that this dictum of Lord Chief Justice Eyre, upon which so great reliance has been placed, was not in any way necessary for the determination of the question put upon that occasion by your Lordships' House to the judges. The question submitted to them was, whether, supposing the claimant to have proved himself one of the co-heirs of the barony of Beaumont, he was then entitled of right to the barony, or, in other words, whether one of two co-heirs was a complete heir to the ancestor; a question which the judges necessarily answered in the negative. But this answer must equally have been given by them whether the dignity had vested in the co-heirs, or whether it had, by means of its being in abeyance, become vested in the Crown; in either case the answer to the question must have been that the one co-heir was not the complete heir so as to claim the barony as a matter of right. The observation, therefore, to whatever weight it may be entitled as coming from so able a judge, is not to be considered as bearing the same stamp of authority as the opinion of the judges expressed on the very point on which they were called to advise.

"Now, it is obvious that the whole strength of the position advanced by the Attorney General must depend on these two data: First, that when a barony is in abeyance the share of each co-heir in such barony descends to and vests in such co-heir; and, secondly, that the attainder of any one co-heir operates as a forfeiture of the part so vested in him; for if either of these data fail,—if, on the one hand, such be the nature of the abeyance of a dignity that it causes the dignity to revert to or be in the Crown, or, in the [13] language of the old books, to exist in contemplation of law only, instead of vesting in the co-heirs, as is the case with lands and other descendible hereditaments, it is manifest there can be no forfeiture by the co-heir of that which was not in him at the time of the attainder; and again, even admitting that the share of this impartible dignity did upon the abeyance taking place descend to and vest in the co-heir, still, if his interest is not a right of such nature or description as can be the subject of forfeiture, in either case the consequence which has been deduced from the premises, that the whole dignity is extinguished or gone, becomes altogether untenable.

"In order, therefore, to arrive at a just conclusion on the questions put to us, it may be advisable to consider, in the first place, the properties of the abeyance of a dignity, and the legal consequences which flow from such abeyance; and, in the next place, how far any right or interest which can by possibility vest in the co-heir pending the abeyance is capable by law of being the subject matter of forfeiture.

"My Lords, all the instances found in the books of the inheritance in land or other tenements being in abeyance have this common property, that there is no person in existence who is capable of taking. Tenant for term of another life dies; the freehold is said to be in abeyance until the occupant enters. Lease for life, remainder to the right heirs of J. S.; the fee simple is in abeyance till J. S. dies. (Co. Litt. 342 b.) If the parson of a church dies, the freehold of the glebe is in none during the time the parsonage is void, but in abeyance, viz., in consideration and in the under-[14]standing of the law, until another be made parson of the same church; and immediately when another is made parson the freehold indeed is in him as successor. (Littleton, s. 647.) And it is an admitted consequence, that where the right to the fee simple is in such abeyance that by possibility it may every hour come in esse, there the fee simple cannot be charged, granted, or forfeited until it come in esse. Lease for life, remainder to the right heirs of J. S., the fee simple cannot be charged till J. S. be dead (Co. Litt. 343); or, as is stated in Termes de la Ley, title Abeyance, after one comes in existence to take it is no longer in abeyance, but in such sort 'that the right heir may grant, forfeit, or otherwise dispose of the same.'

"Further, the peculiar nature of the inheritance in a dignity or title of honour has an important bearing on the question, whether it is capable of vesting in co-heirs. That lands and tenements of inheritance vest in co-heirs is undeniable; the law of parcenary is too well known to make it necessary to advert to it; but in all the instances in which inheritances are stated in our books to vest in co-heirs, that is, in several persons making together one heir, it will be found the hereditament is always capable of being actually enjoyed by the co-heirs. Land may be either held and enjoyed by all the co-heirs jointly, or, after partition made, by each co-heir in severalty. Where the tenements are in their nature entire and indivisible, as in the case of advowsons, the co-heirs may enjoy by appointing to the living in turn, according to their seniority. If under the ancient law a villein had descended to the co-heirs, either the [15] profits were divided, or one co-heir had the services of the villein for one week, the other for the next. In the case of common without number, or piscary, estovers, and the like, the eldest co-heir shall take, and the rest shall have contribution; or if the eldest cannot make contribution, there shall be an allotment made to the one for so long time, and afterwards to the others; and so as to a mill or a toll. But in all these cases the subject matter is capable of actual permanency and enjoyment, and it is absolutely necessary for the purpose of having such enjoyment that it should descend to and vest in the co-heirs; the inheritance therefore descends upon them, and they settle and arrange the mode of enjoyment amongst themselves. But far different is the case of a dignity; it is an inheritance which is peculiarly sui generis; it is not only in its nature impartible amongst the co-heirs, but in its undivided state utterly incapable of being enjoyed by any one co-heir. They cannot all take the barony; no one can take it by law in preference to another; nor is there any mode, by mutual arrangement, concession, or otherwise, by which all can enable any individual co-heir to wear the dignity. The reason, therefore, fails for holding that they take the inheritance of the barony, when they cannot take it for any available purpose. And this consideration at the same time fortifies and confirms the doctrine of abeyance as understood in ancient times, which places the inheritance anywhere rather than in the co-heirs.

"And this mode of reasoning agrees with the law laid down by Lord Coke (1st Institute, 165 a), viz., 'that the King, who is the sovereign of honour and [16] dignity, may, for the uncertainty, confer the dignity upon which of the daughters he pleases;' and again with that of Whitlocke, who says, 'the King may revive the honour in the issue of either, or suffer it to lie in abeyance or unrevived;' language which of itself seems to import that the dignity has not vested in any of the co-heirs: for he that has the power to confer must already have the dignity in himself before and at the time of his so conferring it; whereas if the dignity was already vested in others it must first be divested out of those co-heirs, before, in strictness of language, the sovereign would be in a condition to confer it. The writ of summons, or the patent, according as the co-heir is a male or female, must, on that supposition, have a double operation, one of which is very foreign to their nature, namely, that of divesting the inheritance in the dignity out of the several co-heirs, except as to the one who is favoured and preferred, and uniting the different shares in him.

"Looking, therefore, at the peculiar description and properties of a dignity or name of nobility, there appears nothing in the nature of the inheritance, or in reason, that should, a priori, cause it to descend to and vest in co-heirs who are altogether incapable of taking in the only way in which the subject matter can be enjoyed, that is, by wearing the dignity; and, on the contrary, it would seem much more suitable to its nature, and more consonant to reason, that when it has arrived in the stream of descent at a point beyond which it can no longer proceed in its regular course, when it is confessedly by all in a state of abeyance, that it should revert to and so long [17] as such abeyance continues remain in the Crown, that fountain of honour from which it originally proceeded.

"But there is an authority on this subject entitled to the greatest weight, and proving that this doctrine does not rest upon speculation and argument alone; I allude to the judgment in the case of the claims of the Lord Willoughby of Eresby and the Earl of Oxford to the great office of lord chamberlain, and the baronies of Bulbeck, Sandford, and Badlesmere. In that case the judges certify to your lordships' house, 'that John, the fifth Earl of Oxford, dying without issue, those baronies descended upon his sisters and heirs, but these dignities being entire, and not dividable, they became incapable of the same, otherwise than by gift from the Crown, and they, in strictness of law, reverted unto and were in the disposition of King Henry the Eighth.' Coll. Claims, 175, Sir W. Im. 96. And again, in a further opinion, the language employed by the same eminent judges is this, 'That by the death of Earl John in 18 Henry the Eighth (Coll. p. 180) without issue, leaving three sisters, those honours returned to the Crown in strict construction of law;' and thereupon this House agreed, 'That the three baronies are in His Majesty's disposition;' and in the formal certificate delivered to the King of the opinion of this House they say, 'That for the baronies they are wholly in Your Majesty's hands, to dispose at Your own pleasure.' Jour. vol. cxi. p. 552. Now, although it must be admitted that the generality of this certificate, which perhaps exceeded in its application what was intended by the learned judges [18] themselves, has been in subsequent cases qualified and limited by restraining the power of the Crown to that of selecting one amongst the co-heirs, and again, in another particular, viz., that the co-heirs being reduced to one, such surviving co-heir has the right; still the main ground of the decision, viz., that the dignity had reverted to the Crown, remains altogether unshaken; and the inference to be drawn from that judgment is, that where all have equal pretence, and no one can claim ex debito, that the dignity is to be considered as in the Crown.

"And as to the objection urged by Mr. Attorney General, that there must of necessity be an actual descent and vesting in the co-heirs, for on no other supposition could the only surviving co-heir claim a writ of summons as a matter of right, the answer may well be, that when the number is reduced to one the only reason and cause of any suspension or abeyance is at an end, and that the reason ceasing, the consequence also ceases, and the whole entire and impartible dignity may then be well supposed to fall upon the complete heir, as in the usual course of descent.

"Now if it be the law that the barony does not descend to the co-heirs, and vest in each in separate parts and shares, there is at once an answer to the question, whether whilst the dignity is in abeyance the attainder of one of the co-heirs shall operate as a forfeiture or extinguishment of such dignity; for upon that supposition there was nothing in the person attainted which could become the subject of forfeiture; the whole had reverted to the Crown for the preservation of the title until the co-heirs were reduced to one, or until the Crown in the meantime declared [19] a preference privatio prae-supponit habitum, and on the supposition above made the party who was attainted had nothing in the dignity to forfeit.

"But, my Lords, conceding, for the sake of argument, and for that purpose only, that pending the abeyance the inheritance in the dignity had descended to and amongst the several co-heirs in the same manner as any other inheritance, still no authority has been cited in support of the position that the attainder of one co-heir would operate as a forfeiture of the whole dignity. It is evident from the old authorities that in the case of land a co-heir attainted of felony or treason forfeits the share descended to him, and that share only. If the other co-heirs sue, and there is a plea in abatement that one of the co-heirs is not joined as a co-demandant, those who are demandants may reply, 'that he need not be joined, for that he has committed felony, so that he is not a parcener.' (Fleta, cap. 48, De exceptione ex omissione participis.) If, therefore, the inheritance had descended, and had been considered as partible, the attainder of one co-heir could not have operated as a forfeiture of the title to the shares vested in the other co-heirs. And if such be the law in case of partible inheritances, it would surely be a strange conclusion, that because, from the peculiar nature of a dignity, it is impartible, therefore the whole should be forfeited by the attainder of one. Forfeiture is always odious in the eye of the law, and the inference, at once more just and more consistent with the genius of our law, would be, that where the inheritance is impartible, on that very account there should be no forfeiture at all, inasmuch as the opposite determina-[20]-tion would confound in one common punishment the innocent with the guilty.

"But, my Lords, it should be further considered whether the interest which devolves upon each co-heir pending the abeyancy, supposing the dignity not to revert to the Crown, is of such nature and description as to be the subject of forfeiture either by common law or statute. That all dignities or titles of honour, whatever be the estate in them, are forfeited and lost by the attainder of the possessor for high treason, is undoubted law. 'Is it not'—as has been justly asked by Mr. Charles Yorke in his Considerations on the Law of Forfeiture (p. 30)—'both natural and politic that a distinction bestowed only for the praise of them who do well should be forfeitable on the commission of crimes, for a terror to evildoers?' But neither by common law or statute did the law of forfeiture comprehend within its limit any such right as that which is supposed to exist in the attainted co-heir, or any right bearing any analogy to it. At common law the only real estate which was forfeited by attainder for treason were all the lands of inheritance whereof the offender was seised in his own right, and all rights of entry to lands in the hands of a wrongdoer; and under the statutes 26th Henry the Eighth, cap. 13, and 33d Henry the Eighth, cap. 20, such forfeiture was made to extend to estates tail vested in possession; but it has always been held, that neither by common law or statute was a mere right of action to lands in the hands of a stranger, as for instance in the hands of a discontinuee, or of the heir of the disseisor, forfeitable by attainder for treason. (Coke Littleton, 8, 3, Co. 2, 3, Hob. [21] Rep. 240.) But how far does the interest which is in the attainted co-heir at the time of the attainder fall short of a right of action? It is a part or portion only of the title of co-heir to the dignity, giving the possessor of it at the utmost a jus precarium, a mere power of asking from the grace and favour of the sovereign that the abeyant dignity may be conferred upon him, with the distant chance that in case all the other lines should fail the attainted co-heir may, in case the corruption of blood be removed, wear the dignity himself.

"Other considerations, of a nature perfectly distinct, range themselves on the same side of the question, and strengthen the inference that no forfeiture of the dignity can under the circumstances assumed take place. To hold that the dignity is extinguished or forfeited, whilst it remains with the Crown by an exercise of its prerogative to revive it, and confer that dignity on one of the innocent co-heirs, what is it in effect but to abridge and limit such prerogative of the Crown, and to operate more as a penalty upon the innocent co-heirs, than on the guilty offender! And I must confess I feel strongly the weight of the observation which has been made at your Lordships' bar, that if the attainder of one of the co-heirs of a barony whilst it is in abeyance causes the extinguishment or forfeiture of the abeyant barony, it must be matter of very considerable doubt whether such an attainder, after the abeyance has been determined, and the barony revived by the Crown, must not be attended with a similar consequence, for it is one and the same dignity, whether it is in abeyance or in possession; and, upon all just principles of reasoning, the continued existence of such dignity must be held to depend equally in both cases upon the same title, and the same connexion with the deceased ancestor.

"But I forbear to pursue the consideration of these additional arguments, because, as it appears to me, the very principle now under discussion, viz., that the attainder of one of the co-heirs shall not operate as a bar to one claiming through another of the co-heirs to the dignity, has been virtually adopted and acted upon by your Lordships' House in several cases. I refer to the case of the Powys barony, where John Gray, the descendant of one of the co-heirs of Edward Charleton Lord Powys, was summoned to parliament in the 22d Edward the Fourth, after the attainder and before the restoration in blood of John Lord Tiptoft, the other co-heir, enjoying upon that writ of summons the seat and precedence of his ancestor.

"I refer again to that of the barony of Beaumont, in the first petition of the claimant, to which barony he made title as sole heir, upon the ground that the attainder of the other co-heir had extinguished that line, and which petition gave occasion to the learned discussion of Lord Chief Justice Eyre, before referred to. Upon the occasion of his second petition he stated his title as one of the co-heirs of Henry the first Baron Beaumont, by his descent through Joan Lady Stapleton, Sir Henry Norreys, the son of Frideswide, the other co-heir of the barony, having been attainted and executed in the 28th year of Henry the Eighth. Upon this second petition the report of the very learned Attorney General of the day, Sir John Scott, raises no difficulty as to the extinguishment or forfeiture of the barony, but simply [23] states it to be in abeyance; and the committee of this House, after argument before Lord Loughborough, the then Lord Chancellor, came to the resolution, which was afterwards reported to the House, 'That it appears to this committee that the said barony remains in abeyance between the co-heirs of the said William descended from his sister Joan ;' which resolution was received and adopted by this House.

"My Lords, such being the grounds upon which the rights of the co-heir in the unattainted line depend, it remains only to make an observation upon the legal operation and effect of the act 1 Eliz., No. 22, to which your Lordships' question makes reference, with regard to the rights that may be claimed by the co-heir in the attainted line.

"And, my Lords, it appears by this statute that nothing that had been lost by the attainer has been restored to the descendants of the attainted person, but that the corruption of blood is so completely removed thereby that the heir may claim through his attainted ancestor as if no attainder had taken place. That the previous attainder of the co-heir effected no forfeiture of the abeyant barony has been already so fully discussed as to make it unnecessary to state more than that the descendant of such attainted co-heir may claim the right of petitioning Her Majesty that she would terminate the abeyance of the barony by giving the preference to the line of such petitioner, in the same manner as if his ancestor had never been attainted.

"Upon the whole, although I should not be justified in making my learned brethren responsible for the [24] precise grounds upon which I have endeavoured to support their opinion and my own, yet I have their full authority to declare our unanimous answer to the questions proposed to us, as follows:

"1st. That it is competent to the Crown to determine the abeyance in favour of A.

"2d. That it is competent for the Crown to determine the abeyance in favour of B."

The Committee having resumed consideration of the claims, the following opinions were (15th August 1839) expressed by their Lordships:—

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this case, since it was heard before your Lordships, has been the subject of anxious consideration by several noble Lords who took a part in the discussion. I have thought it my duty to look carefully into the pedigree, and the result is, that I am satisfied, as far as I can be satisfied after an investigation of transactions as far back as this investigation necessarily leads one, that the claimant, Mrs. Otway Cave, has proved her descent from Elizabeth, the second daughter of Edmund Lord Braye, who appears to have sat in parliament in the reign of Henry the Eighth.

My Lords, another party is also a claimant, and whose claim has been referred by the Crown to the consideration of this House; and that other party, Sir Percival Hart Dyke, appears also to have made out his pedigree as descended from Frideswide, the third daughter and fourth child of that Edmund Lord Braye.

My Lords, in the investigation of this claim two questions of law have been raised: with respect to the [25] one, it is not now raised for the first time, but, on the contrary, it has been raised in several other cases, and has received that decision from this House which I apprehend for the present purpose is to be considered as putting that question at rest. I refer to the effect of the evidence of a sitting in this House under summons by writ, where it has been proved, on careful examination of all the depositories where the patent would have been likely to have been found, that there is no trace of any patent. The last case that came before your Lordships under these circumstances was the Vaux case, in which the preceding cases were very carefully reviewed; and the result was, that your Lordships adopted in that case the resolution which had been adopted in some of the preceding cases,—that where the summons, and a sitting under it, are satisfactorily made out, it is evidence of the title to the peerage descending to heirs of the body including females. That is the nature of the title made out by the present claimants as descending from Edmund Lord Braye.

My Lords, another question also which had been discussed in former cases arose in this case; namely, the effect of an attainder on one of the line of co-heirs. In a case which occurred some years ago an opinion of very high legal authority was expressed, that the effect of that attainder might be fatal to the claim of the co-heirs. My Lords, I confess that I never could enter into the grounds on which that opinion was supposed to have been entertained; and your Lordships, probably feeling a doubt as to the accuracy of that opinion, had the benefit of having that point discussed before the learned judges in the course of the present session, and whose [26] opinion has been delivered by the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. My Lords, the unanimous opinion of the judges, delivered by the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, appears to me to put the question entirely at rest. The grounds on which the learned judges came to the conclusion which has been communicated to your Lordships appear to me satisfactorily to remove those doubts which existed, I believe, only in the expression of the opinion of a great legal authority. Undoubtedly, if your Lordships shall concur in the view taken in the opinion as delivered by the learned judges, that second difficulty is removed out of the way.

Those difficulties being removed, we then come to the result; and, if your Lordships shall be of opinion with me, that Mrs. Otway Cave has made out her title of descent from Elizabeth the second daughter of Edmund Lord Braye, and that the other claimant, Sir Percival Hart Dyke, has made out his claim from Frideswide the daughter next younger in succession, then the only question which will remain will be what report your Lordships shall make to the Crown with respect to the descendants of the other daughters of that Edmund Lord Braye. My Lords, there are several parties who appear to be descended from the other daughters. The eldest daughter appears to have been Anne, and there are several parties who are now represented as being co-heirs of Anne. The present Duke of Bedford also appears to be descended from a younger daughter, and Sir Francis Vincent is represented to be a descendant of, I think, the youngest.

My Lords, various courses have been adopted in former investigations of this case, as to the report which [27] the committee of this House should make to the Crown upon the subject of the collateral branches, where there are, as in the present case, parties who have not claimed, but whose pedigrees have been investigated by the parties who do claim, in order that the Crown may be informed, as far as such an inquiry can lead to a satisfactory conclusion, as to the fact, what descendants there are who stand in the situation of co-heirs, as well as the claimants whose claims are referred to this House. My Lords, the history of those various lines has been to a very great degree satisfactorily made out; but it is not to be expected that parties making out the pedigree of another family should be enabled so accurately to trace the history of that family as of course they must be called upon to do when making out the pedigree of the line under which they claim; and the parties are not here themselves to make any claim. The sole object, therefore, of that investigation is to obtain knowledge, with a view to communicate to the Crown what persons there are standing in the same relative situation as those who make the claim, that the Crown, before it exercises a discretion whether it shall determine the abeyance at all, or, if it shall determine the abeyance at all, in favour of whom it shall be determined, may be informed of the state of the different parties who are descended from the common ancestor from whom the title is derived. I think that, though the evidence of the various lines is not so conclusive as to justify a report stating that they are descendants, there is sufficient evidence before your Lordships to enable you to report to the Crown so much as may be necessary to enable the Crown to exercise its discretion on the subject of those several lines: there is danger of saying too [28] much, because the sort of investigation which has been gone into is necessarily imperfect, in consequence of the absence of those parties.

My Lords, I observe there are four different modes in which a report has been framed; in some cases it has been reported that there appear to be descendants of the several persons from whom their descent is claimed; there are others in which the report has identified the individuals who appeared to make out their descent in those several lines; but with respect to those who have not claimed, and who are not therefore candidates, it can hardly be supposed that the Crown will exercise its discretion in favour of either of those parties. It seems, therefore, necessary to say no more than that there appear to be descendants proved of the several lines whose pedigree has been brought before your Lordships by those who are candidates, and have applied to the Crown to terminate the abeyance in their favour. Upon the whole, it appears to me the safer course, instead of pronouncing any opinion on those collateral pedigrees, to report merely that there appear to be descendants living of several females through whom their lines are traced. That report will be quite sufficient if it shall become material to prosecute that inquiry further, and will relieve your Lordships from the giving any opinion as to facts which have not been sufficiently examined in the investigation before your Lordships to enable you to come to a satisfactory result. What I should propose, therefore, to your Lordships is, to resolve that it appears that the barony was a barony by writ descendible to females as well as males; that it is in abeyance between the co-heirs of John the eldest son of Edmund Lord Braye, which John Lord Braye sat in parliament [29] in the 31st of Henry the 8th; that Mrs. Otway Cave has made out her claim of descent from Elizabeth the second daughter of Edmund Lord Braye; that Sir Percival Hart Dyke has made out his descent from Frideswide the third daughter of Edmund Lord Braye; and that it appears that there are descendants living of Anne the eldest daughter of that Edmund Lord Braye, and also of his two youngest daughters. It appears to be quite sufficient to state the fact of there being descendants living of those several lines, without specifying the individuals who appear upon the evidence to stand most likely in the situation of descendants of those lines.

Lord Wynford:—My Lords, I entirely agree in the opinion expressed by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack. The two claimants, Sir Percival Hart Dyke and Mrs. Otway Cave, have satisfactorily, in my opinion, made out their claims. With respect to the others, I have not sufficiently attended to their cases to say whether their pedigrees are proved or not. In one of the cases I am quite convinced the pedigree is not proved. Those will very properly be left by the report in such a state that if those who are interested should think proper to bring them forward they may have their claims considered.

As to the points of law, it certainly is an anomaly that a person who has a grant from the Crown without any words of limitation should have any estate beyond his own life, yet in peerage cases it has been established that a person who is summoned to parliament, though only for one parliament, and who takes his seat, thereby [30] becomes a baron in fee, and it is now too late to dispute that law.

As to the point which was raised by the Attorney General, that the attainder of the descendants of one of the co-heirs forfeits the whole peerage, I am of opinion that that person had nothing in him which he could forfeit at the time of the attainder; if he had there probably might be some ground for saying, that as a part of the peerage was gone by that attainder all that remained was not sufficient to constitute a peer. Perhaps, as the learned Chief Justice, whose excellent opinion your Lordships have received, has said, there was nothing at that time in any of the claimants, and there will be nothing till the Crown thinks proper by its prerogative to confer it. I think it appears clearly from the passage cited by the Lord Chief Justice from Lord Coke, that where there is nothing to forfeit, and that there is nothing to forfeit in such cases as these, there an attainder cannot work an annihilation of the peerage.

As far as regards corruption of blood, or the placing a party in such a situation that nothing can be transmitted through him, that has been completely taken away by the statute to which we have been referred by the Lord Chief Justice. I also think that the statute of Anne would have been sufficient in this case to have prevented the corruption of blood, stopping a portion of the peerage from descending through the corrupted ancestor. There may be some doubt whether the words of that statute apply to attainders that took place before the passing of the act, but in such cases as these the words are to receive the mildest construction; and [31] though I do not think that that statute could restore a forfeiture which was complete before the passing of the act, yet I think the words may be so construed as to prevent the attainder from operating to stop the descent of any peerage through the attainted person. For these reasons, my Lords, I concur with the Lord Chancellor in recommending to your Lordships the resolution which he has proposed to you.

Earl of Devon:—My Lords, having attended throughout the discussion of this claim, and had an opportunity of talking with my noble and learned friend upon it, if I had felt any difference of opinion in the result to which he has come I should have felt it my duty to state it; but I am of opinion that Mrs. Otway Cave and Sir Percival Hart Dyke have made out their claims as representing the two co-heirs from whom they respectively derive. Upon the point of law it is not necessary to say any thing; the point to which my noble and learned friend who spoke last has referred has been now so many years settled law that we cannot entertain any question upon it at present. There arose in a previous case the question, not merely whether a sitting under a writ created a peerage in fee, but whether in a case where the writ was not produced this House could look to other evidence and decide that there was that which would give a barony in fee; that question also has been decided, and it is not now, I think, open to us to entertain or express any doubt on the propriety of that decision. The points of law, I conceive, are decidedly in favour of the existence of this peerage in those persons who represent the co-heirs of [32] Edmund Lord Braye as descending from the sisters of John Lord Braye.

My Lords, with respect to the form in which the resolutions are to be entered on claims of this nature, it has always struck me that there is a very great difficulty in the general way of putting them, and I suppose that difficulty has struck other persons, because unquestionably the resolutions vary; there is no strict rule as to the form of the resolutions. If you do not make some investigation into the titles of all the co-heirs you do not give the Crown that information which the sovereign is entitled to when it has made a reference to you with respect to an honour; but, on the other hand, if you call upon the claimant appearing at your bar to make out all the pedigrees of the other co-heirs, you impose a great difficulty upon that co-heir, to bring proof of three or four or five lines without having those opportunities and those facilities which the parties themselves would have of making out their pedigree. In the choice of those difficulties, I approve of the course which my noble and learned friend has proposed to your Lordships to take, as the most judicious; namely, to state an opinion upon those two lines, in respect of which claimants appear before the House, and then just to state enough to give to the sovereign notice that there are in existence other persons who claim to be co-heirs with those who have established their pedigrees. It is then for the sovereign to exercise a discretion, either to determine the abeyance in favour of A. or B., or to consider the existence of other co-heirs as a reason for not determining it. Having such information on the whole case as we have [33] given, I am of opinion that the two who have claimed have made out their claim as co-heirs, and that there are others who probably would be able to make it out, if they were to give their evidence. In both the substance, therefore, and the form of the resolutions I entirely concur.

The resolution, as moved by the Lord Chancellor, passed in the affirmative, and the chairman was directed to report the same to the House.

15th August 1839:—It was moved to resolve, "That the barony is now in abeyance between the co-heirs of John the last Lord Braye, and that the petitioner Sarah Otway Cave, and the petitioner Sir Percival Hart Dyke baronet, with certain others, are the co-heirs of the said John Lord Braye."

On the question being put, it was resolved in the affirmative, and the chairman was directed to report the same to the House.

[34]

BARONY OF CAMOYS.

Mr. FLEMING for THOMAS STONOR, Claimant. SOLICITOR GENERAL for Sir JACOB ASTLEY Baronet, and HENRY L'ESTRANGE STYLEMAN Esquire, Claimants. The ATTORNEY GENERAL for the CROWN [27th August 1839].

[Mews' Dig. vi. 698; x. 313. S.C. 6 Cl. and F. 789, q.v.]

The result of the evidence of the pedigrees of these several claimants will be found in the resolutions moved by the Lord Chancellor, and approved by the committee, postea, pages 39, 40.

Two points of law and practice in questions of peerage, similar to those determined in the preceding case of the barony of Braye, (see Report, ante, page 24,) were determined in like manner by the committee in the present case.

It was likewise held that the term "banneret" being added to a name in a writ, will not prevent a barony by writ being established upon the usual evidence.

The following opinion was expressed by the Lord Chancellor:—

Lord Chancellor:—My Lords, in this case your Lordships have had to inquire into various claims which [35] are made to a peerage, the origin of which peerage cannot be traced, excepting that the individual from whom the claimants derive their descent is proved to have sat as a peer in this House; this House having held, under those circumstances where no writ can be found, but where there is proof of the ancestor having sat in this House, that the presumption is that he was summoned by writ; and if summoned by writ, and sitting under the writ, then that the peerage is descendible to heirs general of the body.

My Lords, in this case there is no doubt that Thomas Lord Camoys sat in this House. Some question has been raised, owing to an expression having been used in a writ to the sheriff in the seventh of Richard the Second, in which Sir Thomas Camoys is described as a banneret, and much investigation has been had for the purpose, on the one side, of showing to your Lordships that a banneret might have sat in this House at that period of our history who was not a baron, and, on the other side, for the purpose of showing that the words baron and banneret are synonymous, and have the same meaning: that banneret was not an order of knighthood, but descriptive of a baron, according to the language of those times.

My Lords, certainly the history of the term banneret is not very satisfactory. There is a great uncertainty as to its original meaning; but when your Lordships find the fact of this Thomas Lord Camoys having sat in several parliaments, and that other individuals, who are ancestors of families now sitting in this House,—who are peers, were bannerets, I think the circumstance of the [36] appellation of banneret having been added to his name in that writ is not such as ought to prevent your Lordships coming to the conclusion to which you have come in other cases,—of the barony having been a barony by writ, descendible to the heirs general of that Thomas Lord Camoys.

My Lords, another question arose in this case, which also arose in a case in which your Lordships have made a report, namely, the case of the Braye Peerage, in consequence of one in the line of the co-heirs having been attainted. My Lords, I do not again advert to that point; it was the subject for consideration and of argument before the learned judges, and your Lordships have had the unanimous opinion of all the learned judges who were present at that discussion, entirely agreeing with the opinion which I myself formed from the arguments at your Lordships bar, that that is no impediment to the claim either of the collateral branches, or even of those who claim through the attainted line, the corruption of blood having been removed by act of parliament.

My Lords, this case really, therefore, resolves itself into a question of pedigree; and in all cases of this sort there always must be, from the nature of the case, a considerable degree of doubt as to whether what appears to be evidence of pedigree be or be not satisfactorily made out. If it appears to be satisfactorily made out according to the evidence as it stands, it may satisfy your Lordships minds that the pedigree is proved; but in all cases of pedigree so much depends not only upon the evidence which is produced, but upon that which is [37] lost by the lapse of time, that it is always attended with a great degree of uncertainty; and all which your Lordships can do is to come to the best conclusion which you can, always feeling that there may be something behind which, if produced, would alter the proof.

My Lords, having looked into the proof of this pedigree with the attention which the importance of the subject requires, and which, from the difficulty of tracing the descent from so early a period, necessarily becomes incumbent upon those whose duty it is to investigate the title of a claimant, it does appear to me that the pedigree has been proved; that is to say, that, on the evidence as it now stands, your Lordships cannot come to any other conclusion than that the claimant Mr. Stonor has made out his claim, which he places under your Lordships consideration, and has established his descent from that Thomas Lord Camoys.

My Lords, another co-heir is Anthony George Wright Biddulph, who is not a claimant, but whose title and pedigree it becomes your Lordships duty to investigate, for the purpose of ascertaining and reporting to the Crown between whom the abeyance now exists. That pedigree, which is also a branch from the same family as Mr. Stonor, is, I think, also satisfactorily made out. These two parties derive their title from Margaret, who was the eldest grand-daughter of Thomas Lord Camoys.

There is another branch of the family who derive their title from the younger sister of that Margaret, namely, Henry L'Estrange Styleman and Sir Jacob [38] Astley, and I think that those lines of pedigree are also proved. Mr. Styleman, however, appears to derive his descent from an elder sister; therefore, as between themselves, Mr. Styleman claims through a senior branch.

My Lords, so far it appears to me to be not open to any objection according to the evidence as it stands. There are other parties, one of whom is a claimant, namely, Sophia De la Cainea. That descent is derived from another branch, namely, from another sister of Margaret the grand-daughter of Thomas Lord Camoys, Alianora; and as far as that pedigree is necessary to be investigated for the purpose of tracing the descent to the claimant, Sophia De la Cainea, it appears to me that that also is satisfactorily made out. There is evidence, and I think satisfactory evidence, that there are other descendants of that Alianora. Those parties are not claimants, and that is the most difficult part of the pedigree, and that upon which the evidence has been the least satisfactory. My Lords, it is not important to inquire further into that line, because they are not claimants; and all that your Lordships have to do is, to be enabled to report to the Crown whether the title is in abeyance between the parties who have made out their pedigree, and whether there is reason to suppose that there are other persons who may stand in an equal degree with themselves. Upon that subject I should recommend your Lordships to adopt the course which you adopted a few days since in the Braye Peerage,—of not passing any judgment or expressing any opinion as to the title of the other lines, respecting which there is no claim made; that your Lordships [39] should report the pedigree proved as far as the claimants are concerned, and state also that there are other persons who appear to be co-heirs. And, my Lords, that is indisputably necessary, for the purpose of enabling the Crown to exercise the discretion which belongs to it after your Lordships shall have reported, at the same time not to express any opinion upon evidence which does not appear so satisfactory as your Lordships would require, if it were necessary to come to any certain conclusion as to the title of those branches.

My Lords, the result of the consideration I have given to this case would be, to submit to your Lordships certain resolutions which would constitute your Lordships' report upon the reference made by the Crown:

"First, that Thomas Lord Camoys sat in parliament in the seventh of Richard the second: that his barony was created by writ, and was descendible to heirs general: that he had an only son, Richard, who died in his father's lifetime; who had an only son, who died a minor: that Margaret and Alianora, the two daughters, and Richard the son of the said Thomas Lord Camoys were his co-heirs: that Thomas Stonor has proved his descent from Margaret, the eldest of those co-heirs; and it also appears that Anthony George Wright Biddulph is also descended from the same Margaret, Thomas Stonor being descended from Mary the eldest daughter of John Biddulph, who died in 1720, and the said Anthony George Wright Biddulph being descended from Anne, the youngest daughter of the same John Biddulph: that it has [40] also been proved that Henry L'Estrange Styleman and Sir Jacob Astley are also descended from the same Margaret, the grand-daughter of the said Thomas Lord Camoys, through Sibella, a younger grand-daughter and co-heir of the said Margaret: that the said Thomas Stonor and Anthony George Wright Biddulph derive their descent through Margaret, the eldest grand-daughter of the said Margaret; and that the said Henry L'Estrange Styleman derives his descent through Armine, eldest daughter of Sir Nicholas L'Estrange, the common ancestor of the said Henry L'Estrange Styleman and Sir Jacob Astley; and the said Sir Jacob Astley derives his descent through Lucy, the youngest daughter of the said Sir Nicholas L'Estrange: that it appears that Sophia De la Cainea is descended from Alianora, the youngest grand-daughter of the said Thomas Lord Camoys; and that there are other co-heirs of the said Alianora now living."

That, I believe, exhausts the subject which has been referred to your Lordships, and puts the Crown in possession of all the information necessary to be given.

Resolutions agreed to.

27th August 1839:—It was moved to resolve, "That the barony is now in abeyance between the co-heirs of Thomas Lord Camoys; and that the petitioner Thomas Stonor esquire, the petitioner Henry L'Estrange Styleman esquire, the petitioner Sir Jacob Astley baronet, and the petitioner Sophia the widow and [41] relict of the most illustrious Chevalier Ferdinand Joseph Francis Raibaud Della Cainea, with certain others, are the co-heirs of the said Thomas Lord Camoys."

On the question being put, it was resolved in the affirmative, and the chairman was directed to report the same to the House.

FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

EDMUND LOWDEN, THOMAS MATTINGLEY, WILLIAM BUDD, GEORGE BLISS, and CHARLES COWPER, Appellants.—The Reverend HENRY THORPE, Clerk, Respondent [27th January, 3d and 6th February, 1840].

[Mews' Dig. ix. 30; xi. 892. S.C. 7, Cl. and F. 137.]

By an agreement of 1711 between Mr. Plowden the patron and Mr. Wilson the rector of the church of Aston, the patron agreed to convey lands of the annual value of £130 and to grant a rent-charge of £40 a year for the benefit of the church, and the rector agreed to convey glebe lands of the value of £40 a year to Mr. Plowden, and to exempt other lands belonging to Mr. Plowden from the payment of tithes of the value of £56 a year. This agreement, being under a commission found beneficial to the church, was afterwards sanctioned by the ordinary, and established by a decree of the Court of Chancery, in a suit to which the patron, ordinary, proprietor, and rector were parties. From the time of the agreement all parties acted upon the faith of the agreement, except that the present rector since Michaelmas 1832 refused to receive the rent-charge, and in July 1833 filed his bill against the occupiers of those lands which had been exempted from tithes, for a common account of tithes. Mr. Plowden, the tenant for life of the lands exempted from tithes, was afterwards made a party defendant to the bill by amendment. Upon the hearing in the Court of Exchequer the bill as against Mr. Plowden was dismissed, [43] and as against the occupiers a decree was made for payment of tithes. Held, upon appeal, that the bill against the occupiers be dismissed with costs, and that the rector could not come into a court of equity and ask for the payment of tithes, without giving up the lands he received from Mr. Plowden as a compensation for his tithes.

Semble.—That a person made a party to a suit by amendment after the time limited by the third section of the second and third of William the Fourth may claim the benefit of the limitation given by the statute, though the bill was filed within the time prescribed by the statute.

William Plowden (the ancestor of the appellant Edmund Plowden) was in the year 1711 lord of the manor of Aston, and also patron of the church of Aston in the county of Northampton; and John Wilson was at that time rector of the church of Aston.

"By articles of agreement dated the first of March 1711, between William Plowden, lord of the manor and also patron of the church of Aston, and John Wilson, rector and incumbent of the church of Aston, after reciting that the said William Plowden was seised or owner of divers parcels of land lying and being in the late common fields of Aston, and that the said John Wilson, as rector of the said church, and in right thereof, was seised of several other parcels of land lying also dispersed in the said late common fields, and also of a parcel of ground lying and being in a close (known or called by the name of Aston Close) in Appletree in the said parish of Aston, being the glebe lands belonging to said rectory of Aston, and also of the tithes of all sorts arising as well out of the said common fields as out of the demesne lands of the said William Plowden in Aston; and that for [44] the better improvement of the said common fields the said William Plowden had lately inclosed the same, and being desirous that the rights and profits appertaining to the said church might be preserved, and that the present rector thereof and his successors might enjoy, in right of the said church, an advantage by and a just proportion of the improvement expected from such inclosure; it was agreed that he the said William Plowden and his heirs, and all and every person or persons having or claiming any estate or interest in or unto the lands, tenements, and hereditaments herein-after particularly mentioned, should, on or before the twentieth day of February next ensuing the date thereof, well and sufficiently grant, convey, and assure unto the said John Wilson and his successors, rectors of the church of Aston, for ever, all that part or parcel of the late common fields of Aston therein particularly mentioned and described, and all parcels and pieces of ground or meadow, or any of them, belonging or appertaining, or set out or appointed to be held, used, or enjoyed with them or any of them (except one acre and a half of the furlong therein mentioned); all which said premises so to be granted to the said John Wilson and his successors as aforesaid, together with the churchyard, parsonage house, and close, and the gardens, orchards, and walls dividing the said gardens and orchards from the estate of the said William Plowden, and all yards, outhouses, and buildings, and all ground belonging thereto, should at all times thereafter be deemed and taken, and were thereby and by the parties thereunto declared and agreed to be and to be enjoyed as the glebe of and belonging to the church of Aston afore-[45]-said, and the rector thereof and his successors for ever; and also that he the said William Plowden, and his heirs and assigns, and all such other person and persons whatsoever as were or should be seised of the manor, lands, tenements, and hereditaments reputed to be the said William Plowden's in Aston aforesaid, should and would, on or before the said 20th day of February next ensuing the date thereof, well and sufficiently grant, settle, and assure unto the said John Wilson and his successors, rectors of the said church of Aston, for ever, one annuity or yearly rent-charge or sum of forty pounds, to be yearly issuing and going out of, and to be effectually charged and chargeable upon the said manor, lands, and hereditaments as counsel should advise, and to be paid at two equal payments, on the 25th day of March and 29th day of September every year, without any manner of deduction for taxes, levies, or payments of any kind whatsoever, except such as should be charged upon the annuity itself, with a power, in case the annuity should be unpaid, for the said John Wilson and his successors to enter upon the lands chargeable therewith, and distrain for the same; and it was thereby further agreed that the said John Wilson and his successors, rectors of the church of Aston, should have certain privileges of taking away stone, gravel, and mortar, and of using a certain pool of water, and other small privileges and exemptions therein mentioned; in consideration of all which premises the said John Wilson did thereby for himself, and as much as in him lieth for his successors, rectors of Aston aforesaid, covenant and agree to and with the said William Plowden, his [46] heirs and assigns, that all those parcels and pieces of land theretofore reputed and taken as or for the glebe land of or belonging to the church of Aston, and which lie in the late common field of Aston aforesaid, and which were theretofore in the possession of the said John Wilson, his tenant or tenants, and the said parcel of ground therein-before mentioned to lie in the said close called Aston close in Apple-tree aforesaid, (except such parts and parcels thereof as did lie in the said parcels of ground and meadow thereby agreed and appointed for glebe, and which were to be conveyed to the said John Wilson and his successors as aforesaid,) should from thenceforth be possessed and enjoyed by the said William Plowden and his heirs, as his and their own proper estate for ever; and also that all and singular the lands, tenements, and hereditaments whereof the said William Plowden was then possessed or owner in Aston aforesaid, and every of them, should be free and discharged for ever of and from the payment of all and all manner of tenths, tithes, and oblations, obventions, modus, compositions, and all other dues theretofore due and payable out of the estate of him the said William Plowden in Aston aforesaid, (except and other than as aforesaid, and also except such tithes and dues as were purely personal and did not arise out of the estate of the said William Plowden, such as are the Easter roll and fees due for marriages, churchings, and mortuaries); and that such act and acts as counsel should think reasonable should be made and done by the said John Wilson, but at the costs and charges in the law of the said William Plowden, his heirs, executors, or adminis-[47]-trators, for the better performance of the agreement therein-before contained, and on the part and behalf of the said John Wilson to be done and performed."

On the 16th of March 1713, in pursuance of a petition presented by the said William Plowden as lord of the manor and patron of the church of Aston, and also the said John Wilson as rector of the said church, to the lord bishop of Peterborough the diocesan, to appoint commissioners to make inquiry into the goodness and value of the lands on both sides proposed, and to consider and report to his Lordship whether the articles of agreement would be for the then present and future advantage of the said rectory and the then present and succeeding rectors thereof, a commission, dated the 1st day of April 1714, was duly issued by the Bishop of Peterborough, addressed to the chancellor of the diocese and the other commissioners therein named, to inquire whether the articles of agreement and the covenants therein mentioned were reasonable and equal, and in no ways detrimental to the church of Aston aforesaid, and to the then rector there and his successors, rectors thereof.

On the 10th of April 1714 the commissioners returned the said commission with their certificate to the bishop, and thereby certified that, in obedience to the said commission, they did meet and sit in the parish church of Aston on Tuesday the 6th day of that instant April; and upon the examination of divers persons upon oath, then and there found that the glebe lands of and belonging to the said rectory of Aston before the said inclosure consisted of five yard lands, and were worth about £40 per annum, and that the tithes of the open field land belonging to the said William Plowden before the said inclosure were worth [48] about £38 per annum, and that the tithes of the old inclosure lying within the precincts of Aston aforesaid, and belonging to the said William Plowden, were worth about £18 per annum. And they also then found that the several parcels of land and meadow ground lying within the fields of Aston aforesaid as were then inclosed, and by the said articles between the said William Plowden and John Wilson agreed to be settled upon the said John Wilson and his successors, rectors of Aston aforesaid, for ever in lieu of tithes, and the said glebe lands consisted of about 140 acres, and were worth, one year with another, about £130 per annum. And they did also further certify his Lordship that the exchange of the several parcels of land particularly mentioned in the said articles of agreement between the said Mr. Plowden and Mr. Wilson, and also the annual payment of £40 out of the estate of the said William Plowden lying in Aston aforesaid to the said Mr. John Wilson and his successors, rectors of Aston aforesaid, in lieu of the glebe lands belonging to the said church and rectory, and also in lieu of all manner of predial tithes issuing and payable out of the estate of him the said William Plowden lying in Aston aforesaid, would be no ways prejudicial or detrimental to the said Mr. John Wilson or his successors, rectors of Aston aforesaid, but would be an improvement of and augmentation to the said church and rectory of above £60 per annum.

On the return of the said commission the then bishop of Peterborough, by an instrument under his hand and episcopal seal, dated the 17th day of May 1714, by virtue of his authority, ordinary and episcopal, granted his licence for carrying into effect the said articles of agreement.

[49] William Plowden, in Michaelmas term 1714, exhibited his original bill of complaint in the Court of Chancery against John Wilson and the bishop of Peterborough, in order that the said inclosure, exchange, and articles of agreement might be established and carried into effect by the decree of the Court of Chancery. The bishop of Peterborough and John Wilson put in their answers thereto.

The cause being at issue came on for hearing on the 25th July 1715 before Sir John Trevor, the then Master of the Rolls, who made a decree therein, and thereby ordered and decreed that the said articles of agreement entered into between the said William Plowden and the said John Wilson should be performed, and that the said exchanges of the said lands should be confirmed and made perpetual, and that the said parties should hold and enjoy the said premises according to the said exchange, and that conveyances should be made pursuant thereto.

From the time of the agreement all parties acted under the agreement; the parties to the agreement and those claiming under them respectively enjoying the benefits conferred by the agreement until Michaelmas 1832, when the respondent refused any longer to receive the rent-charge of £40.

Some years after the date of the agreement William Plowden sold the advowson of the rectory of Aston to the president and scholars of Saint John's College, Oxford, who are the present patrons of the rectory. In the month of June 1833 the respondent gave notice to the appellants, Thomas Mattingley, William Budd, George Bliss, and Charles Cowper, tenants to the appellant Edmund Plowden of the lands in Aston, of [50] which the said William Plowden was seised at the time of the said agreement of the 1st of March 1711, including the glebe lands received by the said William Plowden under that agreement, to pay tithes in kind in respect of those lands.

By the act of the second and third of William the Fourth, cap. 100. section 2. it is enacted, that every composition for tithes which had been made or confirmed by the decree of any court of equity in England, in a suit to which the ordinary, patron, and incumbent were parties, and which had not since been set aside, abandoned, or departed from, should be and the same was thereby confirmed and made valid in law.

By the third section it is provided that this act should not be prejudicial or available to or for any plaintiff or defendant in any suit or action relative to any of the matters before mentioned now commenced, or which might be thereafter commenced during the then session of parliament, or within one year from the end thereof.

The respondent, on the 16th of July 1833, filed his bill in the Court of Exchequer against the appellants, Thomas Mattingley, William Budd, George Bliss, and Charles Cowper, and thereby stated that in the month of August in the year 1831 he was duly presented, instituted, and inducted into the rectory of Aston, and that he had been, ever since his said presentation, institution, and induction, and was then entitled to all the tithes both great and small within the rectory and parish; and the bill prayed that the defendants might be decreed to come to a fair and just account with the respondent for the single value of the tithes of all and every of the titheable matters and things aforesaid, and [51] to pay to the respondent what upon such account might appear to be due to him.

The said last-named appellants by their answer insisted upon the agreement, the confirmation by the bishop, and the decree establishing the agreement, and that they had no notice to set out their tithes previously to June 1833; and they insisted that the agreement was entire and ought not to be partially vacated, and that the appellant, Edmund Plowden, who was then lord of the manor of Aston, ought to be made party to that suit, and that the said Court could not make any decree respecting the matters therein stated until Edmund Plowden should be made a party thereto.

The respondent took exceptions to the last-mentioned answer principally on the ground that the defendants had not given a full account of the tithes arisen on their respective farms; and the last-mentioned defendants put in a further answer to the said original bill on the 14th of August 1834.

On the 15th day of January 1835 the respondent amended his bill by making the present appellant Edmund Plowden a defendant thereto, and by alleging that many years ago some agreement was entered into between William Plowden, the ancestor of the said Edmund Plowden, and the then rector of the said parish, by which the lands mentioned in the bill to be in the occupation of the defendants became exempt from the payment of tithes in kind, or whereby the tithes became payable to the said Edmund Plowden and those who claimed under him; and by charging that such agreement, if any such there was, was illegal and not binding in law upon subsequent rectors of the said parish.

The appellant Edmund Plowden appeared to the [52] bill, and on the 11th day of May 1835 put in a plea to the bill, which, after setting forth the agreement of the 1st of March 1711, the confirmation thereof by the Bishop of the diocese, and the decree of the Court of Chancery, and the several sections of the act of the second and third of William the Fourth, cap. 100, stated that the rectors of Aston-le-Walls had, ever since the agreement of the 1st of March 1711, held and enjoyed the lands and privileges thereby allotted and given to them and received the annuity of £40 per annum in full satisfaction of all tithes of the lands of which tithes were demanded by the bill, and that the only lands occupied by the other defendants to the bill within the parish of Aston-le-Walls were the lands in Aston of which the said William Plowden was seised at the time of making the said agreement, including the glebe lands thereby allotted to him; and the said appellant averred that the said composition for tithes made and contained in and by the said agreement, and confirmed by the aforesaid decree, had not since been set aside, abandoned, or departed from, and that the discharge from tithes thereby effected did exist and was acted upon at the time of the passing of the said statute; and therefore he pleaded the matters aforesaid in bar to the said respondent's bill.

On the 26th day of June 1835 the plea was disallowed by the Chief Baron, who upon a re-hearing confirmed his former judgment, but without costs.

The appellant Edmund Plowden then put in his answer to the said amended bill, and insisted upon the same grounds of defence which had been insisted upon by the other defendants, and also claimed the benefit of the statute of the second and third of William the [53] Fourth, cap 100; and also insisted that the respondent could not have any decree for tithes until he had restored to the appellant Edmund Plowden the lands and privileges which were then held by the respondent under the agreement, and taken back the ancient glebe of the rectory, which he the appellant was willing to restore in case the agreement should be avoided.

On the 8th of February 1837 the cause was heard before Mr. Baron Alderson.

On the 15th day of February 1837 a decree was made by Mr. Baron Alderson, whereby it was referred to Richard Richards, Esquire, one of the masters of the Court, to take an account of what was due to the said respondent Henry Thorpe from the said appellants, Thomas Mattingley, William Budd, George Bliss, and Charles Cowper respectively, for and in respect of the single value of the tithes of all and every the titheable matters and things in the said bill mentioned; and it was ordered and decreed, that what the said master should find to be due from them respectively upon taking the aforesaid accounts, be answered and paid by the said appellants respectively; and it was further ordered, that it should be and it was thereby referred to the said master to tax the said respondent his costs of the said suit as against the said appellants Thomas Mattingley, William Budd, George Bliss, and Charles Cowper, and that such costs, when taxed, be paid by the said appellants, Thomas Mattingley, William Budd, George Bliss, and Charles Cowper to the said plaintiff; and it was further ordered, that the said respondent's bill be dismissed out of the said Court as against the said appellant Edmund Plowden, but without costs; [54] with the usual directions for production of books and examination of witnesses.

From the orders overruling the plea Edmund Plowden appealed, and from the decree all the appellants appealed.

Mr. Boteler and Mr. Bethell for the Appellants.—The agreement is entire; the rector can have no account of tithes until he restores the advantages he takes under the agreement. Instead of a bill for a simple account of tithes it ought to have been a bill to set aside the agreement to which the rector and ordinary ought to have been parties; but by the statute no proceedings could have been taken against Mr. Plowden in this suit within the time prescribed by that act, nor was there sufficient notice to determine this agreement. In the Attorney General v. Cholmeley (2 Eden, 304) land was given for land, and tithes for annuity or money payment; the land-owners and rector were the only parties to the agreement, and the patron was not a party to the suit in which the agreement was confirmed by decree. Where a legal right is asserted a court of equity takes care that complete justice is done. In usurious transactions relief is only granted upon the terms of paying what is actually due with interest. In this case the rector partly acts upon the agreement, and partly seeks to set it aside, keeping the land and asking for an account of the tithes. It is vain to say that the land is not distinguishable; the Court would see that the value of the lands to be given up was properly ascertained.

[55] Mr. Swanston and Mr. Griffith Richards for Respondent.—A bill for an account of tithes is not an equitable proceeding: it is the assertion of a legal right, in respect of which an account is directed in a court of equity. Restitution cannot be raised in this suit; if the appellants are entitled to any equity a proper proceeding may be taken by them for that purpose. [Lord Chancellor.—There is no notice to terminate the composition; therefore at the time of the bill filed there would be nothing due: so long as the rector chooses to act under the agreement it is good.] Our proposition is, that the agreement is altogether void. The clergyman is entitled to tithes in kind from the time the notice is given. [Lord Chancellor.—However invalid a modus may be, if the rector received the modus he could not receive the tithes in kind.] This case is not distinguishable from the Attorney General v. Cholmeley. It is said that Mr. Plowden ought to be made a party to the suit; if he had been made a party the bill must have been dismissed against him. In a simple bill for tithes the owner of the inheritance need not be a party. But then it is said, he was not made a party to the record until after the time prescribed by the act had elapsed. The act applies only where no suit is depending. If the act be construed literally in case of a devolution, it would apply to the representatives of parties who died pending the suit.

Lord Chancellor (3d Feb.).—The question before your Lordships arose upon an appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer, by which a decree was made directing an account of tithes generally against certain persons who were occupiers of lands within the parish. [56] Mr. Plowden, who it appears was tenant for life and landlord of the lands in question, had been made a party to the suit; but he having pleaded, and that plea being overruled, he remained a party at the hearing, and at the hearing the bill was dismissed against him. According to the proceedings, therefore, as they stand, it was an ordinary decree for tithes against the occupiers of the lands.

The bill was filed on the 16th of July 1833. and to the bill as originally filed there were no parties defendants except the occupiers of the lands. On the 12th of December 1833 those occupiers put in their answer, and stated, what was afterwards proved, and which constitutes the question in the cause, that in the year 1711 an arrangement had been entered into between a Mr. Plowden, who was then the owner of the fee, with the then rector, by which certain lands, the property of Mr. Plowden, were conveyed to the benefit of the church, and certain glebe lands belonging to the church were assigned to Mr. Plowden, and other lands belonging to Mr. Plowden were to be held for the future tithe-free. It appears that this arrangement was afterwards submitted to the consideration of the bishop of the diocese, the bishop of Peterborough, and that, after an investigation as to the terms of that arrangement, it was sanctioned by the bishop; and it appeared also that it afterwards became the subject of a suit in the Court of Chancery, to which the patron, ordinary, proprietor, and rector were parties, and that it ended in a decree establishing this arrangement.

It appears, and I now state what was proved on the investigation which took place before the commissioners appointed by the bishop, that the glebe lands taken by [57] Mr. Plowden were of the value of £40 a year, and that the tithes were of the value of £56 a year; that the lands given by Mr. Plowden to the church were of the value of £130 a year; and that there was, in addition to those lands so given to the church, a rent-charge of £40 a year upon the other properties belonging to Mr. Plowden.

It appears that from that time down to the time when this bill was filed, or at all events until very shortly preceding the time when this bill was filed, all parties acted upon the faith of that agreement. It appears that the present incumbent, the present plaintiff, was instituted to this living in the year 1831; it appears that he received the rent-charge of £40 a year, including the payment to Michaelmas 1832; it also appears, and was proved by two witnesses, namely, Willifer and Cowper, that he had at all times remained in possession of the lands, and that at the time the depositions were taken he was in actual possession of those lands which had by Mr. Plowden been devoted to the church in exchange for the advantages he derived under the agreement in respect of his estate.

Now, on looking to the agreement, which it is very material should be very accurately examined and compared with the evidence before the commissioners appointed by the bishop, it appears that, inasmuch as the value of the tithes released exceeded the £40 per annum of rent-charge, and that the value of the lands given by Mr. Plowden exceeded the value of the glebe lands taken by a sum equal, or very nearly so, to £90 a year,—if the £40 a year had been in lieu of the tithes, it would have been an inadequate compensation for the tithes, [58] even according to their then existing value, the tithes being £56 a year and the rent-charge £40. If the lands were to be changed for the glebe lands, it would appear that that could not be a contract, inasmuch as the glebe lands were of the value of £40 a year, and the lands granted to the rector by Mr. Plowden were of the value of £130 a year. It is quite clear, therefore, that some part of the lands granted by Mr. Plowden to the rector were in consideration of the discharge of his other lands from tithe. It is most important to keep that fact in view when you come to consider how far the authority, which has been the guide of the Court below upon this subject, can be considered as applicable to the present case.

Now, we find that the present rector succeeding to the rectory found this agreement in operation not binding as contended, and truly contended, because the statute prevented parties, notwithstanding all the solemnities which had accompanied such a contract, giving effect to a discharge from tithes by an agreement which had been thus entered into; but it is perfectly certain that, even if there had been an ordinary composition, the party succeeding to a rectory, acting on a composition made during the time of his predecessor, although he may have had the power to get rid of it, must be considered as so far becoming a party to that arrangement that he cannot, as a matter of course and at once, treat those with whom the contract was subsisting as if no such agreement had been made. But at all events he cannot do this: he cannot claim a compensation for the discharge of tithes, and come into a court of equity to ask for payment of those tithes. Now, it appears that the rector received the £40 till Michaelmas 1832, [59] and that he still claims the lands; that he gave no notice of any kind till June 1833, and that in the month of July following he filed his bill.

In the case of Hewett v. Adams, in 2d Brown's Parliamentary Cases, page 64, this House dismissed a bill for want of proper notice to determine a composition, although the defendant disputed the rector's right to make the composition; and that Lord Thurlow considered as a binding authority in a case in which the defendant had set up a modus, which was the case of Bishop v. Chichester, in 2d Brown's Chancery Reports, page 160. In this case there is no question about determining a composition, which, though void against successors, may be adopted, and become binding upon them till avoided, because the rector in this case is still in possession of the lands given in lieu of the tithes. It is said that the Master in taking the account has not gone beyond Michaelmas 1832, when the last payment of the rent-charge was received; but why is the receipt of the rent-charge to stop the account, if the possession of the lands is not to defeat the plaintiff's title to it? While the plaintiff retains the substitute for the tithes he cannot claim the tithes; therefore there was nothing due when the bill was filed. There is, however, a distinct ground of defence growing out of this state of things: the plaintiff holds the lands given in exchange for the tithes by the conveyance of 1711, and the decree gives to the plaintiff the tithes out of the lands agreed to be discharged, but leaves him in possession of the lands given to him as the consideration of the discharge. Equity thus gives its assistance to work the great injustice of restoring to the plaintiff the thing sold without requiring repayment of the consideration. [60] This is contrary to one of the first principles of equity, "that he who seeks equity must do equity."

It was said, indeed, that in the case of suits for tithes a court of equity only gives effect to a legal title, and that this principle therefore does not apply to this case. It is quite immaterial what is the nature of the demand; it is the exercise of its jurisdiction which the court withholds, unless the party seeking its exercise will do what the court thinks just. I lately, in the case of Sturges v. Champness, in Chancery, had occasion to review the authorities upon this subject, and this was the principle upon which I acted. I think it impossible, therefore, to give to the plaintiff any assistance in equity, without seeing justice done to the other parties to the agreement of 1711. If that were possible in this suit, and if there were no other fatal objections to it, the question would be what such justice required. The agreement was, to give up the land in fee, and to discharge for ever Mr. Plowden's other lands from tithes. The late defendant, Mr. Plowden, was only tenant for life, but if the lands given to the rector are to be restored to Mr. Plowden's estate, and the ancient glebe taken out of that estate and restored to the rectory, it is obvious that the owner of the inheritance must be a party to this proceeding. But there was no such person before the court at the hearing, although the tenant in tail has (in what right does not very well appear) raised this appeal. We must, however, look at the case as it existed at the hearing; this could not be cured by adding him as a party, because the bill makes no case, and asks no relief, for the purpose of raising any such equity.

It has been supposed, however, that there is authority [61] to support this decree, however opposed it may be to those well known principles of equity to which I have adverted; and that case is the Attorney General v. Cholmley. From the report in 2d Eden 704, it appears that the owner of the land as well as the patron and ordinary were parties, and Lord Northington proceeded upon this: that by the agreement the land given to the rector was an exchange for the glebe, and the money payment in lieu of the tithes, and that the contracts, though contained in one agreement, were distinct. That decree, therefore, did not, as this does, give to the rector the tithes, and leave him in possession of what had been given to the rectory for the purchase of them. It is clear that if this had been so, and he had not had the power of restoring the parties to the situation in which they would have stood if no such agreement had been entered into, he would not have made the decree for the payment of the tithes. The observation that he makes at the close of his judgment is well worthy of remark; he says, "If the parties had made an allowance for the future improved value of the tithes, they would have stood on a different footing, and I should not have been inclined to relieve them; they then would have been purchasers for a valuable consideration by allowing for the future improvements; the equity of the Court would have been suspended by setting up equity against equity, and I should have left the rector to his remedy at law." This does not appear to me to be inconsistent with the opinion he had before expressed, that the agreement was void; he only means that equity would not have interfered, and he obviously alludes to the maxim used by the defendant in that case, "Ecclesia [62] meliorari, non deteriorari, potest," and which he had before answered by stating that the agreement in question was unequal and injurious to the church, in not providing for the improved value of the tithes. In this case that is provided for, the land given to the church greatly exceeding the value of the glebe taken and of the tithes given up by it. To rescind the agreement altogether, if practicable, would be highly injurious to the church; to decree payment of the tithes without doing so, most unjust to the other parties to it.

The view I have taken upon this part of the case makes it unnecessary to observe on the construction put on the second and third William the Fourth, cap. 100. section 3. Had it been necessary to decide that question I should have found much difficulty in concurring in an opinion that a defendant against whom no proceedings were instituted until January 1835 could not claim the benefit of the third section, because the suit to which he was made a defendant by amendment had been commenced against others within the prescribed time.

These opinions I have formed on considering these papers and attending to the argument at the bar; and after communicating with the noble and learned Lord who was present during the discussion, I shall to-morrow move the judgment of the House upon this case. I can only say, that if that noble and learned Lord concurs in the opinion I have now expressed, the motion I shall submit to the House will be to vary the decree by dismissing the appeal with costs.

Lord Chancellor (6th Feb.).—In the case of Plowden v. Thorpe I have since had an opportunity of communi-[63]-cating with the noble and learned Lord who also attended the hearing, and I have from him authority for stating that he entirely concurs in the opinion I then expressed. The course which I propose to take will not entirely exhaust the case, inasmuch as the appeal not only embraces the final decree, but also embraces the order made by the Court of Exchequer upon the plea put in by Mr. Plowden. But I apprehend, if your Lordships agree in the opinion which I have suggested, namely, that the bill should be dismissed, you will not be called upon to give any opinion upon that plea, inasmuch as the object of the party appellant will be obtained as to all the substantial parts of the case. The utmost possible question which can be involved in the plea is a question of costs of the smallest possible amount, for whatever opinion might be formed upon the plea, which involves considerable difficulty on the construction of the act of parliament, your Lordships will doubtless think, differing from the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, that that plea, if allowed, ought to be allowed without costs, so that it will be the smallest possible amount of costs.

Decree in part reversed, and bill ordered to be dismissed with costs.

FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY, IRELAND.

WILLIAM DE MONTMORENCY, Esquire,—Appellant; HARVEY DEVEREUX, Esquire,—Respondent [20th, 24th, and 25th February, 1840].

[Mews' Dig. i. 61; iv. 688; vii. 231, 428; ix. 124; xiii. 1441; xiv. 1747, 1749, 1774. S.C. 7 Cl. and F. 188; 4 Jur. 403; 1 Dr. and Wal. 119; 2 Dr. and Wal. 410. As to lapse of time, see Clanricarde v. Henning, 1861, 30 Beav. 175. Cited on point as to costs, in Parker v. M'Kenna, 1874, L.R. 10 Ch. 114, and see Fyler v. Fyler, 1841, 3 Beav. 550.]

Sir, William Ryves De Montmorency devises his real estate to Harvey Devereux, in trust to permit his natural son William De Montmorency to enjoy the same for ever, subject to his debts, and bequeathes his personal estate to William De Montmorency, and appoints Harvey Devereux, who had for fifteen years before his death been his land agent and general manager of his affairs, the executor of his will. On the 16th April 1829, two days after the death of the testator, William De Montmorency expresses his determination to give an estate at Cooldrina, devised to him by the testator, to Harvey Devereux, and to appoint him land agent and receiver of his estates. On the 18th of the same April Harvey Devereux brings to William De Montmorency deeds of lease and release, dated the 17th and 18th April 1829, ready drawn and prepared, whereby William De Montmorency, in consideration of Harvey Devereux's faithful services, and in discharge of all accounts between Sir William De Montmorency and Harvey Devereux, some of them being unsettled, conveys the estate at Cooldrina to Harvey Devereux in fee, and on the same day, by letter, appoints him the agent of his estates, at a salary of £200 a year, and promises, in case of his removing him without sufficient cause, to give him the same salary. Shortly after the death of the testator a relation of the testator's declared that he intended, as heir at law, to lay claim to [65] the testator's estates. On the 2d of June 1829 Harvey Devereux proved the will of the testator at Dublin, and on his return home from thence, accompanied by William De Montmorency, made a speech to the tenants of the estates, stating that he was in possession of a secret which might defeat William De Montmorency's title to his estates, but that it should remain with him; and if any one claiming a right to the estates should go to law he would defeat him, as he was always successful in any cases in which he was concerned.—Held, that if the transaction had been complained of in reasonable time it would have been set aside by a court of equity, but inasmuch as in October 1830, upon the investigation of the accounts between William De Montmorency and Harvey Devereux by their respective solicitors, the deeds of 1829 were distinctly called to the attention of William De Montmorency's solicitors, and were adopted by them in the settlement of those accounts, and inasmuch as in December 1830 William De Montmorency had confirmed them by executing another deed, the draft of which had been approved by one of his solicitors, and in 1831 called upon Harvey Devereux to pay a debt due from his father which Harvey Devereux by the deed of 1830 had undertaken to pay, and in 1832 wrote a letter to Harvey Devereux approving of the deeds of 1829, and in 1833 set up the deeds of 1829 as a defence to an action for costs which were discharged by those deeds, and succeeded in that defence, and did not complain of the deeds till 1835, when he filed his bill to set it aside, it was held that William De Montmorency had recognized and confirmed the deed of 1829; and the judgment of the court below, dismissing the bill without costs, was affirmed.

Sir William Ryves De Montmorency, by his will dated the 13th of April 1829, devised and bequeathed his real and personal estates situate in the county of Kilkenny, together with his estate called Cooldrina in the same county, and all other his real and personal [66] estate, to the respondent Harvey Devereux, his heirs, executors, and administrators, in trust only to permit the appellant William De Montmorency, and his heirs and assigns, to have, hold, take, and enjoy the same, and all the rents, issues, and profits, and other benefits and advantages of the same for ever, subject to testator's lawful debts and funeral expenses, and £50 a year payable to Richard Jordan, jun., during his natural life, as therein mentioned; and as to his personal and chattel property, consisting of £3500 late currency, charged and chargeable on the Barrowmount and other estates of the late Ralph Gore, esq., in the county of Kilkenny, and of the rents, household furniture, books, paintings, and other his chattel or personal estates, he thereby bequeathed the same unto the appellant, whom he appointed residuary legatee; and the testator thereby appointed Harvey Devereux executor to his last will and testament.

On the 14th April 1829 Sir William Ryves De Montmorency died.

On the 17th of April Harvey Devereux delivered up possession of the real and the freehold estates of the testator to William De Montmorency, who was the natural son of the testator.

The estates were, at the time of the death of the said Sir William Ryves De Montmorency, subject to judgment debts to the amount of £10,000 or thereabouts, due to John Smithwick of the city of Kilkenny, esq., the father-in-law of Harvey Devereux, under and by virtue of several judgments obtained by John Smithwick against Sir William Ryves De Montmorency in his lifetime, and for the better securing which debts the appellant afterwards executed to the said John Smithwick [67] a deed of mortgage, bearing date the 18th day of December 1830, of the estates in the county of Kilkenny.

Harvey Devereux, from the month of October 1815 up to the time of the death of Sir William Ryves De Montmorency, was his land agent and general manager of his affairs, from whom he received a salary of £100 per annum as land agent of part of the estates till the end of the year 1818, and from thence till the time of Sir William Ryves De Montmorency's death £200 per annum, on his undertaking the agency over all the estates. The last account settled between Sir William Ryves De Montmorency and Harvey Devereux was settled on the 14th of November 1821, though four several accounts from that period up to the 24th October 1825, when the last account was furnished, were delivered by Harvey Devereux to Sir William Ryves De Montmorency, but the same were not settled and signed upon the day of Sir William De Montmorency's death. William Bayley, being then at the testator's residence, and entitled to an estate at Kilcreene in the county of Kilkenny subject to the testator's life estate therein, insisted upon getting possession of the title deeds and papers relating to the Kilcreene estate; but upon its being found that the title deeds of that estate were mixed up with those relating to the testator's other estates, it was agreed between William De Montmorency and William Bayley that all the deeds and papers should be taken home by Harvey Devereux, in order that he might make a selection, and hand over to William Bayley such of the deeds and papers as related to the Kilcreene estate. With that view all the deeds and papers were taken by Harvey Devereux. On the 16th of April 1829, two days after the death of Sir [68] William Ryves De Montmorency, William De Montmorency stated to Dr. Cullinan, who had himself received a deed of gift from the appellant, and which was prepared by Maher, the partner of the respondent, that he had determined upon giving Harvey Devereux the estate and lands of Cooldrina, and also to employ him as his land agent and receiver at the same salary as that paid by his father. On the 18th of April 1829 William De Montmorency wrote the following letter to Harvey Devereux:—

“Upperwood, 18th April 1829.

“My dear Sir,—It was the anxious wish of my poor father that you should continue during your life to manage my affairs as agent, in the same way as you did so many years for him, at the same salary. His confidence and esteem for you was evinced by the appointing you trustee to his will, and desiring I should give you the Cooldrina property. I have now to hope and request you will continue my agent and manager of my affairs, and I now appoint you to that situation during your life, at the former salary of £200 a year, on the following conditions: that you shall faithfully and attentively discharge the duties of such office, and pay over and account to me at least once in every year for all rents and other monies of mine that may get into your hands; and as an inducement to you to accept such, I promise not to remove you, and if I shall do so without just cause at any future time, I bind myself to allow and pay you that salary.—I am, my dear Sir, yours very truly,
